ed, that when any pensioner, or other person entitled to or in receipt of any such pension or other allowance as aforesaid, shall leave his wife or family chargeable, or suffer them to become chargeable, to any parish, it shall be lawful for two or more justices, upon complaint thereof to them made, by any one or more of the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of such parish, and verified on oath, by order under their hands and seals, to direct that the next payment, which shall become due, of such pension or other allowance, shall be made to the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish to which such wife or family shall have become chargeable; and any one or more of such churchwardens and overseers of the poor shall transmit such order to the aforesaid commissioners for the affairs of the royal hospitals at Chelsea or Greenwich, or the secretary of the board of ordnance respectively, in like manner as any assignment is heretofore directed to be transmitted to the paymaster-general of his Majesty's forces, and the paymaster of pensions at Greenwich, and the secretary of the board of ordnance, as the case may be; which said paymaster-general, or paymaster of pensions at Greenwich, or the treasurer of the board of ordnance, shall thereupon, and upon sufficient proof being given that the person whose pension or other allowance shall be directed to be paid, shall have been living when the same shall have become payable, and would have been entitled to receive the same if no such order had been made, cause the said payment to be made to the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish for whose security such order shall have been made; and the churchwardens and overseers of the poor receiving any such pension or other allowance, by virtue of any such order, shall retain and apply the same, or so much thereof as shall have been actually expended for the purposes aforesaid, for the use and indemnity of the parish, and shall pay the overplus (if any there shall be) to the pensioner or person entitled thereto; and upon the receipt of any such order as aforesaid, by which the pension, or other allowance to be mentioned therein, shall be directed to be paid to such churchwardens and overseers as aforesaid, the payment thereof shall be suspended, until sufficient proof shall have been given to entitle the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish, in such order named, to receive the money thereby directed to be paid to them."

A clause was then added, to empower justices to order payment of seamen's wages, for the indemnity of parishes. "And whereas in many instances the wives and families of seamen employed in the merchants' service become chargeable to parishes, while their husbands and fathers are absent on such service, and it is expedient to provide for the indemnity of such parishes, by and out of the wages of such seamen; be it therefore further enacted, that where the wife or family of any seaman employed in any voyage or trip (not being his Majesty's service) shall, during his absence on such employment, become chargeable to any parish, it shall be lawful for two justices, upon complaint thereof to them made by any one or more of the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of such parish, and verified on oath, by order under their hands and seals, to direct the acting owner or owners, ship's husband, or agent of the ship or vessel in which such seaman shall be employed, to pay, out of the wages which shall become due to such seaman, unto the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish to which his wife or family shall have become chargeable, so much as shall have been by such parish necessarily expended for their maintenance or relief (the amount, in case of any dispute, to be ascertained by two justices, whose determination thereon shall be final); and, upon the production of any such order, the owner, ship's husband, or agent, by whom the wages of the seaman therein to be named shall be payable, shall pay to such one or more of the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish for whose indemnity such order shall have been made, as shall demand the same, the sum and sums to be therein specified and directed to be paid, or so much thereof as the wages then due shall amount unto; and the payment to and receipt of any such churchwarden or overseer, shall be a good discharge for so much of such wages as shall be paid to them or him by virtue of any such order; and if any such owner, ship's husband, or agent, shall refuse or neglect to pay to the churchwarden or overseer, producing any such order, the money thereby directed to be paid, or so much thereof as be actually due for the wages of the seaman to be therein named, the same may be levied and recovered, and the payment thereof enforced against the owner or owners, ship's husband, or agent, by whom the same shall be payable, in such and the like manner as poor's rates in arrear may be levied and recovered, and the payment thereof enforced against the parties and persons chargeable and charged therewith."

The house then resumed, and the report was received, and ordered to be taken into further consideration on Tuesday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, April 27.

No public business of any importance occurred.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, April 27.

OBSTRUCTION OF JUSTICE—IONIAN ISLANDS.] Mr. Bennet rose to present a petition of Count Cladan, of Cephalonia, in the Ionian islands.—The hon. member observed, that whether the charges contained in the petition were wellfounded or not, he could not undertake to say. But the petitioner offered to prove them, and it was to to be recollected, that he was a person of high rank, considerable ability, and good character. He complained of the conduct of General Campbell, and stated, that he had been three years in endeavouring to obtain justice and had failed. His Majesty's government had referred him to the Ionian islands, where he could not expect justice—where no tribunal was competent to try his case, because no tribunal in those islands could take cognizance of the conduct of one of his Majesty's officers who was actually resident in this country. For what control could any Ionian court exercise over General Campbell in England? On one occasion, accounts respecting this case had been sent for, and a very voluminous collection of papers had been transmitted by Sir Thomas Maitland. He respected Sir T. Maitland very much, but he could not approve of his manner of treating the petitioner in his official communication. He had spoken of him as a person styling himself Count Cladan, when he ought to have known well that he was in fact Count Cladan. He was a member of the senate, a councillor of state, and had been sent as ambassador to the court of Russia, as the representative of the Ionian islands. He now came before the house as a person seeking redress for injuries sustained.

The petition was then brought up and read. It set forth, "that three years have nearly expired since the arrival of the petitioner in London, to claim justice from his Majesty's government against the proceedings of Lieutenant-general Campbell, late commanding officer of his Majesty's forces, and commissioner of the liberated Ionian islands, against Lieutenant-colonel Schummelketel, late commandant of the island of Cephalonia; the petitioner's remonstrance is proved partly by documents, by the signatures of the above-mentioned officers, and can be testified by more than one hundred and fifty witnesses, many English gentlemen, some of his Majesty's officers, natives of distinction, and by the ten tribunals, exhibiting measures at once partial and oppressive to the petitioner and other persons: 1st, that by a decree 21st April 1813, General Campbell refused the execution of a law by which the tribunal ruled, assuming thereby a despotic authority and a dispensing power superior to the laws, and in opposition to the faith pledged by the British nation that the island should be governed by its own laws; 2dly, that the said General Campbell caused to be hanged, 13th April 1813, Andrea Mingarde, of Cephalonia, although only sentenced to imprisonment by the legitimate tribunal of appeal, who tried him, preventing the judgment of the definitive tribunal, to which the sentence had been referred; which the petitioner considers to be a proceeding forming a precedent deeply injurious to him as a member of the said tribunal; 3d, that the petitioner, being president of the said tribunal, obtained from the secretary a copy of the sentence, and other documents, in order to make a representation against such excessive violence; and for the compliance of the secretary, General Campbell deprived him of his employments under the local government, although some of them had been purchased, according to custom, sending him a prisoner to the castle of Cephalonia, and mulcting him of a sum of money; 4th, that General Campbell, by his decree, without form of law, deprived Count de la Decima, of Cephalonia, of his feudatory property, which the petitioner considers to be a proceeding forming a precedent deeply injurious to his interests as a feudator; 5th, that General Campbell, by decree, obliged Constantine Corafan to pay to his sister-in-law four times the amount of her demand on him, though this demand had been rejected by the tribunals, and directed the local government to take possession of his houses and property of ten times the value of her demand, and put him under arrest, an act so despotic as not to be equalled; by decree 14th February 1814, contrary to law, he annulled the fidei commissum, to which this property was subject, and ordered it for sale, but no purchaser appearing, he directed her to be paid by the government of Cephalonia, and to reimburse itself by the produce of the property; 6th, that, contrary to public faith and law, General Campbell did by decree deprive Spiridion Baratta of the collection of certain duties legally acquired at a public sale made by the government of Zante; 7th, that General Campbell introduced many thousand pieces of foreign coin, obliging the inhabitants to receive them at a certain rate, enormously exceeding what they passed for in the islands, impressing them with the figures of their current amount, and serious consequences have resulted from this arbitrary act; 8th, that, contrary to law and the sentence of the tribunal of Zante, General Campbell, by decree, caused to be sold by auction, the brig Pauline, as may be seen by the redress sought from the colonial department nearly three years ago by Vincenzo Acquilina, the merchant, who was ruined by that decree; 9th, that General Campbell caused to be erected at Zante a pillory, horrible to the inhabitants, previously unknown in the islands, on which he exposed an inhabitant contrary to law, then ordering him to be mounted on an ass, conducted round the city, and to be flogged at certain distances; 10th, that a legal commission having been appointed to give judgment on the proofs of the forgery of the name of the petitioner's father in his last will, also on two false oaths, and the falsification and violation of the seals of government, with other crimes, the verification of which being highly important to the petitioner, and to take cognizance respecting the petitioner's feudatory property, and other important questions connected with the judgment to be given in the aforesaid criminal point, General Campbell, by decree 21st December 1814, ordered the commission to submit to him a plan of their sentence, without law, or permitting the said crimes to be tried, deciding judgment without a hearing, although remonstranced by the petitioner that the proceedings were prejudicial to him; 11th, also by a second decree 18th February 1814, General Campbell notified, that no appeal should be admitted on the subject; 12th, that the petitioner, thus injured in the grossest manner by these proceedings, did present to General Campbell a memorial on the subject, addressed to his royal highness the Prince Regent, requesting he would transmit the same to London, and to be allowed copies of the necessary documents to verify this memorial, which were deposited in the office of the secretary of government at Zante, but these requests were refused, and the memorial returned; 13th, that on the petitioner's return to Cephalonia, Colonel Schummelketel prevented his departure for four months to London, likewise refusing the authentication of the documents obtained by the petitioner of his cause in Cephalonia, although customary, and which he readily granted to others: the degrading treatment the petitioner received was like to a person outlawed for his crimes, and the doors of justice shut against him; 14th, that General Campbell, by an abuse of his power, did take possession of the country-house and premises of the noble Spiridion Chessari of Corfu, and prevented his access to them by ten military guards, and also hindered him from collecting the products of the adjoining lands; the injured proprietor supplicated General Campbell, praying that his property should be restored, or an equitable rent allowed him; but in disregard to his petition, General Campbell, in abuse of his power, did continue to occupy the said houses and land, and at length leaving the said island, without restoring the premises, or in any way remunerating the unfortunate proprietor; and the petitioner prays the house that they will be pleased to direct such inquiries into his complaints, as may to their wisdom seem meet, and that the laws of the empire may be put in force, so that he may obtain justice."

On the motion, that the petition do lie on the table, Mr. Goulburn rose and observed, that, whatever might be the merits of the case referred to in the petition, he submitted that that house was not the proper place for inquiring into or deciding upon it. The petitioner attributed several criminal acts to General Campbell, and, among others, the murder of an individual. If those charges were founded, he appealed to the house, whether that was the proper tribunal to try the accused? He had not himself the honour of knowing General Campbell, and therefore his opinion upon the case could not be influenced by any considerations of private friendship. But he could not allow himself to decide against the character of that officer upon the various charges preferred against him by the petitioner; for what the house had heard from the hon. mover and from the petition did not form a fiftieth part of the charges inserted in the petitioner's memorial to his Majesty's government. Count Cladan, no doubt, alleged that he could prove the truth of those charges; but, if he even could, that was not the proper place to try the case. There were tribunals to take cognizance of such charges as Count Cladan preferred, and to those tribunals it was open to him to make his appeal. The count had stated, that he had a number of witnesses to substantiate his charges; he had, indeed, given in a list of above 100. But all those witnesses were resident in the Ionian islands, and there Count Cladan was told that he ought to try his case. As to the animadversions upon Sir Thomas Maitland, the character of that officer stood too high to require any defence from him, especially against the bare allegation of the petitioner. But he thought it proper to state, that General Maitland always expressed a readiness to go into the petitioner's case, and to have it fully investigated before the proper tribunals in the Ionian islands, where the petitioner would have all the means of legal redress. As to the conduct of government, he could not see what any government could do in such a case; for it was not within its province to institute inquiry, or to inflict punishment, upon an affair of this nature. It was but very lately that Count Cladan objected to the trial of his case in the Ionian islands. He had expressed his apprehension of some interdict to prevent his proceeding; but he was told, that if there were any such interdict, it should be immediately removed, and that he should be at full liberty to proceed.

Sir C. Monck expressed his surprise, that while the hon. gentleman observed that General Campbell was in England, he should still refer the petitioner to the tribunals of the Ionian islands for the trial of his charges against that officer.

Mr. Goulburn explained, that he only referred the petitioner to the tribunals of the Ionian islands for the trial of that part of his case which referred to questions of property; but as to his charges respecting General Campbell, it was open to him to institute proceedings against that officer before the proper tribunal in this country.

Sir C. Monck thought the appeal of Count Cladan to that house extremely proper. He had applied in vain to government for redress—he felt it absurd to look for justice, in such a case, to the tribunals of the Ionian islands, and being without the means of supporting a lawsuit against General Campbell, where else was he to look for any remedy but to that house? The house had heard the most extraordinary language from the hon. gentleman, according to which, it would seem, that the British government was not responsible for the conduct of its officers.

Sir J. Newport said, that as no remedy could be had in the courts of the Ionian islands for the grievances complained of, justice in this country should not be refused or delayed.

Mr. Bennet said, it was no doubt true that the courts of law were open—but, as it was formerly well observed, (by Mr. Horne Tooke) "so was the London Tavern to those who could afford to pay." But the petitioner was not in a condition to go to law with a general who had made a fortune out of those very islands, the population of which he had most harshly treated. Count Cladan became poor through the very means by which general Campbell became rich. But was it meant to be stated, that when an officer of the government behaved ill, the only remedy against him was in an appeal to a court of law? Such, indeed, appeared to be the doctrine of the hon. gentleman opposite; but this was, he believed, the first time, that, when an officer of the government was charged with murder, with pilloring and flogging, according to his own will,—with breaking into private houses—with appropriating to his own use the property of the people whom he was appointed to govern and protect—with a variety of false and fraudulent acts—an under secretary of state rose in that house to say, that government would institute no inquiry into the conduct of such an officer, but refer the party aggrieved to a court of law.

Mr. Goulburn said, he did not mean to assert that persons who acted improperly abroad were not responsible for their conduct. But he could not conceive how government would be warranted in proceeding against or condemning an officer of long service and high rank, on the mere allegation of an individual, after he had, for several years, given up his situation.

Mr. F. Douglas expressed his hope, that government would not exercise a greater degree of power in the Ionian islands, than was sanctioned by the treaty of Paris. The influence of the English in the Levant would best be attained by protecting the people, not by oppressing them.

Sir C. Monck asked, how it came that letters from the Ionian islands addressed to this country were in general so long delayed? The delay was much complained of by all who had any connexion or correspondence with those islands. He had heard of an instance in which a letter was delayed no less than nine months.

Mr. Goulburn said, he was not aware of any other delay than that which occasionally arose from the necessary enforcement of the laws of quarantine.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Breach of Privilege.] The report and resolution of the committee of privileges respecting the complaint of a letter written to a voter of the county of Lanark, to influence his vote in the election of a member to serve in parliament, by Thomas Ferguson, in breach of the privileges of this house being read,

Mr. Wynn moved, "that Thomas Ferguson, in writing and sending the said letter has been guilty of a corrupt attempt to subvert the freedom and independence of election, and a high breach of the privileges of this house."—This resolution being agreed to,

Mr. Wynn rose again and observed, that in a case of this nature, the motion just agreed to was not, in his opinion, the only proceeding that ought to be adopted. According to precedent and to law, the offender should be subjected to a penalty of 100*l.*; and, if an officer under the government, dismissed from his appointment, as well as rendered incapable of ever again filling any office under government. To this extent the report of the committee did not go; but, as a member of parliament, he felt it his duty, with a view to render the punishment commensurate with the offence, to submit a distinct motion upon this subject. This motion he meant to make as soon as the minutes of the committee were printed, and laid before the house; for, after such an act of delinquency, it would be most unbecoming to allow the prisoner to hold any office under government. He should now move, "That Thomas Ferguson, for his said offence, be committed to his Majesty's gaol of Newgate, and that Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant accordingly." This motion being put, and agreed to, the hon. member gave notice of his intention to move an address to the Prince Regent, for the removal of Thomas Ferguson from the office of surveyor of the taxes in Scotland.

Education of the Poor Bill.] Mr. Brougham moved the order of the day for the committal of this bill. He observed, that the unanimous sense of the house had hitherto prevented any discussion upon it; yet great misrepresentations of its objects had gone abroad. A question respecting public charities was often of a very delicate nature. Misrepresentations on the subject, if they spread only for a few weeks, might have a tendency to injure charities by deterring benefactors. It had been said, that this bill was a measure intended to interfere with the management of the funds of public charities. This was a gross misapprehension. It was a bill intended only to interfere by examining and inquiring into, and reporting on the mismanagement of public funds. Nothing could be done under it which could affect the right of any party to defend himself before a proper tribunal. It was a grosser misrepresentation, if possible, to say that it tended to trench upon private property; but a person who held a trust for the public was bound to answer for the due discharge of it, as much as an officer paid by the government. The plan of the proposed commission was framed according to the precedents of former commissions, and especially of those not long since instituted by parliament for inquiring into our naval and military departments. Care was, indeed, taken to render the commission effective for its object, while every precaution was adopted to guard against any irrelevant or improper inquiry.

Mr. Canning said, that from the views stated by the hon. and learned gentleman, he should not propose any alteration in the committee; but he would not hold himself precluded from proposing hereafter such alteration, as might appear to him necessary in the constitution, extent, or duration of the proposed commission.

Lord Folkestone was glad the attention of the house was called to the bill in its present stage, as he wished to make some observations before it went into the committee. He must object to the exceptions in the bill in favour of Oxford, Cambridge, Westminster, and Winchester. In consequence of those exceptions, he understood that farther exceptions would be proposed. It seemed strange, that any persons should wish for exemption from inquiry in such matters. One would rather suppose they would think it a kind of insult to them if they were so exempted. He should have expected that the members for the universities would have stood up and desired inquiry, as leaving them out might seem to throw an imputation on their conduct. He happened to know a gentleman, in a county not far off, who had been able to discover, by his inquiries, extraordinary abuses of charitable funds in that county. It appeared, that only one-fourth of the amount of the funds had been returned, and that the returns thirty years ago were 2000*l.* or 3000*l.* a-year more than lately. He hoped gentlemen were sincere in their object; and he thought, that if a commission were appointed, it would be proper to put the gentleman he had alluded to into it.

Mr. Bathurst conceived that the bill went much farther than was originally contemplated. Was it intended that the commission should have the inquisitorial power of examining into the funds of the universities? Would the house say, that this should be done, when no objection was stated against their management? He might also speak of the Charter-house, Harrow-school, and other institutions. It was possible, that, by lapse of time, and some inattention, abuses might occur; but that was not an argument why the foundations of the universities were to be put into the hands of a committee, when no imputation existed against them. If Westminster and Winchester were excluded, why should the Charter-house be included in the commission? He hoped the hon. and learned gentleman would give them his own view of the subject.

Mr. Brougham said that, undoubtedly, the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning) was not committed, by agreeing to a committee pro formâ, to agree to either the principle of the bill or to its arrangements. The opportunity would be afterwards perfectly open to him to oppose the bill in its further stages. There had appeared a general understanding in favour of excepting the universities: and without stating that exception, the bill would have extended to them. His noble friend had complained of this exception; and he agreed with him, that if no abuses existed, the universities could have no apprehension or fear from an inquiry. But he thought, that those great bodies would more truly consult their own real dignity, by challenging inquiry, and wishing the provisions of the bill to extend to their institutions. That venerable man, earl St. Vincent, had afforded an example on such subjects, which, whenever they were considered, it was impossible too often to press upon the attention of the house, and to hold up to imitation. He meant his noble example in putting at the very head and front of the inquiry into the abuses in public offices, the offices of the lords commissioners of the admiralty, he being at that time himself the first lord. (Hear.) The noble earl said, "let the commissioners come into my office, and examine all papers, and all persons in the office, in all departments, from the top to the bottom." That was the practice of that venerable earl, and the inquiries into the other offices were not the less successful by the example which the noble earl had set. He readily allowed two post-captains, two lawyers, and two laymen, to go into the admiralty and search for information, and thus effected one of the most important reforms in the management of public offices that had taken place since the time of the revolution. He began, in fact, the system of closely inquiring into the uses made of the public money in the offices, which had never been well set about until he procured the appointment of his committee. That was a model for a commission of inquiry. The merits of the present measure might certainly be more advantageously discussed on a future occasion. An instance of the good effects of inquiry was to be found in the investigation which two years ago had taken place into some alleged abuses in the administration of the Charter House, when it turned out that the allegation was almost, if not entirely, groundless.

Sir John Newport observed, that similar objections to those urged against the present measure, had been adduced, when he moved for an inquiry into the fees demanded in courts of justice. The prosecution of that inquiry, however, had produced none of the inconveniences which were apprehended. It had supported all his previous statements, and very considerable advantage had attended the publication of the reports of the commissioners.

Mr. Peel was of opinion that the hon. baronet had not been very felicitous in his choice of an illustration; for the commission of inquiry to which he alluded had been appointed by the crown, in consequence of an address of that house. His hon. friend's objection was not to inquiry, but to the proposed mode of it. He thought the right hon. baronet justified in taking credit to himself for his exertions in prevailing on the house to take that measure, but the form of the proceeding was as he had described it. It did not appear to him that the hon. and learned gentleman was much more fortunate in his argument on this question, since he had found it necessary to declare, that the suspicions entertained against the public schools now under consideration were without foundation. Was this any ground for extending those suspicions to the universities, or did any one ever surmise that there was any ground for believing that the funds of those corporations were misapplied? It certainly was his own wish to see the inquiry rendered more comprehensive, and made applicable to all the great free schools of the country.

Mr. Brougham observed, that the report of the committee distinctly proved that the funds, both of the Charter-house, and of Christ's Hospital, which were created to provide for the education of the poor, were now directed to the education of the rich. The zeal and activity of Mr. Waithman had been eminently exerted in bringing to light abuses of this nature in the latter establishment. When the committee first commenced their inquiries, the conductors denied that they had any thing to do with the education of the poor; but being called upon to produce their charter, the first three lines shewed that the charity was originally instituted for the benefit of the lower orders, or poorer classes of society. It was the committee, and not those gentlemen, who had a right to complain of what passed on that occasion. They had begun by demurring to the authority of the house, and inquiring, whether the committee were aware of the names and rank of the governors, who were many of them members of the house of peers. The committee replied that they were, and it was on that account they called upon them as stewards to give that information which they had no means of compelling noble lords to communicate. The result was, that the committee were perfectly satisfied with the nature and extent of the information which they received.

The bill was then committed pro formâ.

COTTON FACTORIES BILL.] Sir Robert Peel, on moving that this bill be now committed, observed, that the proper opportunity for those who had an interest in opposing its further progress, had passed by, but that it was not his desire to take any advantage of this omission. The former bill which he introduced related only to apprentices: the present was of a more extensive nature: it was brought in to protect children of very tender years, who had no protectors, and, therefore, it was to be hoped that those children would be protected by that house. (Hear.) The hours of labour during which those poor children were employed were not less than fourteen hours in a day; this was more than their strength could endure, and it was his wish to afford them some relief. A variety of petitions had been presented to the house, representing the hardships under which those children laboured. There had been petitions from the town of Manchester, signed by 30 medical persons of great eminence in their profession, and by 21 clergymen. The persons who signed those petitions had no other interests than the interests of humanity; they had no other object than to protect the children from excessive labour. He believed that the master-spinners themselves thought the hours of labour much too long. It had been said, on a former occasion, that it would be improper to interfere with free labour; but the house should place those children in a situation in which they would be protected against excessive labour. The medical men, the clergymen, in fact, almost all the persons who were not engaged in this particular line of business, had petitioned the house to protect these poor little children from the injurious consequences of exhausting their strength; and, as it was a matter of such serious importance, he trusted that the house would go into a committee, to see if any thing could be done to afford them any relief. He therefore moved, that the house should resolve itself into a committee on this bill.

The question having been put from the chair,

Lord Stanley rose and said, it was true that several petitions had been presented by medical men, and other respectable persons, but those petitions ought not to be deemed conclusive. This was a case that involved a very material question, and it deserved the most serious consideration of the house. Abuses had certainly existed in the cotton-manufactories, and, with a view to remove them, the hon. baronet had introduced his former bill. But the bill now before them stated, that that act had become insufficient for its purposes. In what, he would ask, was it so defective? In what way had it proved to be so ineffectual? Had this bill been confined to the regulation of apprentices, he should not have had any objection to it; but, as it went to interfere with free labour, he objected to it most strongly. He knew of no precedent in the laws of this country for the adoption of any such measure. He considered the principle of free labour to be inviolable by the laws; but still he did not mean to say that the legislature had not power to make such provisions as it might deem most expedient for the regulation of a trade which was found to be injurious to health. But this was not a new trade; it had been exercised for a great length of time; and it would require the most satisfactory evidence to shew, that it affected the morals, or undermined the constitution, of those who were engaged in it. The minimum of age would have little effect, as the manufacturers did not wish to employ persons of such tender years. But if these children were not employed, their parents could derive no benefit from their labour, and, consequently, their means of providing for their families must be considerably diminished. As to the general opinion, that the cotton-trade was not so beneficial to health as many other occupations—for instance, that of agriculture—those who advanced that proposition ought to shew, that it was not only prejudicial, but he would say poisonous, in its nature, in order to make this bill the object of their experiment. This bill, which its framers intended to secure such important advantages to children, would, he conceived, be very injurious to their parents. It went directly to take away a considerable portion of their profits. It would have the contrary effect from what was anticipated. It would increase the difficulties under which the country laboured in manufactures compared with other countries. Mills worked by steam would have a great advantage over those worked by water. There were many instances in which it would be the ruin of labour, and it would offer a premium to those establishments that were situated in large towns. Under all circumstances, he should move, as an amendment, "that the house do resolve itself into the said committee on this day four months."

Lord Lascelles begged to say a few words with respect to the principle of the bill. It ought to be considered, whether the house were justified in regulating every branch of trade in the country, and ordering what degree of labour was to be endured by people in different trades. If it were not for that view of the question, he might say, that any man who stood up to oppose mere questions of humanity, as such, would be run down; but he would say to the house, "be cautious how you proceed in such a business." If that measure should be passed, those who were peculiarly interested were bound to look to what was to come afterwards. It might be to discharge from those factories children under 16 years of age, and then they would be thrown upon their parents, and from their parents upon the parishes. In that case, it would not be bettering the condition of either the children or the parents. It was nonsense, he begged pardon of the house for the expression, but it was really nonsense to say, that the children would be improving themselves in the hours when they were not employed; the event would not be so. The time would be principally spent in idleness. If the children under 16 were discharged, it might be asked would that be a beneficial effect of the bill? The advantage would be thrown into the populous towns. And what, it might be asked, would be the effect on those factories out of the reach of population, where it was possible, that if they were obliged to submit to all the regulations imposed by the bill, they might not be able to carry them on at all? Many mills were obliged to wait for water till other mills had used it, which would not agree at all with the regulations of the bill. Out of 16 factories in a small district of the county of York, 15 were worked upon water. The mode of conducting the business, it had been said, deteriorated the population, and people's limbs were distorted by being occupied in such concerns, so that they were not fit either for the army or the navy. If, however, the limbs of persons were distorted, the whole nature of the business should be altered, and one hour was not sufficient. He did not look upon the bill as proceeding entirely from the hon. baronet; but the share which he had had in it did him great credit. He believed, that it originated with a man who was well known from the public prints, Mr. Owen, who had wished to establish a new system of morals. He had said, that although the number of hours should be decreased, the quantity of material in the course of labour would be increased. That seemed to him a curious doctrine, though Mr. Owen appeared to have experienced the fact at Lanark. If they wished to do justice, they should refer the bill to a committee to inquire into the truth of the facts. He had no manner of interest in the business, either directly or otherwise; but he wished to see the bill proceed upon a proper foundation, and not upon ex-parte evidence.

Mr. Peel said, that before he proceeded to consider the main arguments of the noble lord, he hoped he might be permitted to notice two facts, by which he had endeavoured to create rather an unfair impression against the bill. The first of them was, that he had objected to the bill, because it was supposed to have originated with a gentleman who inculcated certain speculative opinions on subjects of political economy. Whether Mr. Owen was connected with the bill or not, was a matter of indifference to him, and he called upon the house not to reject a judicious measure because it might have the misfortune to be supported by an indiscreet advocate. The noble lord had then said, that he objected to this bill being passed on ex-parte evidence, and he therefore wished the subject to be referred to a committee above stairs. Now, he (Mr. Peel) would limit his defence of it to ex-parte evidence—to that evidence furnished by the opponents of the bill themselves (hear, hear), and from that evidence he thought it would not be difficult to convince the house of the necessity of applying a remedy to the existing evil. With respect to the principle of interference, to say that it was without a precedent was contrary to fact: it had been constantly acted on where peculiar exceptions from the general rule called for a particular mode of relief. Now, in his opinion, there were peculiarities in the cotton trade which called loudly for their interference; and if the same peculiarities existed in other trades, a remedy ought also in such cases to be applied. One peculiarity in the cotton trade was, that it was carried on in large buildings, in many of which more than 1000 children were kept at work 12, 14, and sometimes 15 hours a day—children of the most delicate form, and the most sickly constitution, working uniformly the same number of hours with the others. It frequently happened, too, that, from accidental occurrences, which stopped the mill, they lost a few hours, which they were afterwards obliged to fetch up by "extra time." Another peculiarity was, that the business was carried on in a heated atmosphere. In some of the finer branches it was necessary that the body should be in such a temperature, that the thread would adhere to the fingers. In many mills the atmosphere was polluted by small pieces of cotton flying about. In a majority of mills the temperature was exceedingly high, such as in the opinion of medical men would be prejudicial to health. The numbers employed in this trade was another of its peculiarities. It had been said that, de minimis non curat lex; but that maxim did not apply in this case; for the number of children for whose sake this measure was intended was very great. From the evidence of one of the opponents of the bill, in Manchester alone 11,600 children were employed in cotton factories.—It was objected to this bill, that it was an interference between parent and child, and affected free labour. But every parent told them, that he could not exercise a free discretion—that the only alternative he had, if he did not choose that his child should work the usual number of hours, was to remove it altogether, which he could not afford to do. The noble lord (Stanley) had approved of the apprentice bill; but the master was much less interested in protecting those who were to be protected by this bill than in the case of apprentices. In the case of an apprentice, if he overworked it, he had to maintain it for seven years; but here where the terms of the engagement were either daily or weekly, when the strength of a child began to fail, it could be replaced by another (Hear, hear). Mr. Lee, the partner of an hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Philips), observed in his evidence, that this bill would bear more hardly on the manufacturer in the country, than on him who resided in Manchester, because the latter was near the market of labour—that is, if the child should be overworked, the master had an opportunity of going to this market of labour (hear, hear, hear), and procuring a substitute for him. It was said, that the consequence of this bill would be to dispense with the labour of children. But if the supply of labour was so much greater than the demand, that proved to him that the interest of the master alone was not a sufficient security against the overworking of the child. It was said, that in cotton mills great improvements had lately taken place; this was an admission that greater abuses had formerly existed. If this bill were thrown out, what security had they that things would not return to their former state (hear)? Among the opponents of the bill was a gentleman of the name of Sandford. He had addressed a circular letter to the masters of the different manufactories in Manchester, to ascertain the number of hours of employment in each. This letter had produced returns from 44 factories. In one factory, the average number of hours was 12½ per day; in another 12 hours 50 minutes; in another 13 hours; in another 12¾; in another 13 hours. But this return assumed another colour, when they took the greatest number of hours any manufacturer employed his people. Out of these factories 28 stated, that the greatest number of hours their people were employed was 14. One company, Charles Richards and Co., employed them 15 hours. A manufactory which employed 600 people, of whom 246 were above 18, and 374 under 18 years of age, kept them, on an average, 12½ hours at work. Mr. Sandford calculated the whole children in cotton factories in Manchester at 11,600. Now, what must be the effects in one town alone where 12,000 children were on an average worked twelve hours a day? He knew that it was impossible to exempt them from the necessity of their condition, which subjected them to earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brow; but necessary as this was in the state and condition of society, it was incumbent on the legislature to see that tasks were not imposed on them which must inevitably impair their health, weaken their frames, and paralyse their future exertions. (Hear, hear.) A paper had been produced by Mr. Sandford, which was intended as conclusive evidence against the bill. This was a return of the number of children connected with the cotton trade, who attended a Sunday school. No part of the evidence had more disgusted him. The masters when asked what was the state of the school, answered, "the children of the cotton factories are in as good health as the other children, though they do not look as well." (Hear, hear.) It was also said, that "the children from the factories come to school as early as the other children, except in some of the evenings of the winter months." He was not insensible to the blessings of education; but after children had undergone 13 or 15 hours of bodily exertion, after excessive labour had drained from them every spring of action from which intellect or capacity could arise, was it not enough to fill the mind with disgust, to see them transferred to a writing master, to close the day? Education, which was intended to be the greatest of blessings, was thus converted into a curse. (Hear, hear.)—It was also to be considered, that if a child were employed fifteen hours in a factory, this was not the whole of its labour. None of them resided in the mill, but all lived at a greater or less distance from it; and they must add, therefore, to the hours of labour, the time taken in going to and coming from it, in all weathers and in all seasons. He called on the house to admit—for he required no evidence to prove—that it could not be requisite to the prosperity of this country, that such excessive labour should be exacted of 12,000 children in one town. An hon. gentleman smiled when he said that he required no evidence. But could no evidence be produced? Was there no evidence before the house? If evidence were required, he had only to refer to the petition which he had himself had the honour to present, signed by 30 medical gentlemen and 21 clergymen. The only answer that had been given to that evidence was, that one of the individuals was a most respectable person, but so guileless and good-natured, that he would sign any thing that was offered to him. But was that man really misled by excessive kindness, who could think it cruel and injurious to employ 12,000 young children for 15 hours every day? (Hear, hear.) But the noble lord had taken his principal stand on the impolicy of interfering with free labour, as it was called. He had admitted, indeed, that, during this session, the house had in one instance interfered with free labour. They had abolished the practice of employing children in chimney-sweeping. (Hear.) By that interference the house had, in fact, decided the principle of this bill. It had declared, that neither the interests of trade, nor the humanity of masters, were a sufficient security for the proper treatment of children. Oh! but, said the noble lord, here is the difference. The one bill abolished, the other only regulates. But surely, if it were fit to abolish in one case what was insufferable and pernicious, it was fit in another to regulate what was excessive and injurious. (Hear, hear.) Evidence had been adduced to prove, that long continued labour in cotton-mills was most salutary: according to that evidence, cotton-mills were among the most favoured spots on the face of the globe. (A laugh.) He should expect from the hon. members who gave this fascinating description of the health of children employed in cotton factories, an application to parliament to establish cotton-mills for the purpose of more effectually providing for the health of his Majesty's subjects. (Hear, hear.) Amongst the instances which had been produced of the healthiness of cotton-mills, was that of a mill belonging to an hon. gentleman opposite. It was given in evidence, that, in this mill, 873 children were employed in 1811, 871 in 1812, and 891 in 1813. Among the 873, there were only 3 deaths; among the 871, 2 deaths; among the 891, 2 deaths; being in the proportion of 1 death in 445 persons. When this statement was shewn to sir Gilbert Blane, he expressed his surprise, and observed, that if the fact were not stated by respectable persons, he should not believe it; and being asked why he distrusted it, he said, that the average number of deaths in England and Wales was one in fifty (in 1801 there had been 1 in 44.) There were favoured spots certainly, Cardigan, in which the deaths were as 1 in 74; Monmouth, in which they were 1 in 68; Cornwall, 1 in 62; and Gloucester, 1 in 61; yet in the cotton factories they were stated to be as 1 in 445! That elegant poet, Mr. Thomas Wharton, had addressed an Ode to Health. It began with these lines:—

"Within what mountain's craggy cell,
"Delights the goddess Health to dwell?"

After having described the different spots in which it might be supposed she would be found—"the tufted rocks" and "fringed declivities" of Matlock—the springs of Bath or Buxton—among woods and streams—or on the sea shore—he is at last unable to discover her, and anxiously inquires,

"In what dim and dark retreat,
"The coy Nymph fix'd her fav'rite seat?"

Now, what would have been the surprise of the poet, if he had been informed, that this dim retreat was the cotton-mill of Messrs. Finlay and Co. at Glasgow? (Much laughter and cheering.) The salubrity of this mill appeared to be six times as great as that of the most healthy part of the kingdom. This was the sort of evidence which had been brought to disprove the evidence of disinterested persons, of medical men, and even of persons who had an interest opposed to the measure before the house. The master cotton spinners of Ashton-under-Lyne, at a general meeting, had declared that it was highly necessary that the hours of working should be regulated, though they preferred twelve hours a day; they said, they were willing to confine themselves to that number of hours, but that others would not do it, and therefore they should be subjected to unfair disadvantages. The cotton spinners of Halifax had come to the same resolution. With all this evidence, and with a knowledge of the nature of the case, he was persuaded that the house would accede to the principle of confining the hours of labour in cotton-factories to eleven and a half. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Philips said, he felt much difficulty in contending against the humane and benevolent feelings of members, especially as they were raised to an unusual ardour by the speech of the right hon. gentleman, and by the means formerly used to excite and inflame prejudice on the subject. If cotton mills were such as they were represented, he should at once say, "Sweep them away altogether." He disclaimed any personal views or interested motives on this question. (Hear, hear.) Great pains had been taken to excite prejudice, and out of doors suspicion was at work on this subject. The manufacturers of cotton were objects of hostility to the manufacturers of piece-goods, who were desirous of reducing the productive power of cotton manufactories, in order to increase their own exports. Amongst cotton-spinners themselves, too, there were jealousies and divisions. Some employed children, others employed apprentices; among the latter, the hon. baronet, who brought forward the bill, had himself been. Those who employed apprentices were under the regulation of an act of parliament; and they, conceiving that they were thus disadvantageously situated, in comparison with those who employed free labour, wished to reduce the latter to their own condition. There was an impression created, too, that an act of parliament would reduce the hours of labour without reducing wages. It was necessary to mention these facts, to account for the petitions which had been presented in favour of the bill; and when it was also taken into account, how easy it was to procure signatures to any petition which purported to be for an increase of wages and a reduction in the hours of labour—how easy it was to procure signatures by private ex-parte representations, the petitions were not a matter of surprise. The advocates of the bill dealt in general assertions which it was difficult to disprove, but which had been uniformly disproved when they had been founded on tangible statements. It was said that children in cotton mills were inferior to other children—1. in education; 2. in morals; 3. in health. It had been proved in opposition to this, that the number of children employed in mills, who attended Sunday schools at Manchester, was equal to that of other children; that their morals were as good, and it would have been strange if habits of order, industry and regularity had produced immorality. As to their health, if the house, instead of looking to opinions without any facts stated in support of them, looked to the facts themselves, and to opinions founded on an examination of them, they would find that the statements respecting their health were as devoid of truth, as those respecting their education and morals. Dr. Henry, Dr. Broadsworth, and Dr. Symonds, had borne evidence, that in hospitals there was not 1 in 12 from the manufactories. Even in the female wards there was only 1 in 12. Mr. Ranson, an eminent surgeon, stated, that cases of white swelling and deformity were much more common to weavers than cotton-spinners, the latter being less exposed to changes of temperature. Mr. Morris, another eminent surgeon, had declared that, in the infirmary, cases from cotton factories were less numerous than from other trades. The right hon. gentleman's representations were very far from being all of them founded on fact. The surgeon of the Manchester workhouse had declared himself in favour of legislative interference before he had examined into facts; but he had after a minute examination confessed his error, and had proclaimed the balance to be in favour of the cotton-factories. Those who knew Manchester, knew how difficult it was to get the medical men there to agree in the same opinion. Their disagreement there was proverbial. (A laugh.) When he had mentioned to a friend Dr. Henry's opinion, the reply was, "You know that if Dr. Henry thinks one way, Dr.—— is sure to think another." (Hear, hear.) Many medical men, who had put their names to petitions, regretted that they had done so since they had made an accurate inspection: certificates, that the factories enjoyed good health, and were well ventilated, were signed by Drs. Henry and Hamilton, who had originally signed petitions for legislative interference. Medical men were now going through all the factories in Manchester, and all authorities were unvarying to shew, that the condition of the people in cotton-factories was better than in any other: this assertion was made on the most conscientious conviction. In other factories, the work and wages were irregular; in the cotton-factories both were uniform, and all were compelled to admit that the labour was light; they were therefore better clothed and better fed than others. The right hon. gentleman had expressed incredulity at the very small proportion of deaths in the factory at Glasgow; but the persons employed there were in the most healthy period of life, and, therefore, there was nothing incredible in the statement. Mr. Sandford's evidence had been referred to, but the most material fact stated by him had been omitted, viz. that when five hundred persons at a Sunday school had clubbed a certain sum for their support in case of sickness, the sum drawn out in the year by those employed in cotton-mills was 2*s.* 0½*d.* the sum drawn out by the others, 3*s.* 1*d.* for each. In one large factory, only 5*l.* had been received for poor-rates for the whole year; and in 1816, a year of the greatest distress, one factory had contributed 24*l.* to a soup society. The right hon. gentleman had complained, that the children were worse off and more under the control of their masters than apprentices; but that was not the case; they could now go home, and be attended to by their parents, an advantage which the proposed regulations would destroy. Taking children from their parents, and placing them under the control of others, had excited a great outcry in the discussion on the poor laws: it was equally impolitic in the present instance to attempt what never could and never ought to be effected. In a country like this, it was dangerous to violate the most perfect freedom of arrangement between wages and labour. It was not enough to act under the impulse of humane feelings alone. To real charity many things were essential, besides almsgiving, which, when indulged indiscriminately, provoked the very evils it wished to alleviate, and caused nothing but idleness and discontent. In the exchange between wages and labour, interference must have a most pernicious tendency. The effect of interfering on behalf of the Spitalfields weavers had been to establish that manufacture in Cheshire. In Cheshire they were now petitioning for the same interference, and the result would be, to drive the manufacture from Cheshire also. The labour of cotton-factories was nothing compared with the labour of other employments, and yet the others, with every exertion, were hardly able to procure a subsistence. Suppose in those cases any one were to say, "Take care of your health; you will hurt your constitution; you will bring on disease." Suppose a maximum of labour were fixed in other cases, the consequence would be, that the workmen would be starved into rebellion. The low rate at which we had been able to sell our manufactures on the continent, in consequence of the low rate of labour here, had depressed the continental manufactures, and raised the English much more than any interference could do; and if the legislature interfered now, they would repress the English, and raise the continental manufactures; but if our produce continued to sell on the continent, the increased demand must afford more employment and higher wages for our workmen here. The general hours of work now were from twelve to twelve and a half. The tendency of interference would be, first, to increase wages—workmen would do less and receive more; an increase of population would follow on this comparative case, and the increased competition for labour must in the end lower wages; while the temporary increase of price, consequent on a temporary increase of wages, would give the continental manufactories a start, by enabling them to sell at a lower price than ourselves, and thus by lessening our sale, lessen the demand for labour, while the demand for employment was increasing. Messrs. Lee and Holdsworth had reduced the hours of labour in their factories, and the people, instead of being better off, had been much worse off, and more discontented, and had withdrawn their subscription from the sick-fund. Here, then, the very experiment had been made which the house wished to attempt. An hon. baronet had said, that there were no petitions against the proceedings of 1802. But the factories of Manchester were as improved at that period as at the present day. And this improvement was not confined to one, but was common to all. Mr. Birley's factory was very well conducted, whatever might have been said of it, and none could be found in which disease was prevalent. There was also a strong fact to shew that the factories of Lancashire were not inferior to any others. By the returns to the committee on the poor laws, the number per cent. who received relief in Lancashire was less than in any other county, except Cumberland; the number was five for Cumberland, and five and a half for Lancashire. In Buckinghamshire thirteen, in Wales seven, &c. The amount too of relief per head was less in Lancashire than in any other county except Cumberland, 10*s.* in Lancashire, 9*s.* 9*d.* in Cumberland; and 20*s.* or 26*s.* in some other counties. These facts were incontrovertible, and the inference was, that the cotton spinners were well off. If the present principle of interference were to be applied, there was no manufacture or employment to which objections might not be made: the farmer was exposed to the inclemency of the seasons, and subject to chronic complaints. Mines were of all places the most notoriously unhealthy, especially lead mines. Potteries were far from being salubrious; and the Speaker himself, sitting in that chair, went through more labour, in a single session, calculated to impair his health, than the people in a well regulated factory endured for a whole year. Confinement, he would allow, must have an effect upon the complexion—it had in that house. They had not within their walls the ruddy complexion of the husbandman, except in a few instances. The temperature of factories, whatever had been said, need not in general be above 63. Some fine spinning, indeed, required 74; but not more than 700 people in the whole kingdom were employed at that temperature. However, nothing could be done by interference but mischief, and it was most dangerous to manufactures, by producing combinations among workmen. (Hear, hear.) Gentlemen might cry hear! but he should conceive it his duty on all occasions to speak against combinations so destructive to the happiness and morals, as well as the existence of the working classes, by being ruinous to our manufactures. A spirit of false honour was created which it was most difficult to cope with: the present bill held out a temptation to all such combinations by exciting petitions, and promising little work and high wages. But the house ought to know that these petitions were obtained by disorderly workmen meeting at public-houses, and forming themselves into central committees. The purpose of those who petitioned for the bill was to reduce the hours in order to increase the wages of labour. This, certainly, would be the first of its effects. But he besought the house to consider where they would stop if they interfered in the present instance. Every other class of manufacturers would come forward with their demands, and the regulation introduced in this case could not be refused in others. The principle now introduced would extend to all. There was no peculiarity in the case of the cotton-spinners that did not extend to other manufactories. The linen and the woollen manufactories would require a similar regulation. He had been in some woollen manufactories, and he found no other difference between them and those now under consideration, except that in the former a greater quantity of oil was used, and of course there was a much worse smell. With regard to the linen manufactories, there could be no reason why they should not be regulated as well as the cotton, except that in the latter case the yarn was exported, and in the former not, a distinction which might soon cease by such a violent interference with labour as the present bill would in principle authorize. Any person who considered the subject would see that the same abuses, if abuses existed, were to be found in all our manufactories, and, therefore, that they ought all to be regulated on the principle which would admit an interference with one.

Mr. W. Bootle wished to say only a few words. His attention had been long turned to the subject before the house, and he zealously supported the bill. The petitioners for its passing had great weight with him, and should have great influence on the house. Among them were found not only clergymen and physicians, but magistrates. The statements against the bill came from people whose interests were opposed to it, while those who supported it by their petitions and representations from without, could have no other interest to serve than that of humanity. The hon. gentleman spoke of the effect that the measure might have in increasing population, and creating paupers. This was an evil not to be dreaded, or, at least, was to be compensated by the good that it would produce. The 1800 petitioners who supported it were so disinterested as to give it their concurrence, though it might subject them, according to the views of the hon. gentleman, to an additional rate for the poor. Much had been said about the danger of interfering with labour as a general principle: but the house had already during this session interfered with labour in the case of the chimney-sweepers' bill, which had passed, as it were, by acclamation; and therefore it ought, in consistency, to sacrifice the objections which were brought from this source.

Mr. W. Smith said, that he did not wish to drive men to combinations, by refusing them a fair reward for their labour, and as great a reduction of that labour as was consistent with the due interest of the master. He agreed with his hon. friend in the great importance he attached to our cotton-manufactures, but did not think that he was right in his apprehensions of the injury which the present bill would produce with regard to them. He concurred with him, generally, on the impropriety of interfering with labour on indefinite grounds; but here was something tangible and definite, in regulating the age at which persons might enter the cotton-factories, and the number of hours which they should work each day. Into the consideration of what was the proper or the exact number of hours he would not now enter. He would put it generally, ought persons under the age of 12 to be employed from 13 hours and a half to 15 hours a day in a cotton-factory; and was it not injurious to their health and growth to be so employed? He did not object to the employment of children; but was it fitting that they should be confined to labour in a close manufactory, longer than adults in agricultural labour or in other healthy employments? His hon. friend had said, that the care of their children ought to be left to parents, who would not allow them to work longer than it was conducive to their welfare; but, in using such an argument, he had forgotten that the parents confessed their inability of themselves to limit the labour, by applying to the house in their petitions for the passing of the present bill. Much had been said of the means employed to procure these petitions, and of the representations put forth to influence the decisions of the house. But it ought to be recollected, that if representations were made on the one side, they were likewise made on the other, and that, too, by persons who had more weight than those unprotected individuals, and an apparently greater interest to stimulate their zeal. The evidence of physicians and others, who having no personal interest to serve, could not be supposed to have a wrong bias, was in favour of legislative interference. All the members of the faculty, from Machaon down to doctor Solomon, would be found to declare, that children of the age alluded to could not, without injury to their health, work so long in factories as children meant to be protected by the bill now did.

Mr. Finlay protested against the introduction of fresh evidence after the inquiry before the committee had closed. The right hon. gentleman had brought forward a most extraordinary witness—the goddess of health; but, unfortunately, she proved nothing in his favour; he had probably found that she could not reside in the factory with which the right hon. gentleman had been connected. He contended, that it was wholly inexpedient to legislate on a matter of this kind—the remedy was worse than the disease, for it would drive people from a healthy to an unhealthy employment. He regretted that the hours of labour were so long; but if they were shortened, as Mr. Owen had done, the superiority of British manufactures on the continent would be at an end. He cautioned the house against being run away with by a mistaken feeling of humanity, of which the statute-book afforded too many instances. In a great many cases the bill would compel the master-spinners to dismiss all persons between the ages of 9 and 16 years, and those poor children would be thrown upon the world without means of support, for no poor-rate could be competent to their maintenance. He insisted, that children employed in cotton-factories were more healthy than in many other employments, and referred to the evidence to shew that this was the uniform opinion of practical men: theoretical speculations were comparatively of little value. He put it to the house, whether, with the contradictory testimony before it, it was prepared to legislate upon the subject—to regulate free labour, and to interpose between father and child? He believed that the hon. baronet, the author of the bill, meant very well, but that he executed very ill; he found no fault with his motives, but with his measure; he had never heard of a bill so full of inhumanity and mischief, and should give it his utmost opposition.

Mr. J. Smith supported the measure, referring to the abolition of the slave trade, which, at first, by the planters, was called a measure of inhumanity and mischief, and yet was now admitted to be one of the greatest blessings that had ever flowed from parliament. He contended, that the important allegation in the petition of the workmen of Mr. Owen had not been contradicted, namely, that in the shorter time of work they were able to spin quite as much cotton as when they laboured a greater number of hours in the day. (Hear, hear.) In supporting the bill, he acted merely from motives of conscience and conviction, opposing the opinions of many most respectable individuals to whom he was under great obligations, and who had made many powerful representations to him.

Mr. Robinson admitted that the question was surrounded with difficulties. Although, generally, it was impolitic for the house to interfere in regulating matters of manufacture and commerce; yet there were cases which set all general rules at defiance. This was, perhaps, one of those cases, and the first doubt he had felt upon the subject was, whether it would not be necessary to carry the measure into other manufactures; but, upon this subject, the publications circulated with so much industry appeared fallacious. Before he made up his mind, he waited for this debate, and after a full and fair discussion he was decidedly in favour of the bill. (Hear.) One main fact operating upon his mind was, that in the cotton factories few men were found much beyond 40 years old, which shewed distinctly that the employment was such as to be injurious to health and longevity.

The house then divided:

Ayes, 91—Noes, 26.

The house accordingly went into a committee, but

Mr. Finlay protested against any farther proceeding upon the bill this night, after having been occupied in the discussion for so many hours, and expressed his resolution to avail himself of the forms of the house to give the bill every obstruction in his power.

Mr. Lambton observed, that the objection as to the discussion for a few hours, came with a very ill grace from those who were so indifferent about the laborious occupation of children for so many hours each day. (Hear, hear, hear.)—After some desultory conversation, it was agreed that the chairman should report progress and ask leave to sit again.

LOAN BILL.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the second reading of this bill.

Mr. Grenfell observed, that as he understood an agreement had been entered into between the right hon. gentleman and the Bank, by which the Bank were to receive 800*l.* upon each million of money deposited by the subscribers to the loan of 3,000,000*l.* and 400*l.* upon each million of exchequer-bills, he wished to give notice, if this information was correct, that he should oppose this arrangement as an extravagant grant, without any foundation in justice or equity, when the bill should come into the committee.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer agreed that the committee was the proper stage for entertaining that motion. It related to a distinct clause, which might, if it should be the pleasure of the house, be struck out, without prejudicing the other parts of the enactment.

Mr. Grenfell now wished to put a question to the right hon. gentleman on a point, with respect to which a great deal of doubt and some agitation had lately prevailed. It was desirable that it should be clearly understood, whether the subscribers to the loan would be at liberty to fund any part of their respective portions according to their own convenience or discretion, or whether no option was left but that of funding the whole, or none.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted that the question put to him by the hon. gentleman was perfectly clear and intelligible; and he felt happy, therefore, in being enabled to give him an immediate explanation. The provisions of the bill were certainly intended to secure to every subscriber the option of funding either the whole or a part of the proportional amount of exchequer-bills limited by the terms of the original contract.

Mr. Grenfell was anxious to obtain some information from the right hon. gentleman on another topic relative to the loan, upon which great uncertainty at present prevailed. The time was at hand for paying in 15 per cent. on the new stock, and he understood that the Bank refused to those who wished to transfer from the 3 per cents., the favour of so doing unless in their own names. Now, it was well known, that many eminent merchants, and other individuals, had large sums vested in the name of their bankers, and it was obvious, therefore, that this regulation on the part of the Bank, must be productive of much inconvenience. What he was desirous of ascertaining was, whether the right hon. gentleman intended to support the Bank in their adherence to this regulation?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that a complaint of this nature had reached him shortly before he entered the house. The rule adopted by the Bank was, to require either the actual signature of the proprietor, or a letter of attorney, to the exclusion of a mere representation of a third party. It appeared to him that this principle was quite regular, as the subject now presented itself, but it might be expedient in the committee to frame some provision with a view of meeting this difficulty.

The bill was then read a second time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, April 28.

WATER COMPANIES.] The Bishop of Chichester presented a petition of several of the vestrymen of the parishes of Saint Giles in the Fields and Saint George, Bloomsbury, in the county of Middlesex, setting forth, "That having long experienced the evils of a monopoly in the supply of water, the vestry and many other inhabitants of those parishes, did, in February, 1810, by petitions to the legislature, and otherwise, render all the assistance in their power towards establishing in their neighbourhood a competition in the supply of that necessary article; and that by an act of parliament soon afterwards passed, the company of proprietors of the West Middlesex Waterworks were authorized to extend their works so as to supply those parishes with water from the river Thames; that with the view of protecting the inhabitants of those parishes and the public from another monopoly and its injurious consequences, a clause was inserted in the said act, whereby the said company were restrained from selling or disposing of the privileges or powers thereby vested in them, and were only to take and demand such sums as should be reasonable for the water supplied under the provisions of the act; that, for the greater protection against fire, a clause was inserted in the said act, whereby the company are required to place upon every main-pipe in every square, street, and place, a fire-plug, and to deliver a key thereof at every house and place where any fire-engine shall be kept; that the competition thus established, however desirable in other respects, has, by repeated, and an almost general destruction of the pavements, for four years, been attended with much inconvenience to the public, and incalculable expenses to the inhabitants of those parishes, during which time a double line of iron pipes has been driven through the squares and principal streets, whereby the inhabitants thereof have, till within a few months last past, not only been served with a plentiful supply of water in any part of their respective houses at reasonable rates, but have also derived a double portion of protection against the ravages of fire; that in the year 1816 a bill was introduced for uniting the interests and concerns of the New River Company and of the said Company of Proprietors of the West Middlesex Waterworks, but the alarming tendency of such a monopoly being apparent, the bill was rejected; that it appears to the petitioners the said two powerful companies have, by private arrangement between themselves and another company, attempted to effect the purposes intended by the bill which was rejected; that the West Middlesex Company have totally withdrawn their supply from those parishes, and it is understood that the York Buildings company will, in a few weeks, also withdraw their supply, whereby the petitioners and the rest of the inhabitants of those parishes must (unless favoured by the aid and protection of the legislature) be supplied with water by the New River company only, in such manner and quantities only, and at such rents or rates, however exorbitant, as the said company shall, from time to time, think proper to demand; the petitioners, therefore, humbly pray that such protection and relief in the premises may be granted to them, as may seem meet."

The petition was laid on the table.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, April 28.

HIGH BAILIFF OF WESTMINSTER.] The High Bailiff of Westminster came to the bar, and presented an account of his emoluments, pursuant to an order of the house of the 16th of March.—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.] Mr. M. A. Taylor presented a report of the select committee on the administration of justice upon the Northern Circuit, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.—It was as follows:—

"The Select Committee appointed to consider whether any, and what steps may be necessary to be taken, to give to the Counties of Westmoreland, Cumberland, Northumberland, and Durham, and town and county of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, the same advantages of Assizes twice in each year, as are now possessed by all the other Counties in England and Wales, and to report their Observations thereupon to the House; and to whom the Petition of the Mayor, Sheriffs, Citizens, and Commonalty of the City of Norwich; and also the Returns of the Calendars of the Prisoners, and of the Lists of Causes tried at the Assizes for the Counties before-mentioned, were referred; have, pursuant to the Order of the House, considered the same accordingly; and have agreed to the following Report.

"Your committee, on referring to the different papers laid before them by order of the house, find, that, for several years past, persons charged in the four northern counties with offences, not ordinarily falling under the jurisdiction of the general quarter sessions, have continued in prison previous to their trial, for seven, eight, and nine months, and, in many instances, for a longer period of time; and they cannot but direct the immediate attention of the house to so great a failure in the administration of criminal justice.

"The return of causes of the respective counties, with the exception of that of Westmoreland, mark a large and progressive increase of civil business. In the marshal's paper at Carlisle, for the year 1814, no less than 80 records were delivered, of which four only appear to have been withdrawn; in the year 1815, 61 causes were entered; and the two successive years averaged not less than 50. At Durham, in the year 1816, they amounted to 51; and in 1817, to 54. Northumberland (including the jurisdiction of the town and county of Newcastle-upon-Tyne) furnished, in 1816, 42 causes; for five of these causes special juries had been summoned, three of them were made remanets, and consequently went over for 12 months; in the following year 32 actions were entered, only one of which was withdrawn. As the Returns themselves are in their nature too voluminous for publication, a short but accurate abstract is given in the appendix.

"Such being the actual state of business in these three counties, without a well grounded prospect of diminution, your committee cannot form to themselves any satisfactory reason why the trial of civil causes should be thus deferred within these districts, and the custom of holding only one assize in the year continued, subjecting the suitors to serious inconvenience, and, in some cases, to ruinous expense. The practice of bringing actions in other counties, now often resorted to, where they are transitory, compels the attendance of witnesses carried from a considerable distance, kept at the cost of the respective parties, and probably at last dismissed without a hearing.

"It is clear, from the evidence heard before your committee, as to the pressure of civil business at York, that it is now with difficulty gone through, though a greater number of days is allotted in the summer, than was usual in preceding years; and that, of late, two judges have presided in the spring circuit: it will be found, that at the close of the last commission at that place, six special and three common jury causes were made remanets, yet the court was occupied ten, twelve, or fourteen hours during the day.

"At Lancaster, to a most heavy calendar, are added in general not less than 180 causes, involving in them, as may naturally be imagined from the site and population of the palatinate, questions of the highest importance, as well on commercial as on other points.

"Looking, therefore, to all the circumstances which accompany this view of the subject, and considering it just, that these counties should not be deprived of those advantages which are possessed by all the counties within the United Empire, your committee beg leave to recommend, that such measures should be taken as would divide the present northern circuit into two separate circuits, the one comprehending the counties of Westmoreland, Lancaster, and Cumberland, and the other including those of York, Northumberland, and Durham. No objection could arise, under this arrangement, as to the attendance of an enlightened bar, for, with the proposed alteration, there would still remain to each of these divisions, as much, if not a larger extent of business, than is generally transacted upon every other circuit in England.

"To carry this plan into its full execution, and to give it that weight and authority, which interests of such moment demand, your committee are of opinion, that the duties which belong to it, should only be intrusted to established judges of the land: whether the present limited number of that highly respected body will permit such an addition of labour, must be left to the further deliberation of the house; that head of examination not falling, as your committee apprehended, within the precise limits of their instructions, they did not proceed to any regular course of inquiry which might embrace it, but in looking to the state of the new trials before the Court of King's Bench, as connected with the northern counties, it could not escape their observation, that those who now administer the justice of the country have difficulties imposed upon them, which, with all their zeal and activity, they are in some instances unable to surmount.

"Your committee, in adverting to the substance of a petition from the city of Norwich, which was referred to them by order of the house, are called upon to observe, that the inconvenience there sustained, from the delay of the trial of prisoners, appears to have been so great, that it would be highly expedient, for the sake of public justice, that some remedy should be applied to the evil; and that if it is the pleasure of the house to recommend, in whatever way they shall think best, an augmentation to the present number of the judges, such additional judges might be most usefully and beneficially employed in the respective courts in Westminster Hall, and in the regular tribunals of the country; by this means, an opportunity would be afforded of supplying the defect so loudly complained of on the Norfolk and Midland circuits, viz. of having only one judge on the Spring circuit to preside on the civil and criminal trials."

RIBBON WEAVERS.] A farther report of minutes of evidence, taken by the committee of ribbon weavers, was presented, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

OFFICERS WIDOWS' PENSIONS.] Mr. Lyttelton, in rising to submit his promised motion on this subject, observed, that he felt himself to be in a situation of considerable difficulty, in consequence of a late order containing a modification of the regulation which it was his object to have recalled; but he felt still, that the question stood not merely on grounds of generosity, but of strict justice to the army. He had, therefore, not thought it right to waive his intention of submitting a motion. If a system of rigid economy were proved to be necessary in all branches, he, for one, was very ready to agree to it; but if it went to shock the common feelings of the country, then, what was not absolutely necessary, was unjust. It was not the question, whether they were to be generous to the army, but whether government ought to keep faith with it. After 50 or 60 years, or perhaps near a century's practice, ought the terms with the army to be altered in a way most galling to the feelings of individuals? Was it not highly desirable that good faith should be kept? By the warrant which had been issued on this subject, it appeared, that any officer's wife who had become a widow since the 25th of December last, was not to receive the pension allowed her according to her husband's rank, if she possessed any annuity from government, or any other income equal to double the amount of such pension. A second order had been lately issued, confining the operation of the rule to cases where the income might be quadruple to the pension, and exempting from it the widows of all officers at present married. But this modification was by no means satisfactory. The total amount of widows' pensions, including Ireland, did not exceed 98,000*l.* and the sum allowed to each individual was comparatively insignificant. The widow of a general officer received 120*l.* a-year—the widow of a colonel 90*l.*—of a lieutenant-colonel 80*l.*—of a major 70*l.*—of a captain 50*l.*—of a first lieutenant 40*l.*—and of a second lieutenant or ensign 36*l.* Thus the widow of a general officer, if her income from other sources amounted to 480*l.* was to have the pension of 120*l.* denied her! It was notorious, in the present state of society, that the condition of a gentlewoman could not be maintained on so small a sum. It was with the noble lord (Palmerston), unquestionably, to offer his terms of service in future, as he might think fit, whether handsomely or unhandsomely, to the army. But he must decidedly object to any retrospective view of the subject. On that ground he objected to the application of the principle to unmarried men now in the army. He could mention specifically, that there was a stoppage fund in the artillery, which was supplied by officers, married or unmarried, for the widows of officers. In many regiments benefit societies had been formed to secure annuities to the widows of officers. From noble motives many officers made great sacrifices, by insurance of lives and other modes, to provide for widows. Many marriages and settlements had been made by officers on the principle of calculating on the widows' fund. If this fund were now to be reduced, people must say, "Good God! is it possible that it is the officers' widows' fund that government rely on for the retrenchment of expenditure? Is this to form the odious contrast between the way in which the civil servants of the crown, basking in court favour, are to be provided for, compared with the mode of provision for the defenceless widows of those brave officers who have fallen in their country's battles?" The reason originally assigned for this regulation, appeared to him to be no reason at all. There was no ground for it, unless it were preceded by other important regulations in the first instance. When it had been said, that the measure was recommended by the finance committee, he had desired the noble lord to make that assertion good by referring to the reports of the committee. The noble lord could not then, nor could he now, shew it. He (Mr. Lyttelton) did not think the subject was before the committee, when the report was drawn up. He had been told, indeed, that a very respectable member of the committee had put an extreme and almost imaginary case, as to the limitation of widows' pensions; as, for instance, in the case of the duchess-dowager of Northumberland claiming the pension of a general's widow. He expressed, not in a parliamentary sense, but his own individual opinion, that the committee proceeded on the purest motives; but it should not be forgotten that, like other committees, they were chiefly gentlemen in the interest of ministers. Tories they were, and Tories they would be after all; and it was not probable that they would take steps to affect their friends in office. At first, the committee attended to the great officers of state. But afterwards ministers neglected what the committee suggested in several points, and had gone to other matters under the heads of compassionate list, bounty warrants, and pensions for wounds. It might have been supposed that widows' pensions would have been brought into consideration; but they were not; therefore, he must suppose, that the committee had them not in their eye. There was, it was true, a kind of general promise of renewing the consideration of these subjects; for it was clear that the committee made no recommendation relative to widows' pensions. With respect to the great sinecures, let it be remembered, that ministers acted entirely on the prospective principle, and what are called "vested rights." The noble lord too, had agreed that, as to Chelsea-hospital, no steps should be taken to reduce the pension of any one at present in the army. The fact was, that the navy had long complained of the severity imposed by those limitations, and, therefore, the noble lord meditated, by the operation of this warrant, to equalize the two services! (Hear, hear.) The total amount of the money distributed in the exercise of this bounty was 98,000*l.*, the highest sum it had ever reached, at the period when our military establishments had been carried to an unexampled extent. It was impossible to estimate the amount of saving to be produced by this regulation at more than 20,000*l.* Was this a sufficient inducement for galling the feelings, or impairing the comforts, of so respectable and defenceless a class of persons? The noble lord, in his argument for economy, appeared to have entirely forgotten the recently proposed grants to the royal family, grants which had been so happily obstructed by the virtuous resistance of some Tory members in that house. It was forgotten that one of those additional grants exceeded the whole amount of the saving projected by the regulation of which he complained. No instance could be adduced from any of the civil departments to justify it; the principle had never been recognized except in the case of the navy, where it ought to have been abated instead of being extended to the military service. The effect of it must necessarily be to encourage improvidence; for it held out to the officer an assurance that if by frugality or industry he possessed himself of the means of providing in some degree for his widow and children, their claim on the public bounty must be surrendered. It operated therefore as a direct tax on morality, disinterestedness, and conjugal affection. The consequences to which it had a tendency to lead after the death of the officer also deserved consideration. The temptation to perjury and evasion was rendered very strong in the case of a helpless woman, incumbered, perhaps, with a large family, when by stating her actual means to be within the limitation prescribed, a pension might be obtained. It was scarcely necessary for him to say, that many instances of this nature were known to have occurred in the navy. He was not aware in what quarter this regulation had originated, but he did not believe it was either at the Horse-Guards or the War-office. He was sure that it could not have received the approbation of the deserving prince who at present presided over the interests of the army. It was not difficult to conceive that the opinion of that illustrious person might be opposed on such a subject by his Majesty's ministers, as a sort of proof how independent they were of royal influence. He doubted whether the noble lord, the secretary at war, had concurred in the propriety of its adoption; but, in other times, such a circumstance would have led to his resignation. The pretence of economy made but a bad appearance, when it was found that in no other respect was public economy consulted, and that no retrenchments were effected, where they were most loudly called for. He felt confident, that not only the feelings of the army, but the sense of the public was opposed to the regulation; with regard to which, therefore, he should accept no compromise, but move for its total and unconditional revocation. (Hear, hear.) He concluded with moving, "that an humble address be presented to his royal highness the Prince Regent, humbly setting forth, that this house, being informed that his royal highness has been advised to issue the following warrant, viz.—" George P. R.—By his royal highness the Prince Regent, in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty: whereas we have deemed it expedient to revise the rules and regulations under which pensions are now granted to the widows of commissioned officers of our land forces, and to confine such pensions to those applicants who shall appear, from the state of their pecuniary circumstances, to be proper objects of our royal bounty; it is our will and pleasure, and we do hereby order and direct, in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty, that no pension shall be hereafter granted to the widow of any commissioned officer of the land forces dying subsequently to the 25th of December last, who shall have any other pension from government, or whose annual income otherwise arising shall amount to double the rate of pension assigned to the rank of her deceased husband. Given at our court at Carlton House, this 17th day of February 1818, in the fifty-eighth year of his Majesty's reign. By command of his royal highness the Prince Regent, in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty. (Signed) Palmerston:"—" This house doth humbly represent to his royal highness, that the pensions heretofore regularly allowed to the widows of the officers of his Majesty's land forces, have never, within the memory of the oldest officer in his Majesty's service, been practically subject to any such conditions as those expressed in the said warrant, and have been relied upon accordingly by the said officers as a certain and unconditional provision for their widows; in consequence of which, many marriages have been contracted, and settlements made, in which the said pensions were calculated upon by all the parties concerned, which parties will be irremediably wronged, and several of them grievously distressed by the operation of the said warrant:—That the sale of commissions being officially permitted in the army, such transactions have been exceedingly numerous, in all of which the unconditional pensions have been taken into account, and it is morally impossible that the purchasers should ever be indemnified for the loss they will have sustained on the difference between the price given for their commissions, and their value as reduced by the said warrant:—That many officers have laid out considerable sums in life-insurances for the advantage of their widows; and that, likewise, in many corps, funds have been raised, by subscriptions among the officers thereof, for the purpose of securing to the widows of the officers of such corps certain small annuities, the benefit of which life-insurances and annuities will in many instances be wholly lost to the said widows if the warrant shall take effect:—And that this house, though deeply sensible of the necessity of curtailing the national expenses at the present crisis, is yet humbly of opinion, that unless all other means of retrenchment are totally exhausted, it is no less irreconcileable with the justice, than unworthy of the generosity and humanity of the state, to restrict, by any conditions whatever, grants of such small amount, to persons peculiarly helpless, which grants have been nobly and dearly earned by the valour and conduct of the leaders of his Majesty's intrepid and victorious troops:—That this house, therefore, doth humbly intreat his royal highness to cause the said warrant to be forthwith entirely revoked, cancelled, and annulled."

General Dalrymple seconded the motion, and traced the history of the bounty to officers' widows to the reign of Charles II. At that period 3000*l.* was devoted to that laudable purpose. He had conversed with officers who had been half a century in the service, and who declared that they had always understood the liberality of the country to extend to a provision for their widows. (Hear, hear.) It was for the house to judge whether so small a saving was worth the loss of those grateful feelings which the soldier was accustomed to entertain towards the country in whose service he was engaged. It should be recollected that officers of the army were obliged to pay large sums for their commissions, and in discharge of various necessary expenses; and that these commissions on their death became again the property of the public. The first regulation for interposing conditions to the receipt of widows' pensions was issued by a warrant of the crown during the reign of Queen Anne, in the year 1708. By that warrant, the applicants were required to make oath, that they had not a competency without them. This, however, was never acted upon, and probably the victory of Blenheim, and the general success of our arms, had inculcated a sentiment not very favourable to its strict enforcement. A subsequent warrant, somewhat more liberal in its tenour, was issued under George I. in the year 1717. It ordered, that the widows of officers should have no other provision but their pension in England or Ireland, but made no mention of a provision from their husbands. In point of fact, it had remained a dead letter, no widow having ever been called upon to give an account of her circumstances. It was not surprising, therefore, that the officers of the army should have relied on the continuance of the royal bounty under the circumstances of recent times. The new regulation was not thought of till after those splendid triumphs which had undoubtedly cost the country great sacrifices; but it appeared to him rather an injudicious and inadequate means of repairing them, by a saving extorted from the small allowance promised to the widows of those who had fallen in the contest. (Loud cries of hear.) He was fully sensible how necessary economy was in the present condition of the country; but he thought the present a vexatious test of it, when no similar limitations or exceptions were applied to other branches of the public service, whether the pensions had been earned or not. He entreated the house to consider the question upon its own merits, without reference to the case of the navy, and without entering into invidious comparisons. It was sufficient to observe, that in the one service commissions were purchased, and in the other they were not. It was remarkable that the finance committee had not recommended this regulation; the pensions of officers' widows were not even mentioned by them in their reports. He could not avoid thinking that, at the close of an arduous and successful war, the sovereign might have been spared the mortification of interfering with the liberality of his royal ancestors, sanctioned and supported as it had been by the annual grants of parliament. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. J. Smith observed, that if the officers of the royal and horse artillery contributed a portion of their pay to the formation of a widow's fund, it appeared to him that the late regulation could not easily be reconciled to the ordinary principles of justice. His attention had been directed for several years to the general condition and circumstances of officers' widows, who, he thought, had a peculiar claim upon the sympathy of the country, being in many instances women of rank and education. The considerations of a moral nature which had been alluded to were also deserving of attention.

Mr. F. Lewis rose for the purpose of explaining the part which the finance committee had taken with respect to this regulation. It certainly did not originate with them, but there had been much conversation in the committee about it. Their inquiries had led them to a knowledge of the extreme dissatisfaction which prevailed in the navy, as pensions were granted to their widows only where a specific case of necessity appeared; whereas, in the army, the applicant was not bound to shew that any necessity existed. The committee had, therefore, felt it proper that something should be done to remove the constant jealousy and heart-burning that prevailed between the two services; but they had left it to government to make any alteration that might be deemed just.

Lord Palmerston said, that the regulation was not to apply to the widow of any officer now married, so that there was no breach of faith. His hon. and gallant friend had shewn, that from the earliest times the widow had been obliged to prove that she had not a sufficient maintenance left her by her husband; and, therefore, the principle of exercising the royal discretion in granting pensions had always existed. With respect to the contributions to which the hon. member had alluded, they could in no case produce to the widow an annuity large enough to debar her from the receipt of her pension. One ground on which the issuing of the warrant had been recommended was, that it would be proper to equalize the two services. For that purpose, the regulations respecting the widows of officers in the navy were relaxed in order to place them on an equal footing with widows of officers in the army, and an order had been issued that very day limiting the amount of income. These regulations, he assured the house, gave no pleasure to those who had to enforce them. (Hear.) It was always a matter of painful duty for them to discharge. But the executive government were not to blame for any hardships that were supposed to exist on this subject. These were regulations for which the house must be responsible. (Hear, hear.) They were regulations which had been forced on the government by the language that had been held on the opposite side on the subject of military expenditure. (Loud cries of hear on the opposition benches.) The new regulation was in strict consonance with the spirit of the order of 1708; and, under all the circumstances of the case, he could not agree to the motion.

Colonel Stanhope said it would be more consonant to the character of a great nation, which had been so ably defended by her soldiers and seamen, to give the pension as a reward of past services, and not to make the widow come and plead in formâ pauperis. (Hear, hear.) If the widows knew that it was a national reward for services, they would receive half the amount with double satisfaction. He was pleading for both services. It must be supposed that he had some professional partialities: but still he must state his belief, that the navy was the right arm of the country. (Hear, hear.) The two services, he thought, could not be assimilated—they were totally of a different nature; in the army it was allowed to make purchases, but that was not the case in the navy. He perfectly agreed that economy was necessary; but it was also necessary to provide for the defence of the country, and it was due to our character and reputation to reward such services. Economy, no doubt, was highly desirable; but it was an economy that should diminish the luxuries of the great, and which never should contaminate itself with the crumbs that fall from the table of the poor. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Croker said, that originally, the fund out of which the widows of naval officers received their pensions was not furnished by the public, but was formed by contributions deducted from the pay of all classes of the navy. At present, indeed, of every hundred men on the books of the navy there were only ninety-nine effective seamen; the hundredth was a fictitious man, called the widow's man, the amount of whose pay went to the fund out of which the widow was paid her pension. An hon. member had made some observations on the word charity; but it must not be forgotten, that that was the word used in the charter of George I. The first limitation was, that no widow should receive a pension who had other means to the amount of the pension itself. Notwithstanding that limitation, the fund was so small, that, in several instances, it was unequal to the payment of the pensions in general. Similar regulations at that time attached to the army. All that the warrant stated in the army was, that the circumstances of the case should be inquired into. Formerly, the amount of the pension must be regulated by the fund. But, by Mr. Burke's bill, the fund was destroyed, and the pensions came to be charged on the navy estimates. He had always considered that the army had, of late years, stood in a very different situation from the navy; arising, principally, from the circumstance of purchases being allowed in the former. But the army stood in a much worse situation than the navy. When an officer of the navy died, whether he was at the time on full or on half-pay, his widow became entitled to a pension. That was not the case in the army; but, by a regulation in 1806, it was ordered, that the widows of officers who had served since 1793 should receive pensions, although their husbands had died while on half-pay. He believed that one half, if not three-fourths, of the officers of the navy married when they were on half-pay. The house would understand what an increase of pensions must arise in the navy on that account. Under these circumstances he entertained great doubt whether a real assimilation could exist between the two services. At the same time he was willing to admit, that it was a very complicated subject, and one which merited some inquiry; and he owned that he should be glad to see, either by the investigation of the finance committee, or some other means, what could be done in both services. (Hear, hear.) One of the most forcible arguments which he had heard was, that the army and navy were not in the same situation; the army paid for promotion; the navy did not pay for it. Now he thought there should be some inquiry, whether it should be abolished in both services, or in one service, or not at all. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Calcraft said, that he had now the honour to be a member of the finance committee; but not having been so formerly, he was no party to the measures which that committee had recommended, nor in any wise answerable for any omissions with which they might be charged. With respect to what had been said by the noble lord, that his side of the house was responsible for these regulations, because they had thought it their duty to press a saving in the department of the army, he felt it proper to say a few words. And first he would say, that he could not restrain the expression of his surprise at this declaration. The noble lord had stated, that they were amenable for a regulation of this sort, emanating from the Prince Regent, over which they had no control. Did the noble lord recollect, that they had ever recommended a niggardly provision for the wounded soldiers? (Hear, hear.) Would he point out in what speech delivered by him, or by any of his friends, it had been argued, that this was an item for economy? (Hear, hear.) So far from having at any time wished to recommend such paltry economy (for so it was), he had expressly declared, that a proper provision for the widows of our brave defenders was a fit object for the royal bounty, and a proper subject for the consideration of the legislature. But now, it seemed, that when the noble lord, and those around him, could not defend the necessity of maintaining so large a standing force, they came forward and said, that those on the other side were responsible for these retrenchments. The regulations in question were paltry and illiberal, and could not be defended. The army and navy were alike in nothing but in their glorious defence of the country, and we ought to act liberally to both of them. Parliament had the means of doing justice to both parties, and it was with this view that he, for one, had pressed upon the house the necessity of acting upon principles of economy. (Hear, hear.) Had not the officers in the army purchased their commissions on the faith of these allowances? He should be sorry, after the very able manner in which this question had been opened to the house, and the ability with which it was supported, to trouble them with any further observations; there could be no argument against the motion—it rested on the purest principles. He would state, however, that he was much surprised to hear, that the country could not support the charge of these allowances? But who were the persons that made that assertion? They were those—and the country would not fail to notice it—that thought 50,000*l.* or 100,000*l.* a-year, if given to the princes, was not more than the resources of the nation could provide; but who now maintained, that 20,000*l.* a-year could not be afforded to the widows of those brave and gallant heroes who had fought for our protection, and whose valour, as ministers themselves had frequently boasted, had secured the independence and tranquillity of Europe. (Loud cheering.)

Mr. Wilberforce could not help encouraging the hope, that the noble lord would find himself compelled to accede to the motion. He thought that the noble lord, in referring to economy, had made a most unjust, unwise, and uncandid application. (Hear, hear, hear.) We ought to encourage every thing in our army that might tend to counteract that which was too natural to a military man—namely, to consider himself merely a soldier, which too frequently produced dissolute conduct. He wished, that we should enable him to cultivate the private virtues of society, and enable him to act as becomes a father and a man. (Hear, hear.) Distinctions had been made between the army and the navy. For his part, he should like to shew a constitutional jealousy of both services; but still he considered that we were most indebted to our navy for protection. But both were entitled to our gratitude and support; and, therefore, he could not but hope, that the noble secretary, would, instead of looking whether there was any difference between them, accede to such measures as would tend to reward their services and exertions. We should give them as much as we could afford to give, and he firmly believed, that the resources of the country were adequate to the accomplishment of the measure now under consideration. (Hear, hear.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that what had taken place with regard to these pensions was one of those regulations which formed part of a great system of economy recommended by parliament. (Hear, hear.) The house, he thought, would be aware of the arrangements of the army and navy having been the subject of annual complaint and annual discussion, and of what importance it was to be completely satisfied of the precise difference between those bodies, which, in their respective situations, had so well fulfilled their duty to their country. The grants to widows were originally eleemosynary. They stood upon no grounds of right whatever. They proceeded from compassion, and were given as relief to distress. It had now been considered expedient, with a view to economy, to impose some restrictions; but if it should be the disposition of parliament to adopt a more liberal line of conduct, he was sure he might answer on the part of the ministers of the crown, that they would be willing to do every thing in their power towards that object. At the same time, he could not avoid mentioning the inconvenience of taking from the crown the discretion it exercised on subjects relating to the army. The address appeared to him to be of too peremptory a nature, and would appear to dictate too much. As far as he could collect, there seemed to be a strong feeling in the house, in favour of rescinding the present resolution, and with a view to affect that object, he recommended the hon. gentleman to withdraw his motion. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Lyttelton said, he had never heard the right hon. gentleman utter any thing that had given him so much pleasure as the few words which had just fallen from him; and, in consideration of that pleasure, he should forbear from commenting on some observations that had been made in the course of the debate. The subject of his motion he considered the just claim of the army. He was most anxious that economy should be fairly exercised; but after what had passed, he should be sorry to introduce any thing that might appear like harshness or opposition, and, therefore, he was willing to withdraw his motion, or to qualify it in any way that might seem most consistent with propriety.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he thought that the measure would come with a better grace from the crown.

Mr. Lyttelton said, that if the right hon. gentleman would engage to advise the crown to rescind the regulation, he would withdraw his address. (Hear.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought that, by what he had said, he had engaged himself to represent what he understood to be the sense of the house. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Lyttelton then, with the leave of the house, withdrew his motion.

Building of Churches Bill.] On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the house went into a committee on this bill.

After a minute discussion of several of the clauses, the house resumed, the chairman reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Cotton Factories Bill.] The house resolved itself into a committee on this bill.

On the clause that the operation of this bill should commence four months after the 1st of September next, or on the 1st of January, an amendment was proposed, extending the time to eight months.

Mr. W. Smith objected to the amendment. By such changes the effect of the bill might be entirely frittered away. For the advantage, and by the interference of the opposers of the bill, the hours of labour, at first proposed to be ten, were increased to eleven; and now eight months were required instead of four by the manufacturers, to prepare for the commencement of the operation of the bill. He strongly objected to such an extensive acquiescence with the wishes of those who had not only opposed parts of the measure, but the very principle on which it proceeded, and who, when they could not carry their point, exacted all that they could hope to succeed in attaining.

Mr. Peel did not see that the amendment was so unreasonable as it had been represented, especially when it was considered that the bill was likely to pass at a much later period of the session than had been at first contemplated. He thought eight months not too long for the manufacturers to alter their system of labour. There was another reason for the extension of the time. It was understood that the bill affected differently factories worked by water, and factories moved by steam. This time might be employed by those who used water to erect engines, as the latter would not suffer so much from the bill as the former.

Mr. W. Smith suggested that this argument in favour of the amendment might be obviated by allowing only four months from the 1st of September next, for the factories driven by steam to prepare for the operation of the bill, and a further extension of 4 months for those driven by water.

Mr. Gordon concurred in the amendment, both because it was not unreasonable in itself, and because an agreement was a symptom of conciliation between the supporters and the opponents of the bill, the latter consenting on this condition not to urge their objections to the principle.

It was then agreed to, that the operation of the bill should not commence till the 1st day of January 1819.

The next clause was, that no child should be employed under the age of nine years.

On which Mr. W. Smith proposed an amendment, to make the age ten years.

The house divided—

For the original clause 28
For the amendment 11

It was next agreed that no person under sixteen years of age should be employed in cotton-factories for more than eleven hours in a day.

The other clauses were then agreed to, the house resumed, and the report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

PARDONS UNDER THE GREAT SEAL BILL.] This bill was reported, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, April 29.

OFFICERS' WIDOWS PENSIONS.] The Marquis of Lansdowne, in rising to move that certain papers presented to their lordships respecting the pensions of widows of officers should be printed, stated, that it was not his intention to take any farther steps on the subject, in consequence of what had occurred out of the house. He had learned with great satisfaction, that the intention of abridging those pensions had been abandoned, and that it was intended to continue the allowances free from all deductions, which, if they had been made, would have had the appearance of an unworthy niggardliness, and have been quite contrary to their lordships' usual strain of feeling. He hoped that the pensions to the widows of naval officers would be put on the same footing as those of the widows of officers of the army; and wished to know, whether the widows of naval officers, on the compassionate list, were still obliged, on receiving their pensions, to make an affidavit that they continued single, which was a great hardship, and ought to be removed. He mentioned this, because he thought it might have escaped their lordships' notice: though, if the practice were to be altered, he should rather the amendment came from the side of government than any other quarter.

The Earl of Liverpool replied, that the subject would be considered with a view to further the wish expressed by the noble marquis. Whatever his individual opinion might be, as to granting pensions where the widow possessed other property, there could be no possible principle under which the navy ought to be on a different footing from the army. The purchase of commissions in the army ought not to make any difference; for that was not a tax but a boon, and was no argument whatever for establishing a difference between the pensions.

The Earl of Rosslyn expressed his desire that the regulations of the two services in this respect should be alike, especially as the officers of the navy made contributions out of their pay.

Lord Melville stated, that the contribution out of the pay of the navy did not bear any proportion to the value of the widows' pensions; the contribution was about 3*l.* per annum, for what at the insurance-office would cost 40*l.* However, this did not affect the merits of the case, and the pensions in the navy ought certainly to be on the same footing as those of the army. Such was already the case with the marines.

The Marquis of Lansdowne stated, that in the navy the unmarried officers all contributed. He was glad of the agreement on the other side, and should have moved for a return of the affidavit made by widows, if the concessions made by ministers had not rendered it unnecessary.

The papers were ordered to be printed, and the house adjourned till Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, April 29.

COPYRIGHT BILL.] Sir Samuel Romilly presented a petition of Archibald Constable and Robert Cadell, of Edinburgh, in favour of this bill.—Referred to the select committee on copyright acts.

IRISH GRAND JURY PRESENTMENTS.] Mr. C. Butler moved for leave to bring in a bill for the more deliberate investigation of grand jury presentments in Ireland. He stated, that, in making this motion, it was not his meaning to interfere with any measure which it might be the intention of a right hon. gentleman then absent (Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald) to introduce, but merely to render it necessary that the house should consider some measure of this description during the present session.

After a few words from Mr. Cooper, Sir J. Newport, Mr. Croker, Sir F. Flood, Sir C. Monk, Mr. Parnell, and Mr. Chichester, who severally recommended that some measure should be adopted on this subject, leave was given to bring in the bill.

JOURNALS OF THE HOUSE.] On the motion of Mr. Bathurst, a select committee was appointed "to consider of the imperfect state of the General Index to the Printed Journals of this House, and to report their observations thereupon, together with their opinion as to the rate of remuneration for completing the same."

LOAN BILL.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the order of the day for the house resolving itself into a committee on this bill.

Mr. Grenfell was anxious to take this opportunity of declaring, that, after all the consideration he had been able to apply to the financial arrangements contemplated by this measure, his opinion had undergone no alteration. It certainly furnished him with no reason for complimenting the right hon. gentleman on the felicity of his late efforts. His principal object, however, in now rising was to give notice of his intention to move in the committee, to expunge the whole of that clause which allowed to the Bank a fee of 20*d.* per 100*l.* on the loan of 3,000,000*l.* subscribed in money, and 10*d.* per cent. on exchequer-bills funded, conformably to the provisions of this bill. He was prepared to contend, that no adequate service was performed by the Bank that could entitle them to such an allowance for their trouble in the management of these transactions. This was his opinion, even without reference to the amount of their gains in other respects, arising from their dealings with the public. He had flattered himself, that the entire subject of the accounts existing between the public and the Bank would have been investigated by the finance committee, and that some important recommendations would have resulted from their labours. Since this was not the case, he felt it incumbent on himself to embrace every opportunity of taking up the question, as it were by piecemeal, and of suggesting such variations as appeared to him to be expedient, in the measures that were successively introduced as connected with this subject.

Mr. J. P. Grant observed, that as the present was probably the only occasion that would present itself of entering into the general merits of the right hon. gentleman's plan of finance, he would shortly state his objections to some of its details. He must at the same time express his surprise at finding that the right hon. gentleman was, for the fourth time since the conclusion of peace, about to borrow to an immense amount, in order to carry on the service of the year. By the present plan, a sum of 14,000,000*l.* was to be raised by loan; the whole revenue, after discharging incumbrances, not exceeding 6,700,000*l.*, or about a third of the whole expense of our establishments. The means by which the sum was raised consisted in the prolongation of the excise war-duties, annual taxes, and the lottery. This, then, was the extent of the actual resources of the country; and yet the right hon. gentleman had not thought proper to state any thing to the house with regard to the measures he contemplated in future, or as to the prospect of our being under the necessity of still proceeding in the same course. The only means upon which the right hon. gentleman seemed to rely for discharging the interest of these new loans, was by diverting to that purpose the proceeds of the sinking-fund. He could not conceive what was the use of keeping up a fund of redemption, when a larger sum was annually added to the debt than the amount reduced by its operation. If an individual were thus to act in the management of his private affairs, his conduct would be considered as little less than insane. If he redeemed as many annuities as he granted, and the amount was thus fairly balanced, still he would be at the expense of paying for agency. Of this new loan of 14,000,000*l.* the right hon. gentleman had not informed the house how the sum of 11,000,000*l.* was to be raised; but he presumed it was by a new issue of exchequer-bills. Thus, then, we had a loan of 3,000,000*l.* subscribed in money, credit taken for 11,000,000*l.* in exchequer-bills, and the interest upon both to be supplied from the sinking-fund, that interest being considerably higher than the market rate. What could be the object of all this complicated machinery, except to throw a veil, and a very thin veil it was, over the real situation of the country? In his opinion, the best way of meeting the danger was, to expose it fairly; not for the purpose of inspiring fear, but of imparting confidence. He thought it necessary to offer these few remarks, because the right hon. gentleman held out no prospect to the country of any improvement in its financial circumstances, or of the future adoption of sounder principles of policy.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, it appeared to him, that the objections of the hon. and learned member to the mode of raising the supplies for the public service, during the last three or four years, resolved themselves into a disapprobation of the increase of funded debt: but it was to be recollected, that the house had rejected one plan of finance which he had submitted for the purpose of preventing this evil, and he knew of only two modes of providing the requisite supplies—borrowing and direct taxation. During the last three years there had been an increase of the unfunded debt to the amount of 18,000,000*l.*; but, within the same period, there had been cancelled a sum of 15,000,000*l.* of capital debt, and considering the difference of the money price of stocks since that time, and taking every thing into account, it would be found at the end of the year, that there was a saving to the nation of 40,000,000*l.* In the case of a private gentleman, therefore, who added 10,000*l.* a-year to his debts, for three years successively, and in the same period redeemed 60,000*l.*, he did not think it could be said that there was any unprosperous course of proceeding. By the present plan, although a fresh issue of exchequer-bills would be thrown into circulation, a very large amount would be withdrawn, and converted into stock. At the end of the year he calculated that the result of the accounts would shew a reduction of the funded debt to the extent of 15,000,000*l.*, and of the unfunded, to that of all the addition which it was now receiving.

The house then went into a committee on the bill, and the Chairman put the question on the clause respecting the allowance to the Bank for management.

Mr. Grenfell rose to move the omission of this clause. He thought it right to preface his amendment, by acquainting the house with the exact nature of the service for which remuneration was to be granted. It consisted simply in this: the Bank received the deposit of the subscribers to the new stock, for which they gave receipts, which receipts they afterwards inscribed into the books of the new stock. They also took the trouble of calculating the discount on early payments, and this was the whole of the service rendered to the public, for which they were to be recompensed by a fee amounting to 800*l*. on every million of money subscribed, and 400*l*. on every million of exchequer-bills funded. Now, when the committee adverted to the enormous profits derived by the Bank from the public balances deposited in their hands, and recollected the very high rate at which they were paid for managing the public debt, he thought they would agree with him, that the Bank might have been reasonably expected to perform this service for nothing. He held in his hand a statement of the amount of fees received by them, upon the different loans contracted for during the last 17 years of the war, and the committee would be astonished to learn that it was no less than 324,000*l*. paid out of the national purse for this trifling and insignificant service. (Hear.) He stated this in the presence of an hon. director, who would correct him if he should be mistaken in his representation. One observation or two he must now make with regard to the wording of this clause. The fee in question, he had reason to believe, was originally given to the chief clerk or accountant, as a compensation for his private trouble. This, however, was when loans were comparatively small; for, as they began to swell in amount, the Bank seemed to think it was better to put it into their own pockets. He must on this occasion repeat what he had before frequently stated, that the only advantageous or effectual mode of investigating the transactions between the public and the Bank, was by directing the inquiries of the finance committee to this subject. He had always understood that the object of appointing that committee was the examination of every branch of the public expenditure. (Hear, hear.) What had fallen from different members of that committee had also justified him in expecting that their attention would have been directed to that now under consideration. He should, therefore, on an early day, endeavour to persuade the house to appoint another committee for this specific purpose. The total amount of the charge for managing the present loan was 13,200*l*. a part of which, as he had already stated, applied to the deposit of exchequer-bills, this being the very first time that any charge of this nature had been made. What was the motive or the ground for now making it he could not conceive, but he thought it his duty to move for the omission of the entire clause.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that he entirely agreed with the hon. gentleman in thinking that the accounts between the government and the Bank formed a very proper subject for the investigation of the finance committee. The inquiry had been delayed only in consequence of certain arrangements, with the progress of which it would have interfered. He could not consider the objections of the hon. gentleman, with respect to the clause in question, well founded, or justly applicable to a charge which had been uniformly made almost from the period of the revolution. Allowances had been always paid for the management of public loans; and had been larger when they were conducted by the South Sea Company. The Bank did not merely act as receivers for the public, but as judges of the accuracy of the whole transaction. He objected, therefore, to the amendment, on the ground of immemorial usage, and as not preceded by any formal inquiry or recommendation. It was true, in ordinary cases, that no allowance had been paid on exchequer-bills, because they were always carried to the exchequer-bill office for the purpose of being funded, and the Bank had no concern in the transaction. The present plan consisted of a complicated system for the creation of a new stock, by means of funding exchequer-bills. The trouble and responsibility on the part of the Bank were much increased by the nature of this operation. In addition to all the care required in the management of an ordinary loan, they had to keep the accounts of the new stock, imposing upon them a considerable immediate and annual expense in the opening of a new office, and the employment of an additional number of clerks. The allowance might have been enlarged by applying the same measure to the whole of the new stock, but to this he had objected, and the sum payable on exchequer-bills was only one half of what was payable on the loan of 3,000,000*l*.

Sir J. Newport complained, that the effect of this complicated arrangement was to prevent competition, and to throw the whole transaction into the hands of jobbers. The right hon. gentleman, he was convinced, might, by an open loan, have made a much better bargain for the country. As it had been conducted, he had been obliged to alter and modify his terms, according to the dictation of the Stock-Exchange.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that whether a more open loan would have been better or not in some respects, the charge in that case for management would have been considerably greater. With regard to the right hon. baronet's observations on the subject of the jobbers of the Stock-Exchange, and the influence exercised by them on the conditions of the loan, he could fairly state that there never was an operation of this nature effected more completely in defiance of their endeavours. (Hear, hear.) He did not wish to speak injuriously, but the whole difficulty which had been experienced proceeded from the machinations of that class of persons. The modifications which had been introduced into the original proposals had not increased the charge to the public a single shilling; on the contrary, they had caused upon the whole transaction some diminution of incidental expense.

Mr. J. P. Grant asked, whether the whole expense attending an open loan would not have been less than what was incurred by the present complicated plan?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not believe it would have been possible to have negotiated an open loan, without a considerable augmentation of the whole charge.

Mr. Grenfell observed, that the right hon. gentleman had stated, that this was a charge established by immemorial usage. Now, if this charge were founded on any thing like equity or justice, let it remain: but if antiquity only could be urged in its favour, he, for one, should object to it. Did not the right hon. gentleman know, that at the rate of 34 millions, there would be a permanent charge of 10,000*l.* per annum on the country? This was a charge contrary to every principle of justice, moderation, and equity; nay, he would say, that it was strongly indicative of that rapacity which had long characterized the whole of the transactions of the Bank. The term 'rapacity' might appear harsh to some, but it was an expression which he had borrowed from a lamented friend, a great ornament of that house (Mr. Horner), and he could use no other word on this occasion. (Hear.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the hon. member had fallen into an error. He had stated, that the charge to the country would be 10,000*l.* per annum; but, as 27,000,000 of stock would be cancelled, on which the Bank would lose their charge, the increase would be only 2,000*l.*

Mr. Grenfell said, he did not understand this argument. It was true, that 27,000,000 of 3 per cents. would be converted into 27,000,000 of 3½ per cents., on which there would be no charge; but, then, there was to be funded 27,000,000 of exchequer-bills, which were equal to 34,000,000 of stock; and calculating them at 300*l.* a million, it was evident that the Bank must receive something like 10,000*l.* (Hear, hear.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer rather believed that he was wrong in his former statement. (Hear, hear.) He had mistaken the 27,000,000 of exchequer-bills for stock. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Bankes entirely agreed with his hon. friend that the allowances made to the Bank ought to be investigated, and more particularly the commission to be granted them in the present instance; but he did not think that the finance committee possessed sufficient powers for that purpose.

The committee then divided on the clause:—

Ayes, 46—Noes, 31.

Mr. Grenfell then moved, that the chairman should leave the chair, and report progress.

The committee divided:—

Ayes, 25—Noes, 44.

The other clauses were then gone through, the house resumed, and the report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

REWARDS ON CONVICTION BILL.] Mr. Bennet moved, that the house should resolve itself into a committee of the whole house on this bill.

Mr. Speaker having left the chair, the several clauses were gone through.

The house resumed, the report was received, and ordered to be taken into further consideration on Monday next.

PARDONS UNDER THE GREAT SEAL BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

COTTON FACTORIES BILL.] The report of this bill was received, and the bill ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, April 30.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (SCOTLAND) BILL.] Sir G. Clerk presented a petition of commissioners of supply of Edinburgh against this bill.

The Lord-Advocate said, that Scotland was much indebted to the noble lord who had taken so much pains in bringing in the bill, against which, he believed, much unnecessary clamour had been excited. He had no objection to postpone the consideration of it.

Lord A. Hamilton said, that the sense of the country in Scotland was never more clearly expressed than it was against this measure.

Lord Binning said, that when the bill came to the second reading, he should endeavour to explain his views more fully: but he must deny the assertion of the noble lord, as to the general opposition to the measure in Scotland. He would admit that a prejudice had prevailed against it to a considerable degree; but there was a growing feeling in favour of some measure on this important subject.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT (SCOTLAND).] Mr. Finlay rose to move for a return of the number of prisoners confined for small debts in the several prisons of Scotland. He stated, that, in Glasgow alone there were last year 93 persons confined for sums under one pound. It was easy to conceive what misery and distress this must occasion. The associations unavoidable by such imprisonments produced the greatest evils to the individuals. The whole number of persons thus confined in all the prisons of Scotland amounted, he had reason to believe, to several hundreds, and those confined for sums under 5*l.* amounted to some thousands. They were not entitled to any allowance until ten days after their committal, and then each prisoner received only 4*d.* per day. Yet the creditor could not commit one of them, without expending 10*s.* nor could the debtor be released without paying 6*s*. He was unwilling to trespass on the time of the house, and admitted that there were difficulties in the way of a complete remedy. But the knowledge and wisdom of learned gentlemen might arrive at the desired object. He should conclude by moving for the following accounts. 1. "Shewing the number of persons imprisoned in the different prisons in Scotland during three years preceding the 31st December 1817, for debts not exceeding one pound. 2. Of persons so imprisoned for debts exceeding one pound and under three pounds, also above three pounds and not exceeding five pounds; distinguishing the number in each class so confined for any period exceeding one month, three months, and six months, respectively. 3. Shewing when the prisoners became entitled to their legal aliment, together with the amount thereof in the highest and lowest cases."

Mr. M. A. Taylor said, that some years back a similar inconvenience existed in this country. Persons imprisoned under decrees of courts of conscience had remained in confinement for many months. Having turned his attention to that subject, he had the honour to propose an act to the house, which was afterwards passed, to afford relief, and he begged to recommend its provisions to the notice of the hon. member.

Mr. W. Smith hoped that gentlemen would turn their attention to subjects of this nature. If there was any general defect in the system of our laws, he thought it would appear to exist in a kind of exclusive regard to property, rather than to life and liberty. He wished the latter to be more fully considered.

The accounts were ordered.

COUNTRY BANK-NOTES BILL.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer rose for the purpose of calling the attention of the house to the subject of a notice which stood at present for Monday next. As it was not his intention to carry that notice into effect, it might be most convenient to move at once that the order be discharged. He alluded to the order for the first reading of the bill for better regulating the circulation of country bank-notes. (Hear, hear, from the opposition.) He was the more desirous of making a timely intimation of the intentions of government to postpone this measure, as he had already laid before the house the views and opinions which had induced them to entertain it. It was proper at the same time to state, that it was only abandoned for the present, from a belief that some modifications were necessary, and in the apprehension that the discussions to which it might give rise could not be brought to a close during the present session. (Hear.)

Sir M. W. Ridley congratulated the house on the determination of his Majesty's ministers to relinquish this measure for the present. He entreated the right hon. gentleman, however, if he valued the tranquillity of the country, not to leave the smallest ground for raising an expectation that a similar measure would be brought forward at any other period. It was of the highest importance to quiet the alarm which prevailed.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that he had already announced his intention of introducing some similar measure, at a future period.

Mr. Tierney wished distinctly to understand whether the measure was postponed, merely from a consideration of time, and because it could not be thoroughly discussed during the present session. The house had been put in a certain degree in possession of the right hon. gentleman's plan; but another meeting having taken place at his house, between himself and those immediately interested in it, it was withdrawn, for no better reason that he could conceive, than that it would offend many, and prejudice a particular cause, at the next general election. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh deprecated the practice of assigning motives, according to the fancy of any honourable member, upon the introduction or postponement of important public measures. He could not admit the propriety of such observations, and much less the justice or fairness of putting the least charitable construction on every proceeding of the government. If the right hon. gentleman really thought such a practice calculated to produce an effect, it would be wise in him not to exercise it so frequently.

Mr. Brougham trusted that the country bankers would fairly understand how their interests were affected by the present situation of this question. It had been distinctly acknowledged that the principle of the measure was not abandoned, but was to be again brought forward in a shape somewhat different. He entertained not the smallest doubt that a similar measure would be introduced after the next election, and when circumstances would be more favourable to its success.

Sir J. Graham was glad to hear that the measure was to be postponed, although his satisfaction was much diminished by the probability of its revival the next session. He believed its tendency to be very injurious to credit, and to the means of securing the regular payment of taxes. He had conversed with many enlightened persons on this subject, and he had not met with one who did not express his disapprobation of it. It had already materially shaken confidence in the country, and caused a considerable run on several banks. He had no interest in any country bank, but he entertained a most unfavourable opinion of the measure, and wished to hear that it was entirely relinquished.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that he should not fail to take the earliest opportunity of informing the house what were the ultimate intentions of his Majesty's government in reference to this subject.

Mr. Calcraft said, he understood that the country bankers at a meeting, at lord Liverpool's yesterday, had fairly stated, that their objections were to the principle of the bill, and that no time or modifications would reconcile them to it.

Sir M. W. Ridley said, that as he was one of the few members of the house who had been present at the meeting between the right hon. gentleman and the country bankers, he felt it right to state, that the utmost attention was paid to their representations, and every disposition shewn to inquire fully into the merits of the question. But there was not one individual banker present, who did not protest against the principle, as inconsistent both with their interest and their character.

Mr. Lyttelton bore similar testimony to the dissatisfaction and alarm which the introduction of this measure had excited among the bankers in that part of Worcestershire with which he was chiefly connected. He had received the strongest remonstrances against its progress through the house, and doubted not that this was the case with many hon. members. It was desirable that facts of this nature should be stated, that the right hon. gentleman might perfectly know the sentiment universally entertained respecting designs which he had so imperfectly communicated.

Mr. F. Douglas observed, that, in future, when the right hon. gentleman had a measure to introduce affecting the interests of a large body of individuals, it would be as well to consult them previously, instead of taking that step after he had announced his measure, and yielding after he had tried the temper of the house.

Mr. Tierney observed, that the house was not fairly treated, by being left in ignorance of the reasons that had induced the right hon. gentleman to withdraw a measure which he had previously introduced to their consideration. The right hon. gentleman had since communicated with persons engaged in the trade to which his new regulations were intended to apply; but of what passed on that occasion the house knew nothing. It was possible that he (Mr. Tierney) might be friendly to the plan, and that the objections of the country bankers were founded only on their private interests or convenience. As the matter now stood, the circulation of country paper must be conducted under a full assurance that a similar measure would be brought forward at some future time. The bankers must feel a sort of horror at this state of alarm and apprehension, which would necessarily leave them without any means of knowing how to regulate their issues or their payments. When he coupled this consideration with that of the general state of the currency, the proposed postponement appeared to him to be one of the most mischievous conceits that ever entered the head of a Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer believed this to be the first time that any member of the house had been called on to state his reasons for postponing or withdrawing any measure of which he had merely given notice, or which he had obtained leave to introduce. He was ready to admit that many arguments had been urged at the meeting alluded to against the principle of his intended bill. They had not, however, produced any change of his opinion, and he thought some additional modifications would remove every fair ground of objection.

The order for reading the bill a second time on Monday was then discharged; after which, it was ordered to be read a second time this day two months.

ARTILLERY DRIVERS.] Mr. Bennet again called the attention of the house to the unequal provision made for the officers of the corps of artillery-drivers, and moved an address to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, "that he would be graciously pleased to direct the payment of the sum of 3,504*l.* to the officers of the eight troops of the royal artillery drivers, being the difference between the full and half-pay, and to assure his Royal Highness that this house will make good the same."

Mr. R. Ward objected to the motion, on the ground that no expectation of such a reward had ever been held out by the board of ordnance, and that the officers in question were in the commissary service, and were disabled by their commissions to exercise any military command. If justice went on the side of the persons for whom the hon. gentleman had made his motion, in God's name let it be granted. Endeavours had been made that arrangements should be come to on the subject; but it was found to be impossible, on account of the general rules which governed the army. The commander in chief had found that to grant such a boon as this would create the greatest discontent. The master-general, however, had consented, that as these officers were out of the artillery service, they should be allowed to hold their allowances, consistently with any other employment under government which they might acquire, without taking the half-pay oath. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Lyttelton expressed his satisfaction with what the hon. gentleman had said. At the same time, he could not help observing, that the affidavit in question was a most grievous thing upon the whole service. He could not conceive why an officer should be precluded from acting in any other than a military capacity, except with the loss of his half-pay.

Mr. Benson said, that there was nothing in the commission of these officers which held out that the corps would be absolutely annihilated. The late duke of Richmond had written a letter to an officer on the establishment, in which he said, "It was certainly not meant that you should not rise to higher situations in the service." This held out a hope of their attaining higher rank.

Mr. Calcraft said, that after the arrangement which had been mentioned by the hon. gentleman opposite, he hoped his hon. friend would not press his motion, which, if carried, would create invidious distinctions in the service. He thought that the officers in question had nothing of which they could complain.

Mr. Bennet in reply, observed, that the case of these officers was very hard. He considered them as the very sinews of the army, for, without them, the guns, ammunition, and provisions, could not be carried from place to place. It was not, however, his intention to press the question, if the sense of the house should appear to be adverse to it; but he considered them as a body of persons who were entitled to the thanks of the country, and to the full consideration of parliament.

The motion was then put and negatived, without a division.

POOR-LAWS.] Mr. S. Bourne rose to call the attention of the house to a subject of great importance. It was a subject, indeed, which claimed the utmost consideration of the house, and he was aware that it had excited a very considerable degree of interest in the public mind. Many able and sensible treatises had issued from the press on this subject, and some of them had displayed a great knowledge on this very important and interesting topic. With regard to the measures which he had had the honour of submitting to the house, he begged to state, that they had emanated, not so much from his own views and wishes on the subject, as from the authority of the committee who were appointed to report their opinions to the house. At the same time he must add, that, according to their opinions, the most beneficial and efficient measures had been introduced; but it was probable, that on some points they might have been mistaken, and their sole object was to legislate for the good of the country. He would now beg leave to direct the attention of the house to some material facts. He was sensible that in so thin a house the subject could not be discussed with so much advantage as in a fuller attendance; but it was important, at this period of the session, that no time should be lost; and although he felt that many persons were better qualified than himself to propose alterations in the present system, still he felt that it had become his duty to offer the result of his investigations to the consideration of the house. (Hear, hear.) In the early part of the reign of Elizabeth, the maintenance of the poor was first established by law. Before that time, they subsisted entirely upon private benevolence, and the alms which they received at the gates of the religious houses. The law of settlement also was then for the first time introduced*. By that law, however, none of the poor were obliged to reside in the places of their settlement, but such as were unable or unwilling to work; and those places of settlement were only such where they were born, or had made their abode for three years. That law continued in force until after the restoration, when a different plan was adopted. By the 13 and 14 Car. II. c. 12. a legal settlement was declared to be gained by birth; or by inhabitancy, apprenticeship, or service, for 40 days: within which period all intruders were made removeable from any parish by two justices of the peace, unless they settled in a tenement of the annual value of 10*l.* Under this law, which gave a settlement by so short a residence, several frauds took place; and, therefore, the 1st of James II. c. 17. was passed, which directed notice in writing to be delivered to the parish officers, before a settlement could be gained by such residence. It was afterwards found, that this was not sufficient, as collusions took place; and, therefore, by the 3 and 4 William and Mary c. 11. the doctrine of certificates was invented, by way of counterpoise. Thus, a person wishing to remove from the parish of A. to the parish of B. received a certificate from the parish of A. acknowledging that he belonged to it, by which means he was allowed to reside in the parish of B. till he became chargeable to it. Subsequent provisions made farther alterations, either enlarging or restraining the laws relating to the poor, till, at last, the law of settlements was reduced to the following heads. A settlement might be acquired, 1. by birth; 2. by parentage; 3. by marriage; 4. by 40 days' residence, and notice;

* By the ancient law of the land, the maintenance of the poor devolved on the Clergy. It was one of the purposes for which the payment of tithes was originally imposed; and, indeed, as late as the beginning of the 15th century, express provisions were made for setting apart a yearly sum out of their incomes for that object. By statute 15 Ric. II.c. 6. (Anno 1392), it was enacted, that, in all appropriations of churches, the diocesan bishop should ordain (in proportion to the value of the church) a competent sum to be distributed among the poor parishioners annually; and by statute 4 Hen. IV. c. 12. (Anno 1403), it was ordained, that the vicar should be a secular person, and be sufficiently endowed, at the discretion of the ordinary, for these three purposes,—to do divine service, to inform the people, and "to keep hospitality." And the act of 21 Hen. VIII. c. 13. (anno 1526) which regulated the residence of the Clergy, was made, not only for the increase of devotion, and the good opinion of the laity towards spiritual persons, but also "for the maintenance of hospitality," and "the relief of poor people."—By statutes 12 Ric. II. c. 7. and 19 Hen. VII. c. 12. the poor are directed to abide in the cities or towns wherein they were born, or such wherein they had dwelt for 3 years. These acts seem to be the first rudiments of parish settlements.—Still, no compulsory method was chalked out for the maintenance of the poor till the statute 27 Hen. VIII. c. 25. By statute 27 Hen. VIII. c. 28. the lesser monasteries were dissolved, and by 31 Hen. VIII. c. 13 the greater abbies also. From that time to the 43 of Elizabeth, no less than ten statutes were made for providing for the poor and impotent; but these having been found insufficient, the 43 of Eliz. c. 2. enacted, that overseers of the poor should be nominated yearly in every parish.

5. by renting for a year a tenement of the yearly value of 10*l.* and residing 40 days in the parish, without notice; 6. by being charged to and paying the public taxes and levies of the parish (excepting those for scavengers, highways, and the duties on houses and windows): and 7. by executing, when legally appointed, any public parochial office for a whole year in the parish, as churchwarden, &c. if coupled, in these two cases, with a residence of 40 days; 8. by being hired for a year, when unmarried and childless, and serving a year in the same service; and 9. by being bound an apprentice, gave the servant and apprentice a settlement, without notice, in that place wherein they served the last 40 days; 10. and lastly, the having an estate, and residing thereon 40 days, however small the value might be, in case it were acquired by act of law or of a third person, as by descent, gift, devise, &c. but if a man acquired it by purchase, then unless the consideration advanced, bonâ fide, were 30*l.* it was no settlement for any longer time than the person should inhabit therein. He was in no case removeable from his own property, but he should not, by any trifling or fraudulent purpose of his own, acquire a permanent and lasting settlement.—This was the law of settlements till the year 1795, when a bill was passed which made several alterations. By the 35th of George III. c. 101. no person could gain a settlement by 40 days' residence and notice. It was also enacted, that no person should be removed by an order of removal, until he became actually chargeable. Every unmarried woman with child, however, was considered as actually chargeable; as also rogues and vagabonds, idle and disorderly persons, &c. Under this law, the most distressing scenes frequently took place. From the moment that a labourer was afflicted with illness, infirmity, or other incapacity, he was liable to be removed, perhaps to a distant part of the country, which he had not seen for many years, and where he could obtain no employment. This, as it seemed to some, was one of the worst evils of the existing system. The laws that had grown out of the 13th and 14th of Charles II. were so numerous, and had occasioned so much litigation, that they had completely failed in their object. It had been decided, that a residence of 40 days in a parish where a man did not work gave him a settlement, while another person who had worked 40 years in a parish did not gain a settlement in it. In fact, the most complicated cases had arisen—cases that involved both law and equity; and no one could read the reports of decisions in the court of King's Bench, without feeling the utmost difficulty on the subject. At one time, the law appeared to be on this point; at another, it seemed to be totally different. Lawyers themselves were at a loss how to decide, and it was hardly possible to obtain a consistent opinion. In the last year 4,700 cases had arisen of appeal on orders of removal. One of the most fruitful sources of litigation was, the renting of a tenement of the yearly value of 10*l.* The most contradictory evidence was frequently given as to the value. Then, again, came the case of hiring with respect to service. Great difficulties, and numerous questions, had arisen on that head. Questions arose whether the contract had been dispensed with, or whether it had been dissolved. In many places (much, he confessed, to the disgrace of the persons) it was covenanted, that they should not hire a labourer for more than 50 weeks. In short, the house would find that the law of settlement had been much abused. The country at large were sensible of this evil, and it now remained to find a remedy. With this view it had been proposed, to take away the law of settlement altogether, and to relieve the poor in any place in which they might be found. It appeared to him, that it was unfair to call upon any one parish to maintain all that might apply to it. This was a system that would become quite intolerable. It was said, that this might be remedied by granting relief out of a national fund, and several persons of great eminence had approved of this suggestion. But let the house consider to what frauds and impositions this system must give rise. In various instances, which he would not enumerate, many persons thought it not at all disgraceful, nor, indeed, improper, to defraud the revenue; nay, they looked on such cases with a degree of complacency, and, he might add, without any disapprobation. He would leave the house, therefore, to judge of the spirit in which parish officers might be induced to act, when they conceived that it became a matter of humanity. (Hear, hear.) In his opinion, it would be quite impossible to have any national fund. We must attach persons to those parishes to which they looked for any relief. If a man were to be settled in the parish in which he was born, it would put an end to litigation. But still, this alone would have its inconveniencies; because it would remove a man to a parish, in his old age, in which he was wholly unknown, or almost entirely forgotten. It would be worthy of the consideration of the house, whether a certain residence should not entitle a person to relief under the poor laws; and he thought, that a residence of three years should be the period in which he should be entitled to that relief. There was, in his opinion, no better principle, than that the place in which the party had resided, and which had received the benefit of his earnings, should be liable to provide for him in his poverty or old age. With the leave of the house, he would now detail the plan which he proposed to introduce. The principle of the measure would appear by the words of the preamble of the bill,—namely, "Whereas many poor and industrious persons are, when no longer able to maintain themselves, liable to be removed from the parishes in which they have resided, and laboured many years, to other and distant places of legal settlement, derived from their parents, or as being the places of their births, or of their transitory residence in the early parts of their lives, and where they are forgotten and unknown; and great sums are yearly expended in the litigation of the numerous and complicated questions of law and of fact, which arise in regard to such settlements; and it is expedient that a more reasonable, simple, and uniform mode of acquiring legal settlements by residence should be established." To that end, the first clause of the bill would enact, "That from and after the 11th day of October next, every man, and every unmarried woman, who should have resided and continued in any parish for the space of 3 years, without having been absent therefrom more than 60 entire days in any one year, and who, during that time, should not have been convicted of any felony, or imprisoned in any gaol or house of correction, under any conviction or sentence of or for any crime or misdemeanor, and should not have been in any manner chargeable to any parish, should by such residence gain and acquire a legal settlement in the parish in which he or she should have so resided.—Provided always, that the term of such residence should not in any case commence, for the purpose of gaining a settlement, until after the party claiming a settlement thereby should have attained the age of 16 years, and should have been separated and emancipated from his or her parents or surviving parent, and that no person should gain a settlement in any parish by his or her residence in any hospital, or almshouse, or any building founded, settled, or applied for charitable purposes, as an object of the charitable purposes thereof; nor as a patient in any place licensed for the reception of lunatics or insane persons; nor as a prisoner in any gaol or prison, nor in any turnpike or toll-house on any road, navigation, or bridge, as the collector of any tolls or duties imposed by parliament; nor by residence under any military order in any barrack or quarter for his Majesty's troops."—This provision, he conceived, would obviate the present restrictions in hiring servants, and would create that feeling of attachment between master and servant that must be most beneficial to themselves and to the country at large. Another benefit that would result from it was, that persons would not be rash in applying for parochial relief. Knowing that their residence in a parish did not entitle them to relief, they would exert their industry, and suspend their application to the parish officers, till the required period should have elapsed; and, by doing so, they might, in many cases, become able to dispense altogether with parochial aid. Thus the provision would in all respects, so far as he was able to anticipate, prove favourable to morals and good conduct. The limitation of the age to 16 years would, he hoped, remove any disinclination to taking boys and apprentices.—The bill would then enact, that it should be lawful for every person who should claim to have gained a settlement in any parish, by such residence therein as aforesaid, and who should continue to reside therein, without having become chargeable to the same, or to any other parish, to make oath of such residence before two justices, who should thereupon cause one or more of the overseers of the parish in which such settlement should be claimed, to appear before them, and should, in their presence or in their absence, upon proof of their having been duly summoned, examine the person making such claim, and such witnesses as might be produced on the part of the claimant, or of the parish, touching such residence and settlement; and if it should be proved to the satisfaction of such justices, that the claimant had been bonâ fide resident in the parish in which he or she should claim to be settled for 3 years, it should be lawful for such justices to adjudge the settlement of the claimant to be in such parish; and to certify such adjudication under their hands and seals, and to cause such certificate to be forthwith delivered to the person whose settlement should be thereby adjudged, and a duplicate or copy thereof to the overseers, or to one of them; and if the churchwardens and overseers should think the parish aggrieved, it should be lawful for them to appeal to two or more other justices, in any petty session to be holden within two months after such adjudication, causing notice in writing to be given of such appeal to the party whose settlement should be in question, eight days at the least before the petty session to which the appeal should be made; and the justices in such petty session, upon proof or admission of such notice, should receive such appeal, and examine the parties and such witnesses as should be produced, on oath, and should confirm or quash the adjudication appealed against, according to the merits of the case, and by writing under their hands and seals, to be indorsed on the original adjudication, should declare and certify their determination thereon; and when upon the hearing of any such appeal, the adjudication appealed against should be confirmed, or upon proof that notice of any such appeal had been given by the churchwardens or overseers, though they should not afterwards prosecute such appeal, the justices who should hear the appeal, or who should be present in the petty session to which notice of appeal should have been given, should order the churchwardens and overseers of the appellant parish to pay to the respondent party, such costs and charges as such justices should in their discretion think fit; and the same should be levied and recovered, and the payment thereof enforced, in like manner as costs awarded by justices in their quarter sessions, upon the determination of appeals against orders of removal, might be levied and recovered, and the payment thereof be enforced. And, every such adjudication, against which there should be no appeal to the petty session, or which should, on appeal, be there confirmed, should be, at all times thereafter, primâ facie evidence of such settlement.—The next clause of the bill would provide, that every domestic servant who should continue in the same service for the space of 3 years, and should, during that time, reside with his or her master or mistress in more than one parish, in which such master or mistress should have a house or residence for which he or she should be assessed to the poor's rates, should gain a legal settlement in the parish in which he or she should have so resided for the last 60 days of the term of 3 years, subject, nevertheless, to the like rules and restrictions, as if such servant should have resided 3 years in the same parish; so as that every servant claiming to have gained a settlement by residence in more than one parish, should, within one month after the time at which he or she should claim to have acquired the same, make oath of such residence before two justices of the division in which the parish where the settlement should be claimed was situated, who should thereupon cause one or more of the overseers to be summoned before them, and should inquire into such claim in manner before directed, in cases where the party claiming a settlement by residence should make oath thereof, in order to the adjudication of justices thereon; and the parish in which such settlement should be adjudged, should have the like appeal as in other cases of the adjudication of settlements by virtue of this bill.—The next clause would provide, that every person capable of gaining a settlement by residence in any parish, by virtue of this bill, who should serve on board any ship or vessel, in respect of which the owners or any of them should be rated to the poor's rates in any parish in England, should, for the purpose of such settlement, be adjudged and considered to have been, during his service in such ship or vessel, actually resident in the parish where the owner or owners of such vessel should be so rated for the same.—And, in order to restrain the unnecessary removal of poor persons, before the places of their legal settlement should have been finally determined; it would be enacted, that the justices who, on the complaint of the churchwardens and overseers, should order any poor person to be removed to any other parish, as the place of his legal settlement, in their discretion to suspend, by writing under their hands (to be endorsed on the order) the removal of the person whose settlement should be thereby adjudged; and to direct that a duplicate or copy of the order, and of the endorsement thereon, and a copy of the examination on which the order should be founded, should be delivered to one of the overseers of the parish in which the settlement should be adjudged to be; and all persons who should think themselves aggrieved by any such order, might appeal against the same to the general quarter sessions of the peace, to be holden for the division in which such order should be made, next after 28 days from the delivery thereof to any of the overseers of the parish in which such settlement should be adjudged to be (giving such notice of appeal as aforesaid;) and the justices in such session should receive such appeal, and proceed to hear the merits thereof, in like manner in all respects, as if the person whose settlement should by such order be adjudged should have been actually removed by virtue thereof; and if notice of such appeal should not be given within the time for that purpose limited, or if the appeal should not be prosecuted with effect, or the order appealed against should be confirmed, such order should be final and conclusive, and the person thereby ordered to be removed, should be forthwith removed and delivered to the churchwardens and overseers of the parish in which his settlement should by such order have been adjudged to be.—Provided always, that it should be lawful for the churchwardens and overseers, giving notice of appeal against any such suspended order, to require that the poor person therein named should be actually removed, and the suspension of such removal should thereupon cease; and the churchwardens and overseers of the respondent parish should cause such person to be, within 3 days after they should be thereto so required, actually removed to the place by such order directed; provided that it should be lawful for the justices in quarter session, upon the determination of any such appeal against the respondent parish, to allow or to disallow, as they should see fit, to the appellant parish, by whom the actual removal of the poor person in any such suspended order named should have been required, the expense of maintaining or relieving him, from the time of the removal to the determination of the appeal; and it should also be lawful for such justices in quarter session, if they should find that the removal was unnecessary, and that the same was frivolously or vexatiously required, to order the churchwardens and overseers of the appellant parish to pay to the churchwardens and overseers of the respondent parish so much as should be by such justices thought reasonable and just for the charges of such removal, to be levied and recovered in like manner as costs and charges in the law, ordered by justices in quarter sessions to be paid upon the determination of appeals against orders of removal of poor persons to their settlement:—Provided that nothing in this bill contained should extend to alter or affect the manner or circumstances, in, by or under which settlements might be derived by children from their parents, or might be acquired by birth or by marriage.—In the last place, the bill would enact, that its clauses, in relation to parishes, should extend to all townships, vills and places, having separate overseers of the poor; and that all acts to be done, and all notices to be given to or by churchwardens and overseers, might, in townships, vills and places which have no churchwardens, be executed and given by and to the overseers, as fully as if in every such clause they were severally named and repeated. And that the bill should extend only to that part of the united kingdom called England.—By those alterations he hoped to simplify the law of settlement, and to remove many sources of litigation and expense. This measure might be thought a bold one; it might be thought daring to make so great a change in the law of the land: but he begged to observe, that it was not an innovation; it was only bringing back the law to its ancient and original character. If he erred in this measure, it was at least satisfactory to know, that he erred with the greatest authorities. Both Mr. Pitt and Mr. Whitbread had proposed to alter the law in this respect, although he could not agree with the remedy which they had proposed, and which he thought complicated and inadequate. But there was a greater authority on this subject, to which he begged to refer,—it was the authority of Dr. Burn, who had written on the poor laws, as well as on the duties of justices of the peace. The house were aware, that no law could be made in which no difficulties would occur: that legislation could not be perfect, but must accommodate itself to the changes and variations of human life: at the same time, he fully concurred with the learned writer whom he had just mentioned, that the law of settlements should be brought back "to its ancient and, indeed, most natural standard." (Hear, hear.)* The right hon. gentleman concluded with moving for leave to bring in a bill "to amend the laws respecting the settlement of the poor."

Sir C. Monck apprehended, that this measure would not remove the evils of the existing system. It did not prevent litigation, as to which of several parishes was under the stronger obligation to support the poor, in cases where the residence had not been three years in any one of them. A. B. and C. were equally bound, as far as residence was concerned, to maintain a pauper. Which of them was to be liable? This was the great difficulty to be removed. The law of maintenance was sufficiently clear—the pauper must be maintained. But the question respected the law of settlement, who was to maintain this pauper? There was another provision which he considered liable to objection. The acquisition of settlement was to be vitiated by any crime committed by the pauper. If the pauper committed a crime in one parish, why should another parish be therefore punished? The parish in which the crime was committed ought rather to be punished. It was agreeable to the law of the land, and the ancient custom of England, that the neighbourhood should be responsible for crimes committed amongst them.

Lord Castlereagh deprecated any discussion on the measure in its present stage. He thought it would be more satisfactory to wait till the bill should be printed.

Sir S. Romilly said, he was certainly not prepared to discuss the principle of the bill; but he did not see why an opinion should not be now given upon the measure. At the same time, he felt by no means disposed to make any objections to the proposed measure. He conceived it to be a great improvement, (hear, hear, hear,) and one that would prevent much inconvenience, much expense, and much suffering. (Hear, hear.) This opinion he now gave, having had considerable experience in former years of the operation of the poor laws. The distress occasioned to the wretched paupers by sudden removals, and to a great distance, was extremely painful to every mind of reflection and humanity. It was monstrous to suppose that it was a matter of indifference to the pauper where he should be maintained. It was often of the utmost importance to him. On a sudden illness, depriving him of the power to work at his employment, he was removed to another parish, perhaps far distant, where, when he recovered, no employment was to be found for him. He had known a journeyman printer to have been so removed to a place where no printing was done, and where he could consequently obtain no employment. He, therefore, thought the proposed alteration most beneficial, most

* It is certain, that the most just laws have some mixture of injustice; insomuch, that Plato says, "They undertake to cut off the Hydra's head, who pretend to purge the laws of all inconvenience." And Tacitus observes that, "Every great example of justice has in it some mixture of injustice, which recompenses the wrong done to particular men, by its public utility."

The existing system of the poor laws is one of the greatest evils of the present day, and Dr. Burn is not singular in his opinion, that we should return, as nearly as possible, to the plan formed in the reign of Elizabeth. Sir William Blackstone (Comm. 1. p. 365.) observes, that "The laws relating to the poor, by the resolutions of the courts of justice thereon within a century past, are branched into a great variety. And yet, notwithstanding the pains that have been taken about them, they still remain very imperfect, and inadequate to the purposes they are designed for: a fate, that has generally attended most of our statute laws, where they have not the foundation of the common law to build on. When the shires, the hundreds, and the tithings, were kept in the same admirable order in which they were disposed by the great Alfred, there were no persons idle, consequently none but the impotent that needed relief: and the statute of 43 Eliz. seems entirely founded on the same principle. But when this excellent scheme was neglected and departed from, we cannot but observe with concern, what miserable shifts and lame expedients have from time to time been adopted, in order to patch up the flaws occasioned by this neglect. There is not a more necessary or more certain maxim in the frame and constitution of society, than that every individual must contribute his share, in order to the well-being of the community: and surely they must be very deficient in sound policy, who suffer one half of a parish to continue idle, dissolute, and unemployed; and at length are amazed to find, that the industry of the other half is not able to maintain the whole."

advantageous in its consequences, and altogether the most beneficial regulation on the subject during the present reign. He had often viewed it as the greatest cruelty to an unfortunate pauper to be removed, on account of a temporary illness, to a place where he would be surrounded with strangers, and where, if he recovered, no employment could be found. The distress to the pauper was very great, the expense of removal was great, and the ultimate burden to the public was often much increased by this cruel law. He would take another opportunity of considering the details of the measure, but he could not now avoid saying that he thought it the greatest improvement that could possibly be made.

Mr. Lockhart stated instances of the increase of litigation which he had lately remarked at two quarter-sessions. In one instance, the increase was from 1 to 20; in another from 1 to 16. He also mentioned instances of fraud and imposition by paupers having apprentices, and by men having property in one parish and removing to another parish, and taking houses rented so low as to come under the law of settlement. These evils required correction, and he hoped that this measure would be rendered effectual.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

LOAN BILL.] Mr. Brogden brought up the report of this bill.

Mr. J. Martin asked the right hon. gentleman opposite, whether the subscribers of exchequer-bills were allowed to pay up in full, whether any discount were to be allowed to them, and when the stock was to be delivered to them?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, as to the question whether the subscribers were allowed to pay up in full, they certainly were allowed. No discount was given, that being contrary to the practice respecting exchequer-bills. As to the third question, when stock should be delivered, it would be delivered as soon as the forms of the Bank would allow. He felt confident of the speedy consummation of that measure, having received offers from most respectable quarters.

Several clauses and amendments were then added to the bill, on the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and it was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

BUILDING OF CHURCHES' BILL.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved that the house resolve itself into a committee on this bill.

Sir F. Flood observed, that one million of money was to be taken from the consolidated fund for building churches in England. Was nothing to be done for Ireland? The fund was the common fund of both countries. Ireland contributed 120,000*l.* to this fund. Since the Union, Ireland was burthened with a greater proportion than she ought or was able to bear. Let justice, then, be done according to the articles of the Union. He approved of the reason for building new churches; it was in consideration of the increase of population. But the population was increased in Ireland too, and, therefore, he hoped, that the benefit of this measure would be extended to that country.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer assured the hon. baronet, that parliament and the English people were sensible of the merits of their Irish fellow-subjects; and if more accommodation were necessary for the congregations in Ireland, which he was happy to learn were upon the increase, the house, he had no doubt, would provide it most cheerfully. He begged to observe, however, that this was not to be a grant from the consolidated fund, and that the exchequers of both countries were now consolidated.

The house then resolved itself into a committee.

Sir W. Scott objected to the clause which enabled twelve well-disposed persons to build a chapel, and appoint a minister with the consent of the bishop, as tending to disturb the tranquillity of the church by the introduction of dogmatical sectaries, and by infringing on the rights of patrons. It was unworthy, too, in the church, to depend on private funds for its increase or support. He objected also to the language of the clause; the expression "well disposed" was loose in the extreme, and no certain construction could be put upon it. Their being householders of the parish was no protection; for strangers who did not belong to the parish might join with them; and if the bishop refused his consent, he would be exposed to a degree of odium which he might be very unwilling to encounter. A clause of this nature could not fail to encounter opposition in another place, and might endanger the success of the bill altogether. He, therefore, moved its rejection.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer defended the clause, and thought that the church should avail itself of all sources of assistance from private liberality. He could state, in answer to an apprehension that had fallen from his right hon. friend, that this clause would not endanger the bill in another place. Those who were most interested had been consulted, and had expressed their acquiescence in it. The clause would not enable strangers to introduce sectarians; it mentioned only that twelve well-disposed "householders" of the parish, and others, might build, and have two presentations. As the law stood already, nothing could prevent parties from building, and preaching as long as they liked, doctrines the most opposite to those of the church. With respect to patrons, the clause did not interfere with their right of presentation; and as to its being unworthy of the church to profit by private munificence, the right hon. gentleman must be aware, that a great proportion of the churches at present existing had been founded by private patrons. He could not, therefore, consent to abandon the clause.

Mr. Wrottesley opposed the clause, as likely to make a serious inroad on the rights of the established church. He hoped it would be withdrawn, or brought forward in a separate bill.

Mr. Bathurst was willing to give the clause his support, because he did not wish to endanger the success of the bill, but he would consent to it only with some modification. It allowed twelve persons, who might provide the necessary funds for the building of a chapel, to apply to the bishop for that purpose, and having obtained his consent to proceed in the erection of the chapel. The subscribers were then to appoint life trustees, who might nominate clergymen for the first two turns, the subsequent nominations to be in the incumbent of the church of the parish, or extra-parochial place in which such chapel should be built, unless in case of such chapel being made a district church, in which case such nomination should be in the patron of the church of the original parish. Now it might so happen, that the greater part of the funds might be raised without the parish, and of course that the nomination might rest with people not belonging to it. To the clause, as it thus stood, he could not agree. He could not consent to the nomination being placed in the hands of extra-parochial subscribers. He would therefore propose, when the proper time came, some modification, making it necessary for the majority of the subscribers to be resident parishioners. No person unconnected with the parish could have a personal interest in appointing a christian instructor. General subscribers should not therefore be allowed to exercise the right of presentation. He did not wish to check the liberality of individuals which came in aid of the liberality of parliament to promote so laudable an object as the erection of places of worship, but he did not see how the limitation he proposed could have that effect. The society which had been formed for promoting this object had subscribed without any condition, and had even gone before parliament in raising funds for the purpose. As no plan had been laid down by the legislature on which to proceed, and as no faith had been pledged, there could be no faith broken with them under whatever regulations they were allowed to expend their subscriptions. In the case of parishes which received the aid of parliament, that aid could be extended on any conditions parliament chose: and one of those conditions ought to be, to limit the right of presentation, which might be given once or twice as an inducement to co-operate to a majority of resident subscribers.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that there was not such a difference between himself and his right hon. friend as might at first sight appear. It was to be supposed that the majority of subscribers would be resident parishioners, and a discretion was allowed to the bishop to grant or withhold his consent, as he saw how the funds were raised. The incumbent and patron likewise were to be consulted, and it was not likely that they would agree to any proposition by which an extra-parochial influence would be created. The incumbent himself might be a subscriber. He would not object to the introduction of some words by which the evils apprehended might be prevented, and the objections stated obviated.

Mr. Bathurst said, that the objection was not answered [illegible] to the power conferred on the bishop by the bill. The bishop was only allowed to judge of the expediency of erecting an additional place of worship, and of the sufficiency of the funds raised for that purpose. He had no right to inquire whence those funds came, or into whose hands the right of presentation might devolve.

Mr. Peel expressed his entire concurrence with every observation which fell from his right hon. and learned friend (Sir W. Scott). The objectionable clause did not seem necessarily connected with the rest of the bill, and might easily be detached from it, to be made the subject of a separate discussion. It, therefore, ought to be introduced in a separate bill, and determined on its own grounds. If right, it might be voted by itself; if wrong, it ought to be rejected without injury to what was right. The consent of the house ought not to be purchased to an objectionable measure by its union with what was desirable, nor ought the regulation of the latter to be hazarded by being coupled with the former. The bishop was not allowed to judge by the bill of the source from whence the funds arose. If twelve "well-disposed persons" agreed to raise the necessary funds, they might apply to him and have his consent to the erection of a place of worship, to which the trustees elected by the majority of subscribers wherever they resided, would have the right of presenting twice. This description of persons appeared to him to be as indefinite as the result of their operations might be injurious to the rights of the church. What was meant by "well-disposed persons," when the term was introduced into an act of parliament? Crime was defined by law, but he never yet heard of a definition of morality in a statute. How were we to measure good dispositions, or ascertain the character of well-disposed persons, by an act of parliament? He was confirmed in his objections to this clause of the bill by the very concessions that had already been made, and the amendments introduced. In the original proposal of the measure, the subscribers were to have the right of nominating thrice. His right hon. friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had now reduced this right to two turns of nomination, and another right hon. friend (Mr. Bathurst) spoke of one. Why was the original proposition abandoned, if it were right? In the bill there was no description of the kind of fabrics to be raised, and no provision made for their repairs. They might only be of a kind to last so long as the original subscribers had an interest in the nomination of the clergyman; and might devolve to the patron or the incumbent when unfit for use. He opposed the clause, and wished it separated from the bill.

Dr. Phillimore supported it, on the ground that the law ought to be a little relaxed, to encourage persons to engage in undertakings that were so necessary to supply religious instruction to the growing population of the country.

Sir M. W. Ridley opposed the clause. If it were necessary, it ought to be embodied in a separate bill; but he thought it calculated to introduce dissensions in parishes.

Lord Castlereagh doubted, in the present state of the growing population, whether the amazing void of religion could be supplied without some collateral aid. He should therefore vote for the clause.

Mr. V. Fitzgerald regretted that he was compelled to vote against the measure proposed by his right hon. friend; he feared that the bill would be endangered if the clause were introduced.

The committee divided.—For the clause 22.—Against it 47.

The chairman then reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Cotton Factories Bill.] This bill was read a third time and passed.

Spanish Slave Trade Treaty Bill.] The house went into a committee on this bill, and the report was ordered to be received tomorrow.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, May 1.

Cotton Factories' Bill.] This bill was brought from the Commons and read a first time.

Pardons under the Great Seal Bill.] This bill was brought from the Commons and read a first time.

Proceedings in Chancery.] Lord Holland said, he had a petition to present relative to proceedings in Chancery. He had no knowledge of the circumstances stated by the petitioners, but it was a principle with him, that their lordships' doors should always be open to complaints of the people on every subject. The petition was from Abraham Doubleday, of Nottingham, and John Dawson and his wife. The petitioners complained of having had a cause in the Court of Chancery for ten years, whereby they had been put to vast trouble and expense, greatly to their injury; that they saw no prospect of any termination to the proceedings in the Court of Chancery; and finding all their endeavours to obtain a decision unavailing, they had resolved to petition their lordships, confident that no petition would be rejected by that house which had for its object the obtaining of justice. They therefore prayed, that their lordships would be pleased to grant such redress as the case required.

The Lord Chancellor said, he knew nothing of the cause or proceedings to which this petition referred, but their lordships might be assured, that he would not neglect to make a strict inquiry into it.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, May 1.

Loan Bill.] On the order of the day for the third reading of this bill,

Mr. Grenfell said, he had thought it his duty the other night, in the committee, to object to the whole allowance to the Bank on deposits for the loan, which was 800*l.* per million on 3,000,000*l.* and 400*l.* per million on 27,000,000*l.* At present he should waive his objections to the allowance on the 3,000,000*l.*, but should object to 400*l.* per million on the 27,000,000*l.*, which was of a novel description, and, he believed, the first instance of such a payment. The amount of the sum to which he objected was 10,800*l.*, being at the rate of 400*l.* upon every million of exchequer-bills; and that part of the clause which related to this allowance he now moved should be expunged from the bill.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, it certainly had not been usual to grant any percentage of this kind to the Bank, but this was owing to the former practice of always carrying on that branch of the public business at the exchequer-bill-office. The operation of funding those bills was now to be performed at the Bank, and the whole sum was capable of being converted into a money-loan. It formed a necessary part of a complicated transaction, the whole trouble of which was undertaken by the Bank; and he thought the allowance must be considered as moderate, when it was found not to exceed one-half of what the Bank would have been entitled to, according to usage, upon an ordinary loan.

The amendment was then negatived, and the bill was read a third time and passed.

Circulating Medium—Bank Restriction.] Mr. Tierney rose, pursuant to notice, to call the attention of the house to one of the most important subjects that had for a long period been brought under its consideration. His object was, to ascertain the actual state of the currency, to make it known what the people of this country, and those of foreign countries who were connected with them, were trusting to as the means of carrying on their respective dealings. Many persons were much perplexed by the interesting question, whether the country was at present in a state of prosperity or adversity? What seemed undeniable was, that we had a funded debt, to speak in round numbers, of 800,000,000*l.* and 40,000,000*l.* of unfunded, in this the third year of peace. The total amount of debt was therefore 840,000,000*l.*;—rather an appalling consideration: but we were not, it was said, without some comfort in this unpromising state of affairs; we had a sinking-fund of 14,000,000*l.*, and this brought us round to the side of prosperity. Then again it occurred, that it was necessary to borrow the whole of this 14,000,000*l.*, or amount of the sinking-fund, which recollection replaced us in a situation of adversity. But another piece of comfort was discovered in the advantageous terms on which this 14,000,000*l.* had been borrowed. The next question, therefore, which presented itself was, ought a system of finance under such circumstances to be bottomed upon a paper currency, not convertible into money? (Hear, hear.) He believed very few even of the warmest admirers of the present system, not to refer to those who had hitherto supported the restriction on the ground of some special emergency, would venture to maintain such an opinion. How, then, was the bill for continuing the suspension of payments on the part of the Bank another year, to be reconciled to the judgment of those who had supported former measures of the same nature, in the expectation that a period might soon arrive, when a return would be made to the ancient legitimate course of maintaining the circulation? The house must surely think that some extraordinary grounds ought to be laid for the continuance of a measure, the original justification of which was abandoned two years ago. Now, with regard to this new necessity, what was the shewing of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? It was, that certain British merchants had evinced a disposition to embark in foreign loans, and that a great number of travellers were indulging their curiosity abroad. Indeed, he believed he might throw the travellers out of the question, since the right hon. gentleman had subsequently confessed that they had come back, at least in the proportion of 78 to 99. (A laugh.) When the order in council upon which the restriction was originally founded was issued, in the year 1797, there was an administration at least as powerful as the present, a Chancellor of the Exchequer who enjoyed at least as much of the confidence of the public as the right hon. gentleman; but the first proceeding of Mr. Pitt on that occasion was, to move the reference of that order to a committee. He did not think it enough to come down to the house, and to say at once, "I believe the restriction to be expedient, and therefore you ought to do the same." It was very material to consider what was then, and what now was the situation of the country in this respect. In the year 1797, the Bank made a representation to government, that great drains were being made, and the act suspending their cash payments was expressly founded upon the report of a committee, stating, that those drains were occasioned by an exaggerated and unfounded alarm, arising from political circumstances. We were now, in the year 1818, at peace with all the world. There was no drain upon the Bank, no marked preference for a metallic currency, no fear of invasion, no war upon the able conduct of which the interest of civilized existence might depend, to plead as an apology for further delay in resuming the ordinary course of payments. Instead of any or all of these causes, the only intelligible one that could be substituted was, the belief of a Chancellor of the Exchequer. (A laugh.) Now he had to object to the right hon. gentleman's testimony, on the ground of his being an interested witness. The whole of his financial arrangements proceeded on the basis of a paper currency; and with this consciousness on his mind, it was no disrespect to the right hon. gentleman to say, that he must necessarily be under a bias in forming his opinion on the question under consideration. The right hon. gentleman had pledged himself by his recent plan of finance, or conversion of stock, or loan, or by whatever name it might inaccurately be called, (for there was no word in the English language descriptive of so complicated a transaction,) to the continuance of the Bank restriction. No man could believe that the subscription would have succeeded, but from a confidence entertained by those who engaged in it, that such was the minister's intention. The right hon. gentleman therefore was bound to continue the restriction; for otherwise, he must break faith with men who confided in his projects and speculations. The act for continuing the restriction, which was passed two years ago, was a solemn undertaking on the part of the Bank to resume cash-payments on the 5th of July 1818. That act was deliberately passed for the security of the country: and was the house prepared to set it aside, and break the faith thus pledged to the public creditor? Would they not, at least, previously inquire, whether it was not possible to fulfil the engagement without detriment to the public interests? When the bill of 1816 was introduced, it was justified, not because the country was in danger—not upon the existence of any former necessity, but for the sole and express purpose of giving time to the Bank to make such arrangements as in their discretion might be necessary, to guard against any possible inconvenience in recommencing their payments. These words were inserted in the preamble, and a limited period named, in order to mark that the delay was granted for no other purpose than to enable the Bank to make preparations for that event. What, then, must be the surprise of the house to learn, that the preamble of the bill now lying on the table was exactly the same as that of the former act, word for word, comma for comma, and stop for stop? (A laugh, and cries of hear.) If the subject were not too serious, he might push this consideration to a ludicrous extreme; nothing could be better calculated to produce stage effect. Neither the foreign loans nor the British travellers were here mentioned; the old ground was taken, although the Bank directors stated, that they were perfectly ready and willing to pay immediately in money. It really would be almost an insult on the decent and solemn forms of legislation, to suffer the bill to become a law on its present pretences. If the negotiation of foreign loans were the true ground for continuing the system on which we were acting, why was it not so stated in the preamble? Had the Bank directors been consulted in framing this preamble? because if that were the case, he presumed nobody would deny the propriety of examining them before a committee, with regard to their alleged readiness and preparation for resuming their payments. It was desirable to know, whether they had ever made any representations to government on the subject of the foreign loans. As he perceived no sign of assent from the right hon. gentleman, he concluded they had not. Let the house look, then, at the situation in which they were placed. In 1797 the Bank directors represented to Mr. Pitt, that the drains upon them were such as to threaten the safety of the house, as it was called. A dread of similar effects had led to the continuance of the restriction down to the year 1816. A postponement was then determined upon on grounds wholly distinct from the former; and the right hon. gentleman, so late as the last session, had declared his confident belief that cash-payments would be resumed at the Bank on the 5th of July of the present year. In this statement all the Bank directors concurred, at least if he might judge by their countenances—the only means the house had of judging on such a point, for a more taciturn set of gentlemen were not often to be met with. (A laugh.) The complacency of manner with which they listened to this declaration proved, either that they were of the same opinion, or that they were laughing in their sleeves at the right hon. gentleman, and at the monstrous nonsense he was talking to the house. (A laugh.) The right hon. gentleman must be assured that the French loan never would have been taken by an hon. friend of his (Mr. Baring), if it had been stated to him that government regarded it as a transaction which might prove prejudicial to the interests of this country. He had reason to believe that the right hon. gentleman was privy to the whole negotiation, which was in progress at the time when he made his promise that the Bank, one of whose directors his hon. friend was, should recommence their ordinary payments at the stipulated time. If, however, as he sometimes thought, the Bank directors were laughing at the right hon. gentleman, that was a sufficient reason for not trusting to the right hon. gentleman's belief on a question of this nature. The house might be told, indeed, of the confidence which ought to be placed in the discretion and experience of the directors; but after all that had passed, it might be more expedient to confine this sort of praise to the preamble of an act of parliament. If the house, however, consulted its own character, and the mere decorum of its proceedings, it would not pass this measure under its present title. He did not doubt that some hon. director would that night abjure the whole proposition on which the proposed enactment was founded, and aver that the Bank stood in no need of further preparation. Thus they were called upon to legislate on a matter of the utmost difficulty and importance, with no other guide than the opinion of the right hon. gentleman. If he were to stop here, he should think that he had made out a sufficient case; but it might, perhaps not unreasonably, be expected of him that he should suggest what he would propose for inquiry, if the committee were to be appointed. This brought him to the consideration of the foreign loans, and the cause of the present high price of gold. Before the house could admit the conclusion that those loans and the high price of gold formed an adequate justification of the measure, there were several points which it was incumbent on every hon. member, who desired to vote from conviction rather than a disposition to compliment the right hon. gentleman, to see clearly ascertained. The first question which a committee would have to put, related to the price of gold: and in the few observations with which he should trouble the house, he could assure them that it was his wish carefully to avoid all abstruse views and reasoning on the subject. This was the more necessary, as, in addition to the consciousness of his own inability to enter into an argument of this nature, he was convinced, that the very last place for so treating the question was a popular assembly. His wish, nevertheless, was to state intelligibly, if he could, what the points were which ought to be referred to a committee. And here he would ask the house, whether they were satisfied that all which had emanated from the bullion committee should be set aside. (Hear, hear.) Were they convinced that the price of gold had nothing to do with the quantity of paper in circulation? (Hear, hear.) Now, although it should be admitted that the bullion committee had not attended to all the circumstances which might influence the price of gold, he believed there was no intelligent man who would not acknowledge that an excessive issue of paper must have a certain operation on it. It was, therefore, a proper object of inquiry, to discover what portion of the rise was to be attributed to the paper-currency, and what to other causes. It was generally believed, that the Bank had a larger quantity of gold at present in its possession than at any former period, and to which it was supposed they trusted, when they professed their readiness to pay in coin. Now if a commodity which was affected in its price by the quantity of some other commodity, might easily be thrown into the market, was it not obvious that this circumstance alone might produce a favourable change in the equalization of prices? Another circumstance deserving consideration was, the difference between the value of the gold and silver currencies, under the new coinage. He did not wish to dogmatize on a question of so much difficulty, he spoke as an ignorant man earnestly desirous of information, and it required no other quality than modesty to induce others to participate in the same desire. The proportion of value between the two currencies, previous to the last coinage, was as 15 and a fraction to 14 and a fraction. The difference now amounted to 5*l.* 18*s.* per cent., a difference which must enhance the price of gold; for until silver reached the price of 5*s.* 6*d.* per ounce, it could not be exported as equivalent to the gold. Was it too much to say, then, that the true cause of the high price of gold could not be understood without a careful and accurate examination? With respect to the question of loans, he should be glad to hear from the right hon. gentleman whether, if it had been stated six months ago, that a great number of British merchants had wished to purchase into the French stocks, he would have come down to the house, and proposed the continuance of the restrictions? (Hear, hear.) And yet there was no difference whatever in these transactions. The temptations to these foreign loans were created by ministers themselves. The right hon. gentleman opposite had contrived to raise the stocks, and to lower the interest of money; and what could a man do better than invest it in foreign funds, where he could obtain a higher rate than in this country? If this question were to depend on the negotiation of foreign loans, where were the apprehensions respecting them to end? The Chancellor of the Exchequer now asked the house to pass this law only for one year, on account of the present loans; but where was the security, that other loans might not take place at a very short period? In this country when there was a loan, the money was borrowed first, and the interest was provided for by parliament; but in France the case was directly the reverse. There they placed at the disposal of the minister of finance, a certain quantity of annuities or rentes. The consequence was, that in France the minister might postpone the arrangement until he could obtain the most advantageous terms. The house would therefore perceive, that when they were told of a large loan for France, the money was not wanted immediately. In the present state of affairs, every thing seemed to be flourishing in France, as far as regarded the stocks. While we were talking here of prosperity, and had nothing but paper, the stocks fell; whereas, in France, while they were talking only of adversity, and had no paper, the stocks rose. It was most probable that the French minister would wait until the funds had increased in price before he brought the rentes to sale. That transaction might not happen for nine months. But now, with all the horrors, as it was said, of a foreign loan upon us, the Chancellor of the Exchequer came, and said, "I am sure the Bank must want a great deal more time." But what was the real amount of this loan? He understood, that it was about 10,000,000*l.* sterling. To this was to be added a further sum for the indemnification of foreign governments and individuals, amounting to about 20,000,000*l.* sterling, which would constitute an aggregate of 30,000,000*l.* What, then, was the extent of the money that would go from this country? What was the probable amount that would be drawn from us? (Hear, hear.) He had no hesitation in saying, and he put it to the candour of the right hon. gentleman, that, in the present confidence which was entertained with respect to the French finances, a very large sum would go from other countries. It was obvious, indeed, that this would be done, in order to obtain the present high rate of interest in the French funds. And here he would ask, was he to understand (as it had been stated in some of the public journals to have been declared by the Duke de Richelieu) that the claims of individuals, whether they chose it or not, might be liquidated in stock? In that case, there would be no transmission of money. Taking the value of the French stock, the 5 per cents. at 68, they would receive as much of that stock as would produce 100*l.* There was one of the counteractions of the loan. The Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to smile, but he should like to hear how it could be otherwise than so? Another question was, whether the proportion of the loan which England was to furnish was to go altogether in gold? Was no part of it to go in goods? Part of it, no doubt, would go in that mode in which the remitter should find it most convenient to send it. To say that the whole of it must be remitted in gold, and that, therefore, the price of gold must be proportionably raised, would be just as absurd as to say, that a contract made to supply a foreign army with bread, must raise the price of flour in England, when it was known that such flour might be procured on the spot where it was to be used, by remitting cottons for it. Unless there was something in the air of this country which particularly affected gold, (a laugh,) if gold went out of the country, it would come back again; and if that were the case, it was a sufficient reason that the Bank should resume their payments in cash (Hear, hear.) But he would ask the house, which did they think was best—that Great Britain should lose its character for good faith, or that the Bank should disgorge a part of its profits? (Hear, hear.) We should soon see whether or no, if gold were sent abroad, it would come back again in a time of profound peace, in a time when there was no disposition on the part of any body to hoard it. Gold might, perhaps, be sent abroad with advantage: it might alter the rate of exchange in our favour. Supposing that the Bank had 10,000,000*l.* of gold in their coffers; that the whole of it were to go abroad, and that they were to repurchase it at a loss of 5 per cent. There would be a loss on the whole of half a million. And what of that? The Bank had made 21,000,000*l.* by the country; and was the country now to be told, that its whole commercial system was to remain in an injurious and unnatural state, because the Bank would not relinquish the smallest portion of their profits? These were points that required consideration. Let any gentleman ask his neighbour on his bench, whether an investigation ought not to take place. It was possible that not two would agree upon the subject, and yet the Chancellor of the Exchequer now called upon the house to jump over the whole question, and to adopt his propositions. If the inquiry were granted, what would be the result? Why, either that the Bank was capable of resuming its payments, or that it was not. In the one case, a great good would be achieved for the country; and, in the other, the house would get an insight into our transactions abroad and at home, which would amply reward them for the inquiry. If gentlemen would not vote with him on these grounds, they must make up their minds that the Bank would not pay at all: they might be assured, that the restriction would be proposed again, year after year. He begged to remind them of what had passed when this subject was brought forward two years ago. At that time, a most valuable member of that house, whose loss he deeply deplored, (Mr. Horner,) opposed the continuance of the restrictions for more than one year. But what said the Chancellor of the Exchequer? His answer was, "No; let us make it two years, for that will look as if we were in earnest, whereas, if we make it only one year, people will say, there is nothing in it." (Hear, hear, hear.) If the house acceded to the present proposal without inquiry, there was no probability that the Bank would ever pay at all. In our present prospects what was there to shew, that, in the next year, the Bank would not come forward under the same pretences? Here was the house, on the 1st of May, discussing the expediency of the resumption of cash payments, when the act said, that the Bank should resume its payments on the 5th of July. Some might think that the intervening period was too short to afford the Bank an opportunity of providing for the resumption; but unless the house enforced it now, or granted an inquiry, the Bank would not believe that they were in earnest. In fact, the Bank had never believed that they were in earnest. (Hear, hear.) It became them, therefore, now to shew that they would be no longer trifled with. (Hear, hear.) No man knew what was to come next year; but this he knew, that the fluctuation of the funds, during the last eight or nine months, arose from the uncertainty whether the Bank restrictions were to be continued or not. Amongst the great speculators in the funds, (he did not mean to use the word in an offensive sense), he must rank the right hon. gentleman opposite. His speculation was, whether he could not keep up the circulation of notes; because, on so keeping up the circulation, depended the whole of his financial arrangements. No man would refuse to admit, except, indeed, the Bank directors, that there had been an excessive issue of paper. They said, that the country had experienced no inconvenience from the excess. No; because a check was provided against a very excessive issue, by the return of the notes on the hands of the Bank, wherever they became too abundant. Thus, the Bank directors themselves cured the evil, without being aware that they did so. The right hon. gentleman might say what he pleased, but it reminded him of the story of the French gentleman*, who, not knowing the difference between verse and prose, found, that he had been speaking prose all his life without knowing it. The fact was, however, that within a short period, they had increased their issue of paper by no less than two millions and a half. Was this the way in which they had prepared for the resumption of cash payments? The right hon. gentleman in some resolutions which he moved when this subject was discussed by the late Mr. Horner, said, that the circulation of the country ought to bear a proportion to the extent of its trade, its public revenue and expenditure. He then attempted to shew, in answer to Mr. Horner, that there was not a greater issue than the necessity of the times required. This was his criterion respecting the issue of notes; and it was not only his, but what the house itself had adopted. Now he (Mr. Tierney) had made out a comparative statement between the years 1816 and 1817, by which it appeared, that the amount of the exports and imports, in 1816, was 81 millions, odd; in 1817, 87 millions, odd. In 1816, the revenue was 57 millions; in 1817, 47 millions. The budget, in 1816, was 25 millions; in 1817, 21 millions. The total, therefore, for 1816, was 82 millions; for 1817, 79 millions. Now, if the diminution in 1817 of the revenue and budget were deducted from the excess of exports and imports, it would be found, that in 1817 the sum to be met by the circulation was less than in 1816, by 7,200,000*l.* What was the state of the issue of Bank notes at both those periods? In 1816, the average amount in circulation was 26,500,000*l.*; in 1817, 28,200,000*l.* So that, although there was a diminished demand of above 7 millions, there was an increased supply of nearly 2 millions. But the right hon. gentleman, in forming his criterion, had totally omitted the circulation of the country banks. In 1816 it was extremely low; it was much lower, indeed, than it had been for many years before: but, in 1817, it increased very considerably, to not less, he conceived, than a third of the whole amount. Taking this increase, therefore, at 7 millions, and adding it to the increase of Bank of England notes, it would appear, that although in 1817 the demand for circulation, according to the right hon. gentleman's own criterion, was 7,269,000*l.* less than in 1816, above 9,000,000*l.* more of paper was in circulation! What became of all this money? There was only one way in which it could be absorbed, namely, by raising the price of every thing.

* Moliere's "Bourgeois Gentilhomme."

Could any man doubt that the rise in the price of stocks had been occasioned by this circumstance? He was fully persuaded that the object of the right hon. gentleman was, to keep up the circulation of Bank of England paper by any means whatever. This was obvious from the measure which he had lately proposed—a measure which ought to alarm every man in the country. For his part, he believed the country bank paper, generally speaking, to be a sound and useful currency; and nothing could be more objectionable than the purpose of the bill to which he had alluded, namely, to prevent a man from using his own credit in his own way. The right hon. gentleman wanted to prohibit the country bankers from issuing 1*l.* and 2*l.* notes, without they gave a certain security for them. Those who supported his plan had adverted to the number of failures that had taken place among country bankers. They had said, that out of 700 banks, 200 had given way. It was true that in 1816, a considerable number of country bankers had failed; but when the great number of bankrupts was referred to, it by no means followed that there had been a total loss to those who held their paper. Then it was said, that a great number of licenses had been withdrawn. But what was the inference? The house might imagine any place in which a great bank was established. It was the object of such houses, on particular days, to send a clerk to attend the inferior market towns in their vicinity, and he could not transact business without a license. There might, then, be a great number of licenses issued, all for one bank. Suppose twelve were originally issued, a diminution of business might induce the house to withdraw five of them. He knew one concern in which this had occurred. It was evident, therefore, that the inference which the supporters of the bill had drawn from the diminution of licenses, must fall to the ground. The whole number of country bankers who had failed since 1814, amounted only to 60, and he believed, that the London bankers who had failed within the same period, had failed for a sum at least as large as that in which all the country bankers who had failed were deficient. —The right hon. gentleman had two objects in view. The one was the continuance of 1*l.* and 2*l.* notes, whether the Bank paid in specie or not: the other was, to pave the way for the issue of government paper. The right hon. gentleman had confidently declared, that the metallic currency could not be kept up without the assistance of these 1*l.* and 2*l.* notes. This assumption was contrary to all experience, except for the last 21 years, in this country, and contrary to the practice of every country in Europe. How could it not be kept up: what was the reason that it could not be, when the metallic currency of France was kept up without any notes at all? This was, however, a subject that ought to be seriously inquired into. It was not surely to be taken upon the mere assumption of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and upon no other foundation whatever. With respect to the other object which the right hon. gentleman had in view, namely, to pave the way for the issue of government paper, he had proposed, that no country banker should issue notes of 1*l.* and 2*l.*, without depositing double the amount in stock with government, or depositing the amount in some other security; and after that he was to have a government stamp on the bill, as a security. Now, if one of these notes were to be brought to him, how should he receive it? He should not take the trouble to inquire whether it came from Exeter or Doncaster, or where it belonged to, but should say, "Oh, this is all right, it has the government stamp on it!" It would be government paper to all intents and purposes, and, therefore, he was fully persuaded, that this measure was intended merely to pave the way for a larger circulation of government paper. (Hear.) The government might say, "As we can circulate the paper of others, why not circulate our own? Why be at the expense of interest to others, when we can issue notes of our own without the assistance of the Bank of England?" The right hon. gentleman had formed a plan for issuing stock debentures. The right hon. gentleman shook his head; but there were two ways of shaking the head. (A laugh.) Did he mean, that he had never contemplated that plan, or, that he was now disposed to relinquish it, because he found that it would not succeed? (Hear, hear.)—There was another thing to be considered. According to this bill, any amount of notes might be stamped by paying 30*l.* for the license, and that would be granted as a matter of course. Any man might issue 1*l.* and 2*l.* notes in such a manner; and if the means of circulation were so given, no one could say what might be the consequence of such an inundation of paper. These were all subjects that required the most serious examination. It was very true that the bill was to be postponed, but it was still in contemplation, and it became the duty of that house to express some opinion upon it, which they could not properly do without a thorough investigation.—It had been said, that considerable alarm had prevailed, in consequence of the statement that the Bank would pay in specie. He really believed that alarm had existed to a certain extent, but he was sure that it was much more limited than had been generally imagined. He did not believe that any violent shock would occur. If the Bank proceeded gradually and gently, to prepare for the resumption of cash payments, he was convinced that none of those fatal effects would result to the country which it had been so much the fashion to anticipate. At all events, a committee should be appointed, to consider whether any means could be devised by which the resumption could be brought about, and to settle some limit respecting the paper-circulation, so as to facilitate the resumption, without endangering the welfare of the community. On a former occasion, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had asked, what complaint there could be against the rise in the price of stocks, as that in the end would enable government to reduce the 5 per cents to 3½ per cent. But it was unfair towards the holders of 5 per cents that they should thus be paid off, not as the consequence of increased national prosperity, but because the market at the Stock Exchange had been raised by artificial means. The right hon. gentleman smiled when he said that, but he thought it was a most important and serious affair. Let the house only examine how the plan operated. In the course of seven or eight months, government had raised the stocks to from 25 to 30 per cent. Who were to profit by that? The great capitalists, who had the command of money. But what was the condition of others? There were persons who had money in the fives, people who were holders of trust-money, and others who saw all the opportunities of profit passing by without being able to avail themselves of the advantage. There was not the smallest profit to them; but, some ten years hence, when the persons for whom they acted came of age, the bubble would have burst, and then they would have the mortification to see what they might have acquired under other circumstances. It had been often a subject of congratulation, that the rise in the funds had afforded a facility to country gentlemen to borrow money at a moderate interest; and that, in consequence of this, they had improved their estates. All this might be very good, but a day would come when the money must be repaid, and then they would see how they were entangled. When the evil day came, they would find, perhaps, that they could not repay at the same rate at which they had borrowed. In his opinion, the facility so much boasted of gave a superiority to the artful and designing over the easy and unsuspecting. He appealed to every man who had carried on business in the city of London, to every man who had been connected with the commercial transactions of the country, to every man who acted upon principles of honesty and fair dealing, whether that was not a course which ought to be abolished as speedily as possible. The old system of English policy ought not to be abandoned unless in a case of extreme necessity. The restriction of cash payments was originally imposed on the ground of necessity alone; and whenever the system was attacked, the answer had always been, "We allow it to be a bad system, and we should not have resorted to it, except from necessity!" He trusted that gentlemen would not vote with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, till they had considered the subject with the greatest attention; for the character of the country was at stake. The whole system was a delusion, from one end to the other. At this moment, all the other powers of Europe were directing their attention to their finances, as might be seen by the foreign newspapers. Let the house examine the proceedings of those nations. They would see them all endeavouring to avail themselves of a period of peace, all attempting to form some regulations for their finances; we were the only country that had made no attempt of that kind; and it was proposed to postpone the resumption of cash payments for another year, without a tittle of evidence on the subject. If the house would vote that, they would vote any thing. If they would vote that, there was an end to all security for property. The question was one of universal interest. Let any man's means be what they might, let them be ever so small, every man had his all to lose, and every one was equally interested in the question. If this system were to form a part of the permanent measures of the country, let the house say so at once, and all foreign countries would know how to conduct themselves with regard to England. If it were to be yearly, let the bill be renewed from year to year; but let it not be thought that while that course continued, they could set the financial affairs of the country to rights.—In time of peace, it was their duty to provide for war. Cash payments might, perhaps, be resumed; but if a war found them with their debt unpaid, and their cash payments unresumed, there would be an end to the British empire from that day. (Hear, hear.) It was impossible under existing circumstances, that the country could be prepared for war; but war would be provoked. The noble lord opposite had often spoken of the prosperous condition of this country as compared with that of any other in Europe. But now, France, degraded France, had faced her difficulties, she had braved the storm, and her government had brought forward a budget calculated to relieve her, by degrees, from the condition into which she had been plunged by circumstances; while the British Chancellor of the Exchequer constructed his miserable piece of machinery to enable him to borrow three millions, and asked that house to abstain from compelling the resumption of cash payments by the Bank, because the drain of money in consequence of a foreign loan would render such a measure embarrassing? (Hear, hear, hear.) And why was this avidity shewn in England to subscribe to a foreign loan? was it not a proof of a great and increasing confidence in foreign credit? whence could this confidence arise? did it not proceed from seeing that France was under a wiser government than this country—a government that dared to sift its finances, to shew at once its necessities and the resources which time would bring to their supply—a government that had sufficient manliness to transact every thing above board, to call things by their proper names, and to allow that two and two made four. (Hear, hear.) If any member of that house twenty-four years ago had predicted, that this proposition would have been under consideration this day, he would have been laughed at by every one who heard him. Never would it at that period have been believed, that the day would come when a Chancellor of the Exchequer, not very remarkable for his financial authority, would endeavour to induce the house of commons to continue the suspension of cash payments by the Bank of England, by telling it that the merchants of the country were sending their money abroad to lend to foreign states, and that therefore it must abandon all the principles on which Great Britain had, until that period, maintained her credit, and try to support that credit on a paper not convertible into cash. (Hear, hear.)—It only remained for him to state to the house what were the points to which, in his opinion, the committee that he proposed to institute ought to direct their attention. He would not have them meddle with the internal affairs of the Bank of England. Had he intended that, he should have moved for the appointment of a secret committee. But he wished that they should examine whether any public inconvenience was likely to result from the resumption of cash payments by the Bank. He wished that they should report what would be the most convenient and expedient time at which that resumption could take place, and to suggest the most wholesome means for securing its taking place at that period. He was desirous that they should also enter into the subject of the danger or inconvenience that might be incurred by the remittance of gold abroad; as also into the causes operating on the price of gold. It would be likewise advisable that they should inquire what was the probable amount of the gold remitted to the continent in consequence of foreign loans; as well as what might be the effect of the Bank sending out gold and repurchasing it; as also of the probable amount of the loss that would be occasioned to them by the operation. A great part of the Austrian loan was remitted in goods. —All these subjects must be fully investigated before the house could come to any decision that would be satisfactory either to him or to the country. At present, every man had his own particular theory. There were, no doubt, individuals who believed that it was desirable to defer for another year any inquiry into the subject of our finances, and any change in their regulation. For those who sincerely entertained that opinion, however much he differed from them, he felt respect. But the mass of the people of this country were of opposite sentiments. They wished from their hearts, that the whole system should undergo a thorough investigation, and be restored to its original and healthy state. What he proposed would lead not to a sudden but to a sound conclusion. All he asked the house was, before it decided on the proposition comprehended in the bill of the right hon. gentleman, to take every adequate means of ascertaining from the opinions of intelligent and well-informed men, whether the adoption of that proposition would be conducive to the public good. He therefore moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to take into consideration the State of the Circulating Medium, to examine whether there be any and what necessity for the further continuance of an act passed in the 56th year of the reign of his present Majesty, restraining the Bank of England from Payments in Cash; and to inquire whether any and what Restrictions on the issue of Promissory Notes by licensed bankers be fit to be adopted; and to report the same, together with their observations thereupon, to the house."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer rose, to state the reasons which induced him to dissent from the right hon. gentleman. He was glad that the right hon. gentleman had stated his case on general principles rather than on particular and narrow circumstances. He felt great satisfaction since he had last spoken on this subject; for, since that time what he had stated as probable to occur had occurred, and he should therefore now address the house, and call upon them to form a judgment not upon conjecture, but on what had actually taken place. He was of opinion, that the inquiries of a committee on such subjects as the right hon. gentleman had stated would be most unsatisfactory. The right hon. gentleman had assumed as a fact, that there was an excessive issue of Bank of England paper, and he assumed this on the fact of there having been an increased issue of paper during the last half year. But the data on which he had founded his calculations were necessarily imperfect: he had referred to the papers before the house, containing an account of the number of notes issued at different periods, but he had omitted one of the most important parts of the question, namely, the internal trade of the country. It appeared, that our foreign trade in the last year had increased about 6,000,000*l.* in the aggregate of our exports and imports. But our internal trade had increased in a much greater proportion. In 1816, the internal trade had not been so good; but it would be difficult to point out a greater revival than in 1817. The issues of country banks had increased in the last year, because the trade of the country had increased. But, another cause might have augmented the general issues of paper, and that was the purchase of gold by the Bank. A considerable sum had been amassed by the Bank, but that was accompanied by a corresponding issue of their notes. The advances of the Bank to government had also been assigned as a cause of the increase of Bank paper. But the accounts on the table shewed, that the advances of the Bank to government had not caused any such increase, and the house had also the authority of a director of the Bank, that the purchases of government paper by the Bank had not increased. That part of his argument therefore, in which the right hon. gentleman had assumed that the excessive issue of paper by the Bank had contributed to the high price of gold, must fall to the ground.—The right hon. gentleman had next brought into consideration the difference in value between the silver and the gold currency. The difference in value of the new silver coinage compared with the old was about 6 per cent. The new silver coinage, however, if it were 6 per cent. below the old, as the old had issued from the mint, was at least 20 or 25 per cent. better than it, from the state into which it had fallen when it was replaced. But if these circumstances had contributed to raise the price of gold, in how much greater a degree must the operation of foreign loans have contributed to produce that effect? In 1814, the amount of Bank issues was 23,600,000*l.* Gold was then 5*l.* 10*s.* per ounce. In 1815, the amount of issues was 26,300,000*l.* and gold then fell to 4*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* an ounce. The house must therefore see the difficulties into which the consideration of these theoretical questions would involve them. When there were obvious circumstances to account for the increased price of gold, parliament ought to found their measures on what was known rather than on what was uncertain. The right hon. gentleman had said, that as foreign loans were the ground of continuing the restrictions this year, they might afford ground for continuing them at all times; there were foreign loans last year; there were foreign loans this year; and there might be foreign loans next year. (Hear, hear, hear.) This might be very just, if the same state of things were always to continue; but he rested the necessity of the measure entirely on the extraordinary state of affairs throughout Europe. In 1817, France negotiated a loan of 12 millions. But, in the present year, the French loans were of an unusual magnitude. There had been two loans of 320 millions of francs each, and there would be a third loan of 380 millions of francs, making together a sum of 1,020 millions, which was equal to 45 millions of our money in stock, and about 30 millions of actual money. Of this, 16 millions were required for the liquidation of extraordinary claims upon the French government. There was a capital of 24 millions for similar claims. There was thus only 5 millions beyond the extraordinary circumstances in which France was placed. He did not pretend to say what proportion of these loans would be remitted from this country, or what part might have been already remitted; he had no precise means of ascertaining those points. (Hear, hear, from the opposition.) The house would remember, however, that Prussia also was actually negotiating in this capital a loan of 5 millions, and this, added to the French loans, must necessarily draw from the country much of its specie. Would it be prudent or safe, then, to remove the restrictions? When the first loan to Austria had been only 3 millions, the directors of the Bank of England gave it as their deliberate and solemn opinion to Mr. Pitt, as the criterion of their judgment, and the rule of his conduct, that another loan would be fatal to the Bank. In consequence of that representation, Mr. Pitt promised, that no farther loan should take place.

Mr. Tierney observed, across the table, that that opinion was given by the Bank Directors in a moment of alarm.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the circumstances of that time were sufficient to justify alarm. But the circumstances of the present day were still more alarming, when there was a loan to the enormous amount of 30 millions sterling. With respect to the present restriction bill, he would state the plain truth without disguise. The fact was, that the preamble originated in mistake. (Much and loud laughter.) It was inadvertently copied from the last act (hear, hear), and he admitted, that it conveyed a most unjust reflection on the Directors of the Bank. It stated, that it was necessary to continue the restriction, in order to enable the Bank to make preparations for the resumption of cash payments, which was perfectly false, although that had been formerly true. The Bank had made all possible preparations for resuming cash payments; and, therefore, when the bill came into a committee, he should submit a proposition by which the objectionable part of the preamble would be removed.—The right hon. gentleman had said, that, in 1797, Mr. Pitt had referred the question of restricting the Bank from paying in specie to the consideration of a committee. That was true, and Mr. Pitt had acted perfectly right in proposing a committee of inquiry on a subject so new, so unforeseen, so alarming, so little understood, as to its causes and its consequences. But now, should a committee be appointed to inquire into the topics pointed out by the right hon. gentleman, they could come to no satisfactory conclusion. They could know only what the house knew already; they could ascertain only a few simple and obvious facts, of which the house was as completely in possession as they could be. The right hon. gentleman had stated, that the committee would have to consider, not the internal situation of the Bank, but whether any inconvenience would be produced by the resumption of cash payments. But he would put the question the other way,—what inconvenience could arise from continuing the restrictions another year? Neither the house nor a committee could see, at present, whether, by possibility, a further restriction might not be necessary. (Hear, hear.) What might arise out of a future state of things it was impossible to foresee. He had been charged with not being serious in his intention of resuming cash payments, because he had limited the restriction to the term of one year. He had certainly proposed as short a period as possible. The foreign operations which required such large loans this year, would be closed in another year, and were of a nature that could not occur again. Whether France could require a similar loan next year, he would leave to the judgment of any man acquainted with those matters. Was it not reasonable to suppose that the great efforts which she had made this year, proceeded from her anxiety to have the army of occupation removed? She professed, that no loan would have been necessary for the ordinary and current expenses of her government. He therefore believed that France would not again require a similar loan. This was only conjecture; but it was founded on the best information which circumstances could afford.—The right hon. gentleman had spoken at some length of the bill which he had postponed yesterday. This was not properly connected with the present subject: but he must contend that parliament had a right to call for security from those who issued a currency to represent the metallic currency of the country—a power, in effect, no less than that of coining, which belonged to the sovereign. If any man were allowed to coin money to any extent, in what a state would the country soon be? The first principle of the measure was, to limit the circulation of 1*l.* and 2*l.* notes, at least without a security, in order that the poor might not suffer by their circulation. A second principle was, that the issue of paper on government security was preferable to any issue on private security.—He had been asked whether he had not once entertained the idea of issuing stock debentures? He never had entertained that idea for a moment. The proposition had been made to him, but he declared it wholly inexpedient. The right hon. gentleman had imputed blame to government for the rise in the funds. Some individuals might have felt inconvenience from this rise, but how many thousands had been benefitted by it? The general improvement in industry, the diffusion of speculation and trade, the revival of the prosperity of the country, the increase of capital employed in commerce, and the consequent increase of confidence, all arose from the rise of the funds.—He should now say one word upon a subject on which the right hon. gentleman had touched. He had asked, what advances were made by the Bank, and how they were to be reduced? He had now the satisfaction of stating, that the reduction of those advances could be carried as far as was necessary for the public interest, and even beyond what the Bank had thought fit to require. Sixteen millions had been reduced, and so much was thus withdrawn from the unfunded debt, or so far was the paper-currency reduced.—It had been said, that the character of the country was at stake on this subject. Whether the character of the country had suffered from its paper-currency, he would leave to any gentleman who was acquainted with the continent, to determine. The constant increase of paper circulation in England had been known for many years. Had it not been increasing during the war, when we were marching our troops over the continent, when we stood so high at the congress of Vienna, and when the peace was concluded at Paris? Since the peace, there was no country in Europe whose finances had so much improved. In no other country had the national debt been reduced. In this country our debt had been reduced 50,000,000*l.* since the peace. Our unfunded debt had, indeed, increased in the mean time; but, at the end of this year, we should be from 17 to 18 millions less in debt than at the close of the war. In this country alone had taxation been reduced; at least in no other country were taxes reduced to such an extent. In America the taxes were reduced 8,000,000 of dollars, about 2,000,000*l.* sterling; but what was that to 17,000,000*l.* which we had reduced? And here he must remark, that the two countries were so united, that nothing but injudicious and unwise measures could separate America from us. (Hear.) So far as any measure could ensure future and permanent amity, the Americans had used the most effectual means of ensuring the continuance of a friendly intercourse. They had repealed all internal taxes, and placed the whole of their revenue in the customs, which depended for their security on the continuance of peace. They had thus given such a pledge on their part, as must be highly satisfactory to those who wished well to either that country or this.—The grounds, then, on which he proposed to continue the Bank restriction for another year were simply these—the extraordinary situation of foreign countries, and the extraordinary relations of this country with them, were such, that no man of experience on the subject could think it prudent or safe to resume payments in specie at this moment. The attempt had been partially made in October last, and what was the consequence?—two millions and a half of the gold currency disappeared. The exchange had been said to be unfavourable; but how much must have been issued to turn the scale in our favour in a loan of 30,000,000*l.*? On the one side then, there were evils of a most formidable nature to be apprehended. But what inconvenience on the other side could arise from continuing the restriction? It was only the inconvenience of continuing for one year longer, a state of things under which this country had enjoyed the highest prosperity, but a state of things which could not be permanently continued, because it might occasion danger on any sudden alarm. On the one side, then, there were great dangers and certain inconveniences; on the other, no inconveniences and fanciful apprehensions. On these grounds he should oppose the motion for the appointment of a committee.

Lord Althorp thought it most extraordinary that, on such a highly important and most complicated question, resistance should be offered to inquiry. (Hear, hear.) Of the two grounds on which the restrictions had been originally imposed, not one was now alleged to exist: but a very extraordinary reason was assigned. They were told that the restrictions must be continued, on account of the foreign loans. This was the first time that such a ground had ever been alleged for such a measure. This was placing a question of vital importance to the country in dependence on circumstances not under the control of the country. Whether we were in prosperity or in distress, whether capital were abundant or scarce, foreign funds might thus call upon us to restrain the Bank of England from redeeming its pledge, and keeping faith with the public. But at least it was proper to inquire whether the foreign loans made it inexpedient to resume cash payments. The Bank might perhaps be unprepared to pay. He thought it would in that case be proper to continue the restrictions till the Bank could recal its issues: but it was necessary to inquire whether the case were so. As to the withdrawn bill, he had to observe, that it was not the mere security that a banker possessed stock which could establish his commercial credit. It was his character, his skill in business, and his attention to the circumstances of his situation; it was principally these things that people regarded in a country banker. Gold and silver were made our standards of value for other commodities, on the ground that they were less variable than other things that could be used for a currency. But it was evident, that the price of stock which the country bankers were to deposit as a security for their issues varied from day to day, and therefore ought not to be adopted as a standard. As he therefore doubted the prudence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in proposing this system, he thought sufficient grounds were laid for inquiry by a committee. One of the first principles of the banking business was, that the banker, and those who received his notes, should have the complete disposal of his capital. People would not receive his notes, unless they were assured that they would be paid upon presenting them for payment. They would not submit to any thing like the circuitous mode of sending them to London to be paid there. Besides, the plan proposed would give an unfair advantage to the holders of small notes, over those who held notes to a greater amount. These objections and others had met the right hon. gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer); and, therefore, he had expressed himself dissatisfied with his scheme, and had for the present abandoned it: but as it was not finally given up, and as no sufficient reasons had been assigned for its temporary surrender, a committee ought to be appointed to inquire into those dangers to public credit which it was intended to obviate or prevent. As the right hon. gentleman was uncertain and wavering himself in his plans and views, he ought to be corrected or confirmed by the result of a parliamentary investigation. These measures regarding the currency, coupled with the continuance of the Bank restriction, might be injurious to the country, and, therefore, ought to be inquired into.

Sir H. Parnell said, he saw no reason for continuing the Bank restriction, from any injurious effect which might be apprehended from the negotiation of foreign loans on the state of the exchanges. The right hon. gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had supposed, that the remittances for these loans would be made in cash. This did not appear to him likely to be the case. The remittances, according to the general course of commerce, would be made in exports; and therefore would rather be favourable than otherwise to the state of our exchanges. The evidence obtained in 1797, with regard to the effect of the loan to the Emperor of Germany, bore him out in the statement. It was not made in specie, but in the export of our manufactures, which had risen in that year from 2 to 8,000,000*l*. The sums remitted to absentees from Ireland were made up in the same way, and not in specie. The right hon. gentleman had quoted the opinion of the Bank directors in 1797, as authority for his present conclusions; but it ought to be recollected, that the Bank had then proceeded on principles which were afterwards admitted to be unfounded. The evidence taken went to shew, that their feelings were those of alarm and apprehension, which ought not to govern the general interests of the country at large. The reasons for the resumption of cash payments by the Bank were now strong. For the first time since 1797, that measure could be adopted without danger or inconvenience. If the opportunity for enforcing it were now neglected, another equally favourable from the state of the exchanges might not soon occur. Another great reason against any farther delay was, that by the continuance of the restriction, the Bank of England would be induced to join with the country banks in increasing their issues of paper, which would raise the price of gold, and render a return to cash payments more difficult than before. To the hazard of raising the price of gold, and consequently of all other commodities, thus endangering a convulsion similar to what we had lately experienced, we should again expose ourselves. The project of issuing small notes on government securities, by the country banks, did not appear to him to be any preparation for a return to a sound state of currency. These small notes would displace our coin, and would thus prolong the evil, instead of having a tendency to produce a remedy. The great source of the evils which we experienced or apprehended, arose from the conduct of government. So long as government continued to make loans in times of peace, so long as we delayed the adoption of those economical measures which would bring the expenditure of the country within its income, so long would the Bank be unable to return to cash payments. The excess of our expenditure over our revenue was, therefore, the great object to be attended to; and immediate means ought to be adopted to reduce the one to a level with the other.

Mr. C. Grant, jun. said, that the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Tierney) had brought forward many abstruse topics in his able speech, into which he would not now follow him, as many of them seemed unconnected with the point under discussion. The only question before the house was, ought the Bank immediately to return to cash payments; was the situation of the country such as to render this measure safe and expedient? The right hon. gentleman had argued, that by continuing the restriction for another year, parliament would be breaking faith with the country, as it had solemnly pledged itself to compel the resumption of cash payments in July next. This he denied. The legislature had given no pledge with regard to its future conduct, nor could it consistently do so independent of circumstances. It had, indeed, committed itself to as much as it could perform. It pledged itself to take every method of forwarding the desirable result of payments in cash according to contingent circumstances. Two things might have occurred to restrain it, and in either of them it would have been unwise to have fulfilled its alleged engagements. Either the Bank might not be prepared to resume payments in cash, or the circumstances of the country might be such as to render it inexpedient that it should do so, though in a full state of preparation. Parliament, by its pledge, could only engage to promote these two objects—to warn the Bank to prepare, and to take measures, so far as it could, for placing the circumstances of the country in such a state as to render the preparation of the Bank available to the end in view. With regard to the first, it had redeemed its pledge. The Bank was now prepared to fulfil all its engagements, but parliament could not prospectively determine the situation of the country. The right hon. gentleman had alluded to the report of the bullion committee, and had expressed a suspicion that the principles there established were not very popular. He (Mr. Grant) agreed in the justness of those principles, and only doubted about the propriety of their application to present circumstances. No general principles could be followed without a regard to particular cases. We had now for twenty years been going on with a currency of no intrinsic value (hear, hear); and might it not be inexpedient to make a rapid transition to a metallic currency? Nothing was so likely as such a precipitate recurrence to payments in specie to produce a pressure on the country. A rapid transition might be calculated to create distress, by narrowing the circulation, and thus defeat the object of establishing a permanently sound system. It was not in the power of parliament to command all periods—to create such as would be the most favourable for carrying into execution the best measures; but it was certainly inconsistent with its duty to select the worst. The right hon. gentleman seemed inconsistent in the language he had used respecting the Bank. At one time he had said, that it was anxious and prepared to fulfil all its engagements; and was only restrained by government from doing so. At another time, that it looked only to its profits, a part of which it ought to disgorge for the advantage of the public. He (Mr. Grant) thought that the profits of the Bank were in some cases perfectly consistent with the public interest. There were periods when the Bank might be compelled to reduce its issues to the detriment of trade, and when it would do so unless protected by a measure like the present. The periods to which he alluded were those of internal alarm or foreign remittance. The former did not at present exist, but there might be a danger from foreign remittances. That the latter affected exchanges there could be no doubt. Although these remittances were made in goods, still they must operate on the exchanges. The effects transferred for answering foreign loans were of a different nature from common exports. They might even reduce our exports by giving a greater relative value to our imports, and thus turn the exchange against us. The right hon. gentleman had referred to the period of 1797, to shew that this result could not take place; but the reference was unlucky, for the 4,000,000*l*. of a loan then negotiated had, according to the evidence of Mr. Boyd, affected the exchanges. That gentleman had stated that in February of 1797, the exchange with Hamburgh was 36, and in August had fallen to 31.—One of the right hon. gentleman's objects was, to get at the state of the Bank issues, for the purpose of regulating the exchanges: but parliament could judge of these without any inquiry by a committee, as it had all the facts before it without such an inquiry. All agreed that these issues affected exchanges; but they did not produce their effects without connection with other circumstances. The state of the currency was certainly more under the power of the Bank during the restriction than without it; but still, even though the restriction were withdrawn, and though we returned to a sound currency, the influence of the Bank in regulating that currency would be considerable, by reducing, for instance, its issues, in case of alarm. In these opinions he was confirmed by the bullion committee; he spoke of that committee with feelings of respect, veneration, and regret—respect for those members of it who still remained—veneration and regret for those who were now no more; but he thought that that committee, in coming to its conclusions, had not made sufficient allowance for the various perturbing causes which succeeded one another so rapidly throughout Europe. The difference which then existed between the value of gold and paper was owing to the extraordinary demand for gold, rather than to any depreciation of paper. Now, if a committee, constituted as the bullion committee was, came to a false conclusion on any part of this subject, what must be expected of others who enjoyed less extensive means of making a complete inquiry? That committee calculated the effect of war on the course of exchanges; and having stated this, they left us on the verge of an expanse, as it were, of an immane barathrum, which they indeed attempted to fill up with depreciated bank notes. He stated this to shew the house what were the difficulties of the subject, and how liable to err were even the best informed. The bullion committee had erred in attempting to define what was in its nature indefinable—the connexion of great moral causes operating in various ways on all the complicated system of money and exchanges. Could he then expect more from any committee appointed at present? The house was quite as competent to form a correct opinion as any committee that could be formed out of it: and, therefore, he thought there was no ground for refusing to abide by the decision of the house.—He should now say a few words on the subject of the coinage. The right hon. gentleman had stated, that there was something in the mint regulations that led to the exportation of gold, and made it impossible for the Bank to pay in cash. If so, it became necessary for him to shew that gold was underrated at the mint, and that the Bank could in no case resume payment when it was so underrated. Now it was perfectly clear, that before the restriction in 1797, gold was much more underrated than it was at present, and yet no exportation took place; the evil, therefore, was not occasioned by the state of the coinage. The right hon. gentleman wished to persuade the house, that something must have taken place within these two years to make any alteration in the silver currency necessary. Now the coinage was in contemplation two years ago, and these difficulties were then anticipated, and yet it was then thought right to make the alteration in the silver currency. We were now told that silver was over-valued. But silver was before under-valued to the amount of 6 per cent.; and as it was now said to be over-valued to the amount of 7 per cent., it was impossible to assert that this was owing to the mint; it was impossible for any mint to keep pace with those extrinsic causes. One cause of the over-value of silver might be the small demand for gold: another might be, that Europe might now be undergoing that process which took place in the beginning of the last century, when gold was becoming the standard of value instead of silver. But his main objection to the motion was, that the subject was one of such infinite difficulty, that the house could not be assisted by the deliberations of a committee. It had now to decide on a plain practical question of expedience.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, he could not agree, that because the subject was difficult, because it involved the most extensive and the most minute considerations, there was therefore no ground for going into a committee; those were the very grounds for appointing a committee. It was not enough for an hon. gentleman, be he who he might, to say, "I entertain such principles, I state to you such facts, I agree with the bullion committee in this, I differ from the bullion committee in that, my authority and opinions ought to have great weight with the house, I am quite sure the house is not so fit as I am to enter into an inquiry on the subject." No doubt the hon. gentleman had satisfied himself; no doubt he had studied the question. He (Mr. J. P. Grant) was not a person to say, that he was divested of all doubt; but he would say, that the house ought not to legislate on such a subject on the mere statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He could not admit that what the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said, either as to facts or principles, was decisive of the question. He did not believe that foreign loans affected the state of the currency at all. If the hon. gentleman would shew that any one foreign loan had ever done so, he would give up the argument at once. But the evidence of the bullion committee, the evidence of Mr. Pitt himself, were all strong to shew that foreign loans had no such effect whatsoever. If this were to be the principle on which the restriction was to be renewed, he presumed the preamble of a bill for that purpose must say, "That whereas the kingdom of France has negotiated a great loan in this country, and whereas that loan will unavoidably drain the country of specie, therefore the Bank ought to be excused from paying its engagements in cash." When that preamble should appear at the head of a bill, he should be ready to shew that it was not grounded on any one true principle or fact. If he succeeded in convincing the house that a foreign loan could have no such effect, then perhaps they would admit, that there existed ground for further inquiry. He would admit that at present the Bank could not, in point of fact, resume cash-payments, and that was the very reason why he desired inquiry; because, if any of the principles or any of the facts, given out as the cause of this inability, were, in reality, the principles or facts which prevented the Bank from resuming cash-payments, there was not one of those principles or facts that was not within the control of the house. If the obstacle to a resumption of payments were the negotiation of a foreign loan, that might be remedied by the interposition of parliament; if it were attributable to the state of the coinage, parliament could equally remedy that. He begged now to call the attention of the house to the evidence of Mr. Boyd, given in 1797, with regard to the operation of the Austrian loan. With respect to the remonstrance made by the Bank in 1797, on the subject of another loan, he should observe, first, that that loan never actually took place; secondly, that Mr. Pitt said, the Bank were entirely wrong in their conceptions about the effect of that loan (hear, hear, from the opposition); thirdly, that the loan which did take place in 1795, had no such effect as that which was apprehended, or as that to which the Bank declared that its stoppage of payment was owing. Mr. Boyd, who was agent for the Austrian loan, stated in his evidence, that none of it was remitted in specie. He was also agent in 1795, and stated, that the remittances were then made, as almost all remittances were made, by bills of exchange. Some part, however, was transmitted in foreign bullion, namely, the sum of 1,092,000*l.*; this was principally silver bullion, Spanish dollars: 1,042,000*l.* was silver; so that the whole amount of the gold sent out was no more than 150,000 of French louis d'ors; the greater part of these were purchased by the Bank, so that, if any ill consequences ensued, the Bank was itself a party to them. The loan of 1796 was transacted almost entirely by bills. If gentlemen looked to the rate of exchange at Hamburgh at that time, it would be found, that during all the time from which a pretence had been drawn to justify a stoppage, the rate of exchange was such, that gold was exported at a loss, and imported at a profit; and yet we were now told, that the stoppage in 1797 was owing to the loss upon exchanges. Whatever he might be in other respects, Mr. Boyd was a good judge of matters of fact, and could speak accurately as to the way in which remittances were made. This remarkable passage occurred in his evidence: "A remittance of 4,600,000*l.* he considered a difficult operation: it was necessary to vary the modes, and make use of all expedients. He could not carry it on by bills on Hamburgh alone, but by bills on other places also; and it was impossible to give a preference to any mode, but it was necessary to apply himself to all; by these means he made the exchanges favourable; if he had stuck to bullion exclusively, the price would have been so high here, and so low at Hamburgh, that it must have been exported at a loss." Gentlemen might wrap this matter up, as Locke said, in mystical expressions; but if they considered it plainly, they would see that, as between one country and another, gold and silver were not different from tea and coffee, or any other commodity. In this view of the subject there was no difficulty, and as well might it be said, that because we had troops to support abroad, the price of beef and bread must rise in England, as that the negotiation of a loan would make gold scarce here. We should not send out beef and bread, but cottons and manufactures to provide for our troops. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that 30,000,000*l.* had been sent out of the country, but would he say it had been sent in gold? When remittances were made to Germany, the amount of our exports was four times as great as at any other time. After all these facts, could it be said that a foreign loan afforded any reason for the farther suspension of cash-payments? On these subjects they were bound to consider what fell from the Chancellor of the Exchequer as entitled to some weight; but had such principles fallen from any other person, he should not have ventured to have troubled the house with an exposition of their absurdity: what he had been now advancing was within the sphere of every one's knowledge, and there was not a decently educated young man at his leaving college, that was not as well acquainted with the principles he had just stated, as the most profound calculator. If, in addition to the proof he had given, that the stoppage of the Bank in 1797 was not owing to the existence of foreign loans, he should shew that it was owing to advances made to government, the house was bound to inquire into the subject, and before they resorted to the desperate measures proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to find out the real cause of the evil, in order that they might adopt an adequate remedy. It would be seen by referring to the correspondence which had passed between the Bank and Mr. Pitt, when the difficulties first began, that the directors entreated the Chancellor of the Exchequer to pay the advances made to government, or the Bank must stop payment. It was Mr. Pitt's opinion, that the Bank was straitened by too large an issue of paper, and that the only remedy was, to withdraw some of it from circulation. This had also been the opinion of Mr. Giles; and that if the Bank had adopted that measure two months before the stoppage, it had been safe. But the memory of Mr. Pitt was not much honoured by those who professed to follow his footsteps, and who vacillated from day to day, putting the country into alarm, and devising no scheme to extricate the public from its difficulties. (Hear, hear.) As to the alteration in the standard of value, that had been suggested by the hon. gentleman who spoke last; and the surmise that gold was becoming the standard all over the continent, he could not answer, because he did not understand it. Where there was but one standard of value, by one metal only being constituted a legal tender, other metals might be measured by that; but where there were two measures of value subsisting at once, one would drive the other out. Under the present circumstances of the country, it was as impossible for the Bank to supply the deficiency of gold, as it would be for them to fill a reservoir that leaked as fast as liquor was poured into it; for while gold bore a premium of 8 per cent. it would be quite vain to attempt to keep it in the country. The whole subject was of the last importance, and demanded serious inquiry, to ascertain whether now, or at what future time, it would be expedient for the Bank to resume cash-payments.

Mr. Huskisson wished to make a few remarks upon this subject, more particularly after the novel doctrines advanced by the right hon. mover and by the hon. gentleman who had just taken his seat: in some points he even differed from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and they also required explanation. On this question he had found it necessary to refer to the report of the bullion committee; and although it had been observed that the bare mention of it must excite a smile of ridicule, he was willing to avow that he had re-perused it only this morning; and further that, in his opinion, it contained a perspicuous statement of facts, a well arranged concatenation of inferences, and a conclusion as indisputable as it was satisfactory. The question now was this—whether to the present circumstances it was fit to apply the principles on which that report was founded. He had not expected to hear the point disputed, that an excessive issue of paper tended to its own depreciation, and to a proportionate rise in the value of commodities, among which was to be reckoned gold, and bills of exchange in favour of foreign countries, and which, properly defined, were assignments of so much of the precious metal in the kingdom. The hon. member then read a passage from a pamphlet lately published, entitled "On the approaching Crisis," which he said was written by a warm and able opponent of the bullion report, and who seemed of late to have altered his opinion. It was true that the state of the country was now widely different: we were no longer at war, and it was consequently unnecessary to keep in the Bank a supply of specie: and he admitted, that the only ground on which a renewed suspension of cash-payments could be justified was, that the contraction of the paper circulation, which would be its result, would produce a general and a weighty pressure. Such a contraction would immediately force the exchanges above par, and induce remittances of specie from abroad. This had been the case in 1816, when the failure of one-fourth of the country banks, and the diminution of the paper of the rest to one-half, had of itself made an alteration in the exchanges. A paper circulation had always a tendency to increase itself, because it was the interest of those by whom it was issued; and the main difficulty of returning to cash-payments arose from this very circumstance—the system was now of more than 20 years' standing, and the issue had almost annually augmented. The proper time for resuming cash-payments was, when the exchanges were either at or above par; and if the Bank had been prepared with gold, and the act had not prohibited it, he should have been glad to have seen a gold currency restored last year, and he was convinced that the demand would not have been great, as no man would have doubted the solidity of the Bank, nor would the wish have been general to have changed a convenient for an inconvenient circulation. He doubted even, whether more gold specie would then have been required for the purpose than had lately been uselessly issued. (Hear.) Unfortunately, however, the exchanges were now so much against us, as to alter the whole complexion of the case. When 30,000,000*l.* were to be supplied to the continent, when a loan had been settled with Prussia, and when all foreign loans, more or less, were obtained from the capital of Great Britain, could it be said that it was a wise time to resume cash-payments? He had been surprised to hear the hon. gentleman who spoke last, maintain, that foreign loans never influenced the price of gold in this country. The fact was directly the reverse with the imperial loan in 1795, the greater part of which had been paid in bills of exchange and gold. It was a mistake to suppose that it was paid in goods; the thing was impossible, although it might be true that some of the bills were applied to the purchase of the commodities or produce of Great Britain. In 1797 there had been a considerable failure of country banks; it was, in fact, a period of panic, and a consequent drain took place upon the specie yet left in the coffers of the Bank; but the exchanges were much in favour of this country; upon Hamburgh it was as high as 36, and a considerable profit was therefore afforded on the importation of bullion. But the failure of the country banks, the panic, and the drain, had led to the suspension of cash-payments by the Bank of England; and he had therefore been astonished to hear the hon. gentleman assert, that the suspension of cash-payments in 1797 arose from the excessive advances by the Bank to the minister of the day. The late Mr. Henry Thornton, a man of great practical knowledge, as well as of deep insight into the principles of finance, had ascribed it to the great diminution of the paper issues of the Bank, and this opinion was confirmed by reports of committees of that day: in short, every impartial person, who since 1797 had taken a view of the whole question, had been of the same opinion.—Much had been said upon the mode in which it would be proper to resume cash-payments, as well as upon the time; but he feared that parliament could only fix the latter: it could only provide that cash-payments should be resumed at a certain date, and the rest must in a great degree depend upon the state of the internal circulation at that time. Upon this point the house and the country must be placed very much in the hands of the Bank of England. (Hear, hear.) It was impossible to dispute it, and he defied all the ingenuity of the other side to propose any satisfactory regulations as to the mode in which cash-payments were to be resumed—that must be left wholly to the directors of the Bank of England; their character, however, would be at stake before the world, and they would, no doubt, be anxious to be relieved as soon as possible from the inconvenient and pressing inquiries now, day after day, made into their affairs. He would not go into any numerical calculation as to the amount of the issues of the Bank, because he did not consider that amount any criterion of excess, which was in fact only to be looked for in the convertibility of paper into cash at the pleasure of the holder. For the general principle of currency was this—that the quantity of metallic money should be as small as possible, and the quantity of convertible paper as large as possible. Great mistakes had got abroad on the subject, and he could not agree in the praise bestowed upon a pamphlet quoted by his right hon. friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer)—he alluded to that of Mr. Weston—for the very title of it supposed an absurdity. It was called "Letters on the Means of increasing the Circulation of the Country;" now no circulation could be sound and safe unless it was precisely such as would have existed if the currency was all metallic. He thought that all the advances made by the Bank to government ought to be repaid, before the resumption of cash-payments. Those advances must, in the first place, limit the means of the Bank to procure gold. The hon. and learned gentleman had made a mistake, when he talked of two legal tenders; the fact was, that silver was only the legal tender to the amount of 40*s*. A return to cash-payments must call back the precious metal, and much difficulty and pressure would be created on the continent by the purchases of the Bank.—The right hon. gentleman then entered into the advantages that had resulted from our paper currency in promoting agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, and in enabling the country to make such vast exertions during the war. He concurred with the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Tierney) in thinking, that though some difficulty might attend the resumption of cash-payments, yet it was idle to talk of its producing any serious convulsion in the country. He fully admitted that it was the duty of the Bank gradually, indeed, slowly, imperceptibly, but certainly to make preparations to resume payments in specie. They should be ready for the season when, without any shock, circulation might be brought into its proper state of convertibility at par. The present was not that season. To withdraw the restriction now, would soon force the country into its paper circulation with renewed and probably incurable evil.

Lord Folkestone observed, that two years ago it seemed to be quite understood that the Bank should make preparations for cash-payments, and yet now, without any inquiry, the house were called upon at once to embark in a new career of paper currency, without seeing where it was to end. He insisted that the speeches from the treasury-bench all differed from each other in principle, and that particularly the speech of the last right hon. member was full of argument against the side of the question on which he was going to vote. He thought it monstrous that the Bank should, without any inquiry, be allowed to raise or depreciate at their pleasure the property of every individual in the kingdom; nay, that the Bank should think this so much a matter of course, that not one gentleman connected with it thought it worth while to say a word in explanation.

Mr. S. Thornton said, he could not let this question go to a vote, without asserting that the Bank had done every thing that depended on it towards the resumption of cash-payments. It had, by two successive issues of gold coin, endeavoured gradually to introduce a metallic currency. Inauspicious circumstances, out of the control of the Bank, had occasioned these attempts to fail. It had pleased Providence to give us last year an unfavourable harvest, and large sums were necessarily drawn from the country to pay for corn. It occurred soon after, that several of the great powers on the continent were not in a situation to maintain their governments, without having recourse to loans. These loans were in a great degree raised in this country; but as their produce would partly be applied towards the payment of debts to England, there was good reason to expect that the money would in a short time revert to this country. To these drains was to be added the expenditure of Englishmen on the continent, which was estimated at not less than 6,000,000*l*. Under all these circumstances, as a member of parliament, he could not but admit that this was not a favourable time to establish again a metallic currency. He could assure the house it was the intention of the Bank to reduce its issue of notes, but it must be done with great caution, and there might be circumstances which, even at the moment of resuming cash-payments, would render it expedient to pursue a different conduct. These matters of great delicacy, notwithstanding the reflections thrown out against the directors of the Bank, must be left to their discretion. On the question before the house, there were, in his opinion, sufficient facts to enable members to form their judgment. The Bank had done its part, and had no favour to ask; but the house as guardians of the public interest, must act with prudence and discretion, and not press a measure of this nature at an improper time, which he considered to be the object of the present motion.

Mr. F. Lewis contended, that a committee ought to be appointed. The Bank, he observed, had collected a vast quantity of the precious metals for the purpose of resuming their payments in cash, and if they were allowed to dispose of it for other purposes, they would find themselves as unprepared as ever, when a fresh call should be made for a return to a metallic circulation.

Mr. Grenfell was surprised to hear the restriction defended on the ground of foreign exchanges, and the demand for gold on the continent. It appeared to him, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was anxious to avail himself of any pretext for continuing the restriction. He regretted that the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Huskisson) would not give the house the benefit of his vote as well as of his opinion in favour of a committee, for all his arguments tended that way. With respect to the remarks which he had on former occasions made upon the proceedings of the Bank, he contended that that corporation had not been treated with any undue asperity.

Lord Castlereagh said, that at that late hour of the night, he should only direct his attention to the argument of inquiry, so strongly urged on the other side. He admitted, that it was one which was always of a plausible nature; and particularly so, when applied to a subject of intricacy. He confessed, however, that never had he heard an argument of less plausibility than the one which that night had been propounded. The motion of the right hon. gentleman involved three points of inquiry—1st, with regard to the private banking system which his right hon. friend had withdrawn; 2d, as to the currency of the country; and 3d, an inquiry as to what restrictions should be imposed upon the Bank, to prevent an improvident issue. Against the latter considerations he strongly protested. It was not, he conceived, the duty of that house to interfere or encroach upon the independence of the Bank. He represented that the Bank would be placed in great difficulties, if it were obliged to supply the country with specie, and to satisfy all the demands upon it, when it was a well-known fact, that the 2,600,000 sovereigns and half sovereigns which had been issued, had been sent out of the country.

Mr. Tierney rose to reply. He said, that the noble lord who spoke last had undertaken to simplify the object of his motion, and because the inquiry embraced various points, had endeavoured to simplify it by arguing that there ought to be no inquiry at all. The difference between him and the noble lord was this—that the one desired to know what he was about, and the other looked upon this as an antiquated notion. The noble lord thought it would embarrass the public mind and create alarm, if the proposed inquiry were instituted; whilst he was of opinion that the country never could be alarmed at seeing its representatives inquire before they acted. He regretted the absence of a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning), who had given to the chancellor of the exchequer, at the time of the discussions of the bullion committee, so severe a lecture upon the doctrines he then maintained. Had any body foretold at that time to him, that an hon. member, so severely lashed for his erroneous opinions on matters of finance, would soon after become Chancellor of the Exchequer, he should have thought the prophet out of his wits. But had it been added, that the lecturer, and a party to the lecture, (Mr. Huskisson) would also sit by this Chancellor of the Exchequer, and support him on an occasion like the present, it must have exceeded all human credulity. The right hon. gentleman, indeed, seemed, after much deliberation, to have made up his mind, that the best way after all was to speak the truth, and the first confession was, that stock debentures were not worth a farthing. With regard to the preamble, indeed, the right hon. gentleman had asserted, he had nothing to do with it, and that it was entirely a mistake. The person employed to draw it up had probably applied for some reason to prefix to such a measure, and the right hon. gentleman not having one at hand, desired him to find the best he could; the consequence of which was, that he took the preamble assigned to the last. The present motion would probably be negatived; and he sincerely regretted it, because he believed it to be the last struggle upon the subject of the national currency. The consequence must be, to persuade the public that there was a powerful body somewhere, interested in maintaining the currency upon its present system. That the ultimate effects of this perseverance must be dreadful he had no doubt. One of the worst omens was, that we had a Chancellor of the Exchequer, under such circumstances, who evidently had a leaning against all sound opinions, and who had no other anxiety than to keep up the circulation. The day of reckoning would, however, arrive, and he should be sorry to be one of those on whose heads the shame must then lie. (Hear, hear, hear.)

The house then divided.

Ayes, 99—Noes, 164.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then moved, that the bill should be read a second time.

Mr. Bennet immediately moved that the house do adjourn.

Mr. Tierney rose and quitted the house amidst loud cheers from the opposition benches.

Strangers were ordered to withdraw, but no division took place.

The bill was then read a second time.

SPANISH SLAVE TRADE TREATY BILL.] This bill was reported, and ordered to be read a third time on Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, May 4.

LEATHER TAX.] Lord Holland presented a petition of certain tanners, praying, that their lordships would relieve them from the present heavy duties on leather. The noble lord said, that this question had been already decided, in the present session, by the other house of parliament, but he trusted that something would be done hereafter to remove this very oppressive tax*.

COTTON FACTORIES.] Lord Kenyon moved that a message be sent to the Commons, "to request that that house would communicate to

* The tax upon leather was originally imposed in a very unparliamentary manner. In 1711, Bishop Burnet says (Hist. of his Own Times, v. ii. p. 563), "the house of commons in one branch of the duties imposed for the taxes of this year, seemed to break in upon a rule that had hitherto passed for a sacred one; for when the duty upon leather was first proposed, it was rejected by a majority, and so, by the usual orders of the House of Commons, it was not to be offered again during that session; but, after a little practice upon some members, the same duty was proposed with this variation, 'that skins and tanned hides should be charged;' this was leather in another name."—In a note on this passage, in 2 Hats. p. 128. (edit. 1818.) Mr. Speaker ONSLOW is made to observe—"The measure here spoken of, to recover the loss of the former question, was mean, unparliamentary, and dangerous."

their lordships, copies of the First and Second Reports from the Committee appointed by that house in 1816, to take into consideration the State of the Children employed in the different Manufactories of the United Kingdom."—Ordered.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, May 4.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (SCOTLAND) BILL.] Petitions against this bill were presented from the Merchants' House of Glasgow; and from the Magistrates and Town Council of the Burgh of Dumfries.—Ordered to lie on the table.—An address was then moved, and agreed to, for "an Abstract of Returns from the Clergy of Scotland, relative to the number of Lunatics in that part of the United Kingdom."

SAVING BANKS (SCOTLAND) BILL.] This bill was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday the 25th instant.

SETTLEMENT OF THE POOR BILL.] This bill was read a first and second time, and went through a committee, pro formâ. The report was brought up, read, and ordered to be considered on Wednesday next, and to be printed.

LAND-TAX ASSESSMENT BILL.] The house resolved itself into a committee on a bill which was introduced on the 12th of March, by Mr. John F. Campbell, "for the amendment of the Election Laws, so far as relates to the Land-Tax Assessment."—It went to repeal so much of the acts of the 20th Geo. III. 19th Geo. II. and 42d Geo. III. or of any other acts, as prohibited any person from voting at any election of members to serve in parliament, in respect of any freehold messuages, lands, or tenements, which had not been assessed towards some aid granted to his Majesty by a land-tax.

Sir J. Graham objected to the bill. In many counties, he said, there was not even a third of the land tax redeemed, in some a half, and in some a little more than that quantity. He hoped that the house would not allow the bill to pass so near the eve of a general election, as it would most probably create considerable confusion. He concluded by moving, as an amendment, that it should be committed on that day three months.

Mr. Bankes thought that the bill would be productive of considerable inconvenience at this time, though he admitted that some such remedy was necessary.

Mr. Wynn supported the bill. As the law now stood, freeholders were either put to a great expense respecting the certificate of the redemption of their land-tax, or were prevented altogether from exercising their elective rights.

Lord Castlereagh admitted, that the present law of registration was very defective, and he would heartily concur in any measure for its complete amendment in this respect, but he could not approve of the present bill.

Sir S. Romilly strongly supported the bill. If the measure itself were good, the general elections being near surely could not be considered by the house as any conclusive argument against it.

Lord Lowther opposed the bill, as being unnecessary.

Mr. Brougham observed, that considerable alteration had taken place with regard to the effect of registration, in consequence of the redemption of the land-tax. It was intended, that there should be a check to a man in the course of his voting. That object was tolerably well carried into effect till the redemption of the land-tax. Let the house see what a door was now opened for perjury. A man had only to swear that he had been possessed of a freehold worth 40*s*. for a year and a day, and upon it the land-tax had been redeemed; and when he was called on to produce his certificate, he might swear, that his freehold lay on a part which was redeemed, and the certificate of the district was perfectly accessible. (Hear, hear.) Would members say, that that was a system of perfect registration? The present state of the law ought to be altered, and he should, therefore, vote for going into a committee on this bill.

Mr. Bathurst opposed the measure inasmuch as it went to destroy the existing system, without substituting any thing better in its place.

Sir W. Guise spoke in favour of the bill.

Sir C. Monck and Mr. Newman conceived it to be a most salutary measure.

The house divided.

Ayes, 54—Noes, 90.

The bill was thus rejected.

CITY OF LONDON.] A petition was presented by the Sheriffs of London, from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons, in common council assembled, setting forth, "that, in consequence of a petition presented by the petitioners to the house, a bill has been presented for raising an additional sum of money for carrying into execution certain acts of parliament for building a new prison for debtors in the city of London, and for extending the powers of the said acts; that, by the said bill it was proposed that the sum of money necessary for the purpose of completing the building of the said new prison, should be raised on the credit of the Orphans' Fund; that, since the time of presenting the said bill, the house has been pleased to make certain orders for the production of an account of the revenues of the city of London, as the same have been received into the chamber of the said city, for five years, ending the 31st day of December, 1817, distinguishing them under the several heads; that the petitioners beg leave to state to the house, that several of the said orders cannot be complied with, except by making a public disclosure of the nature, extent, and application of many of the revenues of the petitioners, which were either bequeathed or given to them for, and are now applicable to, various purposes, all of which are quite unconnected with the building or repairing the gaols of the city of London; the petitioners further beg leave to observe, that parliament, by affording the means to the petitioners of building and repairing Newgate, and other gaols in the city of London, out of the produce of the Orphans' Fund and grants from parliament, have, as the petitioners submit, on various occasions uniformly recognized the principle, that the petitioners were not bound to build or repair the gaols of the said city out of their own funds, and they engaged in the building and enlarging of the new prison of the said city in the confident expectation that parliament would, if necessary, afford them the same assistance as had been granted to them on similar occasions; and they beg leave to state, that they have been advised and informed, and humbly apprehend, that neither by common law, statute, charter, or prescription, are they liable to build a prison of the nature and dimensions of the new prison; that the petitioners do not mean to question or dispute the right of the house to inquire into or investigate the management of any public funds applicable to public purposes, but they trust the house will not deem it necessary or proper on this occasion to call for any accounts of the amount or application of such part of the revenues of the said city, which are applicable to purposes quite distinct and separate from the general and public revenues of the said city; that the petitioners have many other objections to the production and publicity of the said accounts, which they hope and trust they may be permitted to state, by their counsel, at the bar of the house; they, therefore, humbly pray, that the house will be pleased to rescind so much of the said orders as respects the account of the amount and application of the revenues of the said city not applicable to the purposes of building or repairing the gaols of the said city, and that they may be heard, by their counsel, witnesses, and agents, at the bar of the house, in support of the several matters stated in their petition, and that they may have such relief as may appear just and proper."

On the motion of Sir W. Curtis, the petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

SUPPLY—DR. BURNEY'S LIBRARY.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the order of the day, that the house should resolve itself into a committee of supply.

Mr. Speaker having left the chair, Mr. Bankes rose, and said, that he begged to call the attention of the committee to the report which had been laid before the house relative to the purchase of the late Dr. Burney's library. (See page 1427.) He was an advocate for economy and retrenchment; but he trusted, that the resources of the country were not reduced to so low a state as not to admit of their affording some encouragement to literature. The house had directed its attention to this subject in times of greater public pressure; he would instance the case of the Elgin marbles, and no member, he thought, would fail to rejoice that the house had voted a sum of money on that occasion. The library of the late Dr. Burney was of the most valuable description. Many eminent persons considered, that it contained the most complete collection of Greek literature that had ever been formed by any individual. The splendid acquirements of the late Dr. Burney, and his honourable and useful services to the country, must be well known to every gentleman who then heard him *. That distinguished scholar had enriched the Greek dramatic poets by many remarks of his own, and other eminent critics, amongst whom might be mentioned the late professor Porson. In short, it was a library of which the public ought to be proud; and if it were to be dispersed, many years, nay, he might say, centuries, might elapse before so valuable a collection could be obtained. The observations which he had now made would, he trusted, satisfy the house that the committee had not been negligent of the interests of the public, nor acted in any other capacity than as agents of an ordinary purchaser. He should therefore move, "that a sum, not exceeding 13,500*l.* be granted to his Majesty, to enable the Trustees of the British Museum to purchase the Library and Collection of the late Dr. Charles Burney, and that the said sum be issued and paid without any fee or other deduction whatsoever."

Mr. Curwen said, he felt it his duty, however odious and unpopular the performance of it might appear, to oppose the present motion. He entertained no doubt of the value of the collection, but it was of a nature to gratify individual curiosity rather than to promote any object of public utility. Allusion had been made to the purchase of the Elgin marbles, an application of public money which he had resisted at the time, but which formed, in his opinion, a different case. They consisted of extraordinary productions recommended by their great antiquity, brought here at great expense, and constituting a noble study for the artists of this country. In the state in which our finances now were, and when it was found impossible to make good the public engagements, he could not consent to spend a single shilling upon any object of indulgence or curiosity, however liberal. It was not pleasant to him to make these remarks, but he considered them to be due upon every principle of justice to the public creditor.

* During the greater portion of his life, the late rev. Dr. Burney was employed in a situation highly honourable in itself, and of the first usefulness to society; for, as Cicero observes, Quid munus Reipublicæ afferre majus meliusve possumus, quam si erudiamus atque doceamus juventutem? He kept an establishment for a limited number of pupils at Greenwich, and to him the Editor is indebted for whatever advantages he may have derived from his education. In 1812, the Doctor resigned his school to the rev. Charles Parr Burney, his son, whose classical attainments and amiable manners eminently qualified him to maintain that high reputation which it had acquired under his father. Dr. Burney was rector of St. Paul, Deptford, and of Cliffe in the county of Kent, a Prebendary of Lincoln, and Chaplain in ordinary to his Majesty. He was also a Fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies. He expired, in consequence of an apoplectic fit, at the Rectory House, Deptford, on the 28th of Dec. 1817. His parishioners have erected a monument in their church, "as a record of their affection for their revered Pastor, Monitor, and Friend; of their gratitude for his services, and of their unspeakable regret for his loss;" and his pupils are about to pay a similar tribute to his memory in Westminster Abbey, as a mark of their love and veneration.

Mr. F. Douglas said, that although he agreed in the general principle upon which his hon. friend preferred to act, he could not forget that this was not a vote for the absolute sum of 13,500*l*. Independently of the deduction to be made, in consideration of it, from the annual sum voted to the museum, the sale of duplicates, which the accession of the late Dr. Burney's collection would render advisable, was expected to produce 3,000*l*. This collection embraced a great variety of documents, and of curious memoranda, that seemed peculiarly to belong to a national repository of authorities on every subject of literary or scientific reference. What seemed to him to be of especial value, was the unbroken series of newspapers from the period of their earliest publication, which he could not regard in any other light than as most valuable historical documents*. The various editions of ancient authors appeared likewise to him to afford the means of improving, to a great degree, the knowledge of Grecian literature—an object not less important from its connexion with that of our own country, than its tendency to inspire just notions of public freedom. (Hear, hear.) Attached as he was to classic learning, he could not help thinking these stores of knowledge of as much importance as the acquisition of that which cost the country 44,000*l*. and stood upon very different grounds. He trusted, therefore, that the house, as friends of freedom, would feel a warm interest in preserving this valuable library entire †.

* It is much to be regretted, that no collection of the Roman newspapers, the Diurna Populi Romani, has come down to us. Mr. Murphy, (in a note on the 4th section of the 5th book of the Annals of Tacitus) observes " that Julius Cæsar ordered acts of the senate, as well as of the people, to be committed to writing, and published, which had never been done before his time. Augustus, a more timid, and, by consequence, a darker politician, ordered the proceedings of the senate to be kept secret. Tiberius followed the same rule, but, as it seems, had the caution to appoint a senator to execute the office. Dio says, that he also directed what should be inserted or omitted. These records were, in the modern phrase, the JOURNALS OF THE HOUSE. In the early periods of the commonwealth, before the use of letters was generally known, the years were registered by a number of nails driven into the gate of the temple of Jupiter. But even in that rude age, the chief pontiff committed to writing the transactions of each year, and kept the record at his house for the inspection of the people. This mode of keeping the records continued in use till the death of Mucius Scævola, A. U. C. 672. After that time the motions in the senate, the debates, and resolutions of the fathers, occasioned a multiplicity of business; and, of course, the ancient simple form was found insufficient. Under the emperors, four different records grew into use: namely, the acts of the prince; secondly, the proceedings of the senate; thirdly, the public transactions of the people; and fourthly, the games, spectacles, births, marriages, deaths, and daily occurrences of the city, called the Diurna. The last were sent into the provinces, and were there received as the ROMAN GAZETTE."

In the 16th book of his Annals, sect. 22. Tacitus introduces to our notice Cossutianus Capito, who, in a speech levelled against that great patriot Thrasea, whom Nero was then seeking to destroy, is made to say, " the journals of the Roman people were never read by the provinces and the armies with so much avidity, as in the present juncture; and the reason is, the history of the times is the history of Thrasea's contumacy."—It is unfortunate that these records have not been preserved.

† In a former note (page 1533,) the Editor took the liberty of remarking, " that the most liberal and expanded sentiments are generated by an early acquaintance with the writers of Greece and Rome."—He now begs leave to add, that HOBBES, a violent advocate for arbitrary power, was so well convinced of this, that, in his Leviathan, he says, " nothing can be more prejudicial to a monarchy, than the allowing of such books to be publicly read."—LORD TEIGNMOUTH, in his life of SIR WILLIAM JONES, after having observed that he never spoke of tyranny or oppression, but in the language of detestation, adds,—" this sentiment, the offspring of generous feelings, was invigorated by his early acquaintance with the republican writers of Greece and Rome." His familiar acquaintance with those writers inspired him with a love of civil liberty, but it did not render him hostile to the form of government under which he lived; on the contrary, it produced in his mind a greater veneration for those wise institutions of our ancestors, which have made in this country the according music of a well-mixed state. In one of his letters to M. Reviczki, he says—" The original form of our constitution is almost divine;—to such a degree, that no state of Rome or Greece could ever boast one superior to it; nor could Plato, Aristotle, nor any legislator, even conceive a more perfect model of a state. The three parts which compose it, are so harmoniously blended and incorporated, that neither the flute of Aristoxenus, nor the lyre of Timotheus, ever produced more perfect concord."—It has been often said, by those who are ignorant of the ancient writers, that classical literature is " a mere knowledge of words." And what are words (as a learned author observes) but expressions of notions? And whose notions can be better worth acquiring, than those of the most accomplished writers under the reign of freedom, when authors spoke what they thought, and thought without restraint?—Many of the Bishops of Rome betrayed an inveterate hatred to ancient learning, as well as the natural effect of this zealot passion, in their own barbarity both of style and manners. The comedies of MENANDER are said to have been extant in the eleventh century. MICHAEL PSELLUS commented on and explained no less than 24 of them. (See Fabric. Bibl. Græc. t. i, 769.) The latter

General Thornton said, he should have concurred in the vote with more pleasure, if the facilities of admission to the British Museum had been greater. In order to obtain admission, it was necessary to apply to a trustee, and as the trustees were men of high rank, unknown scholars experienced considerable difficulty. He understood, too, that the museum sold its duplicates. How was the money so obtained disposed of?

Mr. C. Long denied that any obstructions were interposed to the gratification of public curiosity, with the exception of such rules as were deemed necessary to preserve the museum from depredations similar to those which had been made on the library at Paris. With regard to the merits of the proposed vote, the house had already recognized the principle upon which it was founded, by its annual grants for the purpose of improving and enlarging this national repository. He could not conceive that the public at large must not have an interest in whatever advanced the literature of the country.

Mr. Lockhart doubted whether the present were a proper case for the intervention of the state. The cases in which the state should interfere to make purchases of the kind now proposed, should be when the things to be purchased were at once of extreme rarity and extreme utility. In the case of the Elgin marbles, it had been alleged that the possession of those rare examples would inspire our sculptors with the genius of Grecian art. Public utility appeared to him to be the indispensable and only object on such an occasion. Could that be said to be the character of the collection which the house was now called upon to purchase for the country? It consisted chiefly of curious manuscript copies of Greek plays, with the annotations of learned critics. This might form a fair subject for the admiration and study of virtuosi, but presented no additional source of improvement to the arts, to natural history, or useful science. He could see no reason why the state should interfere to take the cultivation of this branch of learning from the patronage of individuals, or rescue it from that oblivion into which it might otherwise fall. He understood that the collection contained no one new Greek tragedy; and how could the public be interested in the solution of obscure passages, or in contradictory comments on an antiquated usage? If it could be shewn that there was in it any work which might impart a new light to the truths of philosophy, any addition to the present stock of historical knowledge, or even a single fragment of ancient oratory, he should cheerfully vote for the motion. As it was, although he was fully disposed to admire and even reverence those who excelled in these liberal pursuits, he considered that the promotion of them ought to be left to the admiration and support of individuals.

Sir J. Macintosh said, that he had been a member of the committee that recommended the vote which had produced the present discussion, and he felt therefore sufficiently disposed to vindicate them in the course they had pursued. He should not, however, have thought it necessary to say any thing in support of the question, after the just and forcible observations of his hon. friend near him, (Mr. F. Douglas) did he not think it incumbent on him to declare his protest against all that had just fallen from the hon. and learned gentleman, the representative of the city of Oxford. (A laugh.) He could not avoid expressing his decided disapprobation of every one of those reflections which had been cast upon that sort of literature that had hitherto formed the basis of education, not only in this country, but in every nation of Europe. (Hear, hear.) Had not those works, which were now described as the objects of an idle curiosity, been the earliest study, the constant exercise, the favourite models of the most eminent and accomplished of mankind? Did the hon. and learned gentleman really believe that philological knowledge, that the nice discrimination of the sense of words, which to the ignorant or superficial observer exhibited no shade of difference, could communicate no advantage beyond the powers of verbal criticism? If such were his opinion, it was an opinion fatal to the whole established system of education; the fundamental principle of which was, that it led indirectly and insensibly to an acquaintance with moral, historical, and political truth. It had been found by long, by universal experience, to be the happiest means of familiarizing the minds of youth with useful knowledge, and of breathing into them those generous and sacred sentiments which bind up the greatness of individuals with the glory of a nation. He should be sorry to see any branch of knowledge undervalued; but inasmuch as this involved the elements of our morals and our taste, it was of more extensive importance than any pursuit of what was commonly called science*. It was too much to hear the charge of wasteful expenditure directed against such a purpose, in a country which had more successfully applied the fruits of learning and science to the business of life than any other: the country in which a Watt had, by the persevering application of a single principle, surpassed every other individual in the degree in Greek monks, from bigotry, and a consciousness of their own wretched inferiority in every species of elegant composition, persuaded the latter Greek emperors to destroy Menander and many other of the old Greek poets. (See Harris's Philolog. Inq. part 3. c. 4.)—Fetters for the press were first contrived by the papal tyranny. The turbulent and profligate Sixtus IV. (Anno 1480.) was the first who placed the press under the control of a state inquisitor, or, in other words, appointed a licenser of it.

* The great and solid advantages which "verbal criticism" conveys to the juvenile mind, are exhibited in a masterly manner by Dr. Edwards, of Cambridge, in his edition of Plutarch's Treatise on Education.

which he had added to the wealth and resources of the state; in which a Davy, among the brilliant series of his discoveries, had at length invented the means of saving annually a number of human lives. (Hear, hear.) Surely this was not the nation in which it should be said, that knowledge and science were articles of luxury, matters intended for the indulgence of the opulent only. It must have been a hasty consideration of the subject that had induced the hon. and learned gentleman to make a degrading exception of classical literature; and he was still more surprised that it should be distinguished from works of design, as having less claims on the patronage of the state. He admired the Elgin marbles with as much fervour as his knowledge of the art enabled him to feel; but why were the remains of ancient sculpture to survive the productions of ancient orators and poets? Why was the statuary who restored the one, to take a higher seat in public favour than the Bentleys, the Porsons, or the Burneys, who illustrated the other? (Hear, hear.) The present system of education could not be properly judged of without a reference to its general operation on the minds and morals of society, which, in his opinion, were most favourably influenced by that feeling of enthusiasm for ancient writers, and even the disposition to idolize their works, which it tended to inspire. He had only to add, that the literary honour of the country was an object of no inconsiderable magnitude in his eyes; and that, with regard to the rules and regulations prescribed by the guardians of our national repository on the admission of strangers, he had reason to believe they were framed and applied in such a manner as to afford every facility to studious men, with as free an access to the public in general as was practically consistent with the objects of the institution. (Hear, hear.)

The question was then put, and carried without a division.

Rewards on Conviction Bill.] On the motion of Mr. Bennet, this bill was recommitted.

The Attorney-General objected to the entire abolition of rewards, considering that some benefit was obtained from them. He therefore proposed to add the following words to the clause which empowered the court to order payment of the expenses of the prosecution.—"And also such sum and sums of money as to the said court shall seem reasonable and sufficient to reimburse the person or persons concerned in such apprehension for their loss of time and trouble." This amendment, after some conversation, was agreed to.

Spanish Slave Trade Treaty Bill.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, May 5.

Loan Bill.] This bill was brought from the commons, and read a first time.

Spanish Slave Trade Treaty Bill.] This bill was brought from the commons, and read a first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, May 5.

Parliamentary Reform.] Sir F. Burdett presented 53 petitions from Leeds, and 32 from Halifax, each of them signed by 20 persons, praying for annual parliaments and universal suffrage.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Breach of Privilege.] Sir F. Burdett rose to move for the discharge of Thomas Ferguson, who had been committed to Newgate, by order of the house, for having endeavoured to interfere with the freedom of election, by writing and sending a letter to Mr. Dykes, to influence his vote. In bringing forward the case of this individual, it was impossible for him not to feel that the grossest injustice had been committed, when he called to mind what had been the proceedings of the house when the noble lord opposite (Lord Castlereagh) had been found guilty of greater corruption, and yet was suffered to escape unpunished. All persons should be treated with the utmost impartiality by that house. It was their duty to shew the country that the laws of England held one even tenour, and that the poor or humble could not be punished when the rich or high were allowed to commit the same acts with impunity. Unquestionably this person had committed what was considered by the law as a very heinous offence—he had attempted to influence a vote; but when he considered that the noble lord opposite had done all in his power to obtain for an individual a seat in that house, by a mode of corruption the most objectionable; when he considered that, for that purpose, the noble lord offered to barter the patronage which he possessed; when he considered that it was at that time the peculiar duty of the noble lord, as President of the Board of Control, to prevent any corrupt use of India patronage; when he considered that the person in whose favour the noble lord made the attempt was himself a member of the Board of Control; when he considered, that, in order to effect the noble lord's object, it became necessary to induce another violation of duty, on the part of one of the directors of the East India Company, who, if he did not take an oath, at least made a solemn asseveration that he could not convert his patronage into the means of facilitating purposes, such as that in question; and, moreover, when he considered that the noble lord was then a minister, it appeared to him, as it had appeared at that time, that the noble lord had been guilty of an offence of a most aggravated nature, and with which the case of Ferguson could not be compared. When the question respecting the conduct of the noble lord in that transaction was brought before the house, he did not press for any severity of punishment; he felt that the noble lord was acting under the usual system of corruption, but he happened to be detected in it (hear, hear); and, certainly, it could not be denied that, looking at it in a constitutional point of view, it was one of the most aggravated cases of guilt in which any person could be concerned. The house came to a resolution, that as it was a matter proceeding and not completed, and though they ought to be very jealous of the freedom of election, they did not think it necessary to direct any measures to be adopted against the noble lord. The noble lord was a wholesale dealer in this species of traffic; he was for buying a seat, but Ferguson had only attempted to influence a vote. In his case, there was no scandalous abuse of patronage. In his case, too, as in the case of the noble lord, the proceeding had but just commenced. It was in embryo; so much so, indeed, that the party might never have it in his power to carry it into execution. The attempt of Ferguson was so inferior to that for which the noble lord had obtained the sanction of the house, that he should be glad to know, in the name of justice, reason, and common sense, why the house had thought proper to send this man to gaol, while the noble lord was sitting there without having received any censure whatever? The house would remember, that during the administration of Mr. Perceval and the noble lord, a gentleman was introduced into that house under the most corrupt and aggravated circumstances. The money was paid to the agent of the treasury, Mr. Henry Wellesley, not to be put into his pocket, but to be added to a corruption fund, devoted to the purpose of influencing future elections for the ends of government. Now, so far as any infamy attached to parliamentary corruption, a more corrupt case could not be imagined. When the gentleman (Mr. Dick) entered the house, he was disposed to attend to the dictates of his conscience, but, on some important occasion, when his conscience would not allow him to vote with ministers, it was intimated to him, that he must either resign his seat, or vote against his conscience. To ministers it was indifferent which part of the alternative the individual adopted; to the hon. member it was not so, and he gave up his seat. Here, then, there was every possible circumstance of aggravation of which the crime was susceptible. To interfere with the right of voting would have been deemed a heinous offence in any individual; but it was ten thousand times worse in a minister of the crown. It appeared to him that there was in that house, not only a parliamentary language, but a parliamentary conscience. The member was told, that if he would not vote as the ministers directed him, he must resign his seat. And what was the issue? He could not reconcile his own conscience with his parliamentary conscience, and therefore he resigned his seat. Here was a transaction as perfect as an epic poem. It had a beginning, a middle, and an end. But how did the house act on that occasion? The corruption was justified as being a practice "as notorious as the sun at noon-day;" it was said to be "as common as the streets of the metropolis;" and, therefore, there was no particular reason for condemning the noble lord. Now, when it was perfectly well known, that in this way that house was constituted; when it had been shewn, in the excellent petition drawn up by the friends of the people, and presented to the house in the year 1793, that members were returned contrary to law, and to every principle of honesty and justice; when it had been offered to be proved at their bar, that so many peers nominated so many members; it was too unjust, and too disgusting, on the part of the house, when an unfortunate individual like Ferguson had merely done that which it was allowed had been long a common practice, to seize him under the pretence of maintaining that purity, which, in fact, did not exist, but of which they affected to be jealous, and to make him undergo a severe punishment, while they threw over ministers, who were detected in the commission of an offence of infinitely greater enormity, the broad shield of impunity. This robe of purity the house could one day wear, and the next throw off, just as it suited their convenience, though when stripped of it, nothing was to be seen underneath but "dowlas, filthy dowlas." (A laugh.) Could men look at transactions of this nature, without feeling that indignation which rose in his bosom? He remembered one of Æsop's fables, in which the beasts of the forest are represented as being visited by a plague. A council is summoned to ascertain, if possible, what crime they had committed to draw down upon them so heavy a calamity. The lion acknowledges, that he had committed some acts of tyranny and oppression, but that, all this being very consonant to his royal nature, he could not have produced this dreadful evil. The leopard, the wolf, and the fox then deliver their sentiments, each in his turn acquitting himself. At last the ass enters on his defence. He states, that his life had been one more of suffering than of oppression, but that one day, impelled by hunger, he had stolen a cabbage. Upon this all the beasts set up a shout, and declared that undoubtedly this conduct of the ass had occasioned the mortality, and, accordingly, they resolve to sacrifice him to the just vengeance of the gods. (Loud laughter.) If the noble lord was suffered to go free, why was Ferguson to be punished? The latter might state that he knew there were laws against what he had attempted to do, but that now the house of commons had put a very different construction on those laws; he might say, the house of commons have declared that these laws are obsolete—they are not to be put in force; how, then, can they take offence at my conduct? For his own part, he could not understand how Ferguson, who had followed the example of the noble lord, but followed him

"haud passibus æquis," should be punished, while the noble lord himself had been so fully protected. He should not then detain the house any longer. This case lay in a very narrow compass indeed, and therefore he should conclude by moving, "That Thomas Ferguson be forthwith discharged."

Lord Castlereagh said, he was surprised that the hon. baronet had addressed so much of his speech to him. He knew nothing of the case of Ferguson; but it was impossible not to know the object with which the hon. baronet had brought forward his motion. It was not out of feeling to Ferguson, but in support of that common cause towards which he had directed all his efforts. Whenever any meeting took place in the metropolis, at which the hon. baronet thought that he had lost some of his popularity, he immediately came down to the house, and started some question, in the hope that he should regain it. (Hear, hear.) This was the object, and the only object of the present motion; and having stated this, he must leave the discussion of Ferguson's case to those gentlemen who were better acquainted with it.

Mr. Wynn did not understand how any one could argue that, because the house of commons omitted to do its duty nine years ago, it was not to discharge it now. To that vote he was no party; he was, indeed, in favour of further proceedings. It was a precedent that stood upon their journals, but whether to be followed or not, was a fit subject for consideration. It would be a melancholy circumstance, if because one parliament omitted to do its duty, future parliaments should neglect what the law and the constitution of the country required them to do. The hon. baronet did not think it necessary to attend in his place when the case of Ferguson was brought forward; but now, a week after it had been disposed of, he came down, and without any previous notice, desired them to rescind their deliberate resolution. The hon. baronet had laid no ground whatever for his motion. What took place in another parliament, in 1809, was no ground. Besides, it was not correct to say that the noble lord escaped without censure; although certainly he (Mr. Wynn) thought the censure too mild. The next year parliament passed an act which declared, that acts similar to that with which the noble lord had been charged were penal offences. He (Mr. Wynn) was no party to the decision on the case of 1810, but he remembered that the ground of it was, that parliament having just passed the act to which he had alluded, it would not be fair to make its operation retrospective. To accede to the motion of the hon. baronet, would be equivalent to a declaration that the bribery of electors was no offence, and to annul all the practices of our forefathers from the earliest periods of the history of parliament. When the case came regularly before the house, on the petition of the individual suffering under its displeasure, it would be a fit subject for consideration, but at present it was not so.

Colonel Wood said, that the hon. baronet who was so ready to accuse others in matters of election, would, perhaps, remember when, in his first contest for the county of Middlesex, after a poll of 13 days, 300 millers were prevailed on to vote, in right of a mill which was not then built; that the sheriffs were sent to Newgate for gross partiality to the hon. baronet, and the election was declared void. On the second contest of the hon. baronet for that county, never was there a greater display of universal suffrage. People who had votes, and those who had not, were indiscriminately polled, till an inquiry was set on foot, prosecutions for perjury ensued, and, eventually, the hon. baronet did not obtain his seat. There was a third election for Middlesex, at which the hon. baronet was a candidate, when all the practices that had been resorted to at the former elections were exposed and brought to light, and the result was, that whilst the present member for Middlesex had 3000 votes, the hon. baronet had only 800. Such was the history of the elections for Middlesex. The hon. baronet might have forgotten those transactions, but the electors had not; and were the hon. baronet to start a fourth time, he would experience the same result.

Mr. Brand regretted that any personalities had taken place. The hon. baronet had alluded as slightly as possible to the persons whom he had been obliged to mention. The hon. gentlemen might laugh, but that had certainly been the case. Had he not said, that he rather wished the offence to be visited with a light punishment, since it had become of such general notoriety. He had not pressed what he said in such a manner as to be offensive either to the noble lord or to any of his colleagues. His reason for now rising was, to say that though he agreed with the hon. baronet in many of his arguments, he found it impossible to vote with him on the present occasion. If the motion should be agreed to, the house would be bound to pass over all infringements of privileges for the time to come. He should therefore oppose the motion, though he confessed he was at a loss to understand how those hon. members who rejected the former resolutions with respect to the noble lord could reject his hon. friend's proposition. It was for them to determine and not for him.

Mr. Curwen observed, that the bill which he introduced several years ago would have gone far to remedy such evils as the present, had it not been deprived of all efficacy on that point by the amendments which were engrafted on it.

Sir F. Burdett, in reply, observed, that as the noble lord had said so little on the subject now before them, he did not think it necessary to take any notice of what had fallen from him. With respect to what the hon. colonel had said about the Middlesex elections, he certainly had a perfect recollection of all the proceedings connected with them; indeed, no man could have less reason to forget them than he had. He had twice experienced the remedy which the house in its wisdom had thought proper to provide in cases of contested elections; and he could assure them, that to enjoy that benefit a third time would be out of his power. As to the votes of some of the electors not being connected with property, the observation came badly from the hon. member, who ought to know that most of the votes for the boroughs in the country were wholly unconnected with real property. The mill votes were objected to, and the election was, in consequence, twice referred to a committee; but that committee, though they had set aside the election, never came to a decision upon those votes. They were got rid of in a general way, on the ground that the owners were never assessed to the land-tax.—It was true, the sheriff of Middlesex had been sent to Newgate for the return he made; but under what circumstances? He could not have struck off the names from the poll-books of numbers who had voted, and he happened to return a candidate unfavourable to ministers; but on the subsequent election, when the sheriff refused to return him (Sir F. B.), though he had a decided majority on the poll-books, he was not sent to Newgate. The hon. member might, perhaps, easily guess the reason. He admired the consistency of the noble lord and his colleague, in punishing the present case. It would be futile to suffer his motion to go to a division: for one set of men would have to vote against him from consistency; and the other, in despite of the inconsistency, would vote against him: so that, between consistency and inconsistency, he should not press the motion to a vote.—The motion was then negatived without a division.

ALIEN BILL.] Lord Castlereagh rose to move "that leave be given to bring in a bill to continue an act of the 56th year of his present Majesty, for establishing regulations respecting aliens arriving in or resident in this kingdom in certain cases." He observed, that when the question had been last under discussion, it had undergone a very elaborate consideration, and its principles had been completely argued. For his part, he could never think that hospitality was to be carried so far that danger might result from it, nor could he consider that, when in this country, foreigners ought to be amenable only to its ordinary laws. He did not wish to make a permanent regulation on the subject, but merely to continue the law at present in force for the period of two years. The measure which he now proposed to introduce was wholly distinct in principle from the alien bill of 1793, the bill commonly known by the appellation of the war alien bill. That bill was passed under very peculiar circumstances. We were then at war with a power that carried on hostilities through the means of persons whom it sent secretly into the country for the purpose of creating dissensions, which plan was pursued to a most alarming extent with the branch with which he was more immediately connected. The law enacted at that time proceeded upon the principle that all aliens were, from the very fact of their being aliens, open to suspicion, and there was a fair presumption that they came with evil intentions to the peace and safety of the country. A place of residence, therefore, was assigned to them; they were constantly in view of the magistrates of the neighbourhood, and were not allowed to go beyond a certain distance, (ten miles) without a special certificate. If any foreigner, however, shewed that he had no evil intention, and appeared a person not liable to be suspected, he was allowed a passport, which entitled him to travel. After the peace of Amiens, even before the person then at the head of the French government was known to be what they had afterwards discovered him to be, the proceeding of the government had been one of great caution. They thought, however, that peace being restored, the presumption was, that foreigners came with innocent intentions, and not with hostile designs. The policy of the peace alien bill, then, was different from the other. Aliens were no longer confined to a particular place of residence; but, at the same time, the government was empowered to remove them, whenever their conduct rendered such a step necessary. The power thus put into the hands of the executive had been used with the greatest lenity. During the last six years not more than nine individuals had been sent out of the country; and during the last two years only three; of whom two were sent out in 1817, and the other in 1818. But the house were not to infer that, without this law, a great amount of evil would not have existed. It was fair to contrast one country, where there was a law for the regulation of aliens, with another country in which no such law existed. In the kingdom of the Netherlands, a number of unquiet spirits had taken up their residence and established themselves in an organized system. They became proprietors of the public journals, and, making the press their vehicle, gained such influence, and were so confident of their cause, that they were bold enough to open to a great power a proposition to the effect that they might have the protection of that state to their conspiracy, which was for the purpose of subverting the existing order of things in France, and establishing another dynasty. It was known that the conspiracy againgt the life of an illustrious personage (the Duke of Wellington) was concerted between persons settled in the Netherlands and persons resident in the interior of France. If no alien law had existed in this country, there could be no doubt that the persons alluded to would have carried on a conspiracy here, against the peace of this kingdom and of Europe. It was a duty, then, which we owed to ourselves, not less than to Europe, to suppress and break up those combinations against the general tranquillity. No experience could cure these individuals—all the calamities which had already taken place would not prevent them from again attempting to disturb the peace of the world. The regulations which he had now to propose had been thrice agreed to by the house—in 1802, in 1814, and in 1816, after Buonaparte ceased to reign in France. And now, for the fourth time, he submitted them on the ground that the evil was not so far gone as to admit of their being discontinued with safety. It was true, that, at present, matters wore a favourable aspect in France, but it was impossible not to look with anxiety to the removal of the army of occupation from that country. Whenever the foreign troops should be removed, he trusted that Europe would subside into a tranquil state of good government; but things might take a less favourable turn, and we ought to adopt every possible precautionary measure. The noble lord then moved for leave to bring in the bill.

Lord Althorp said, it was a strange argument of the noble lord's, that since alien bills were necessary in time of war, they should be continued in time of peace. It had always been the policy of this country to encourage the settlement of aliens among us. Many benefits, especially in the improvement of our manufactures, had resulted from this policy. The exclusion of aliens had been introduced in consequence of the last inauspicious war with France; but it was now time to retrace our steps, and to return to the ancient constitution of the country. If the noble lord would be at all consistent, he ought to have made the alien act co-extensive with the period of the occupation of France by foreign troops; and if he did so, he could not now attempt to continue it for two years longer. He protested against the bill, not for any abuses that had been committed, but on account of the principle on which it rested.

Mr. Lambton said, that, at present, he should content himself with protesting against such a measure in a period of profound peace, but when the noble lord proposed a second reading, he should move an amendment, which would go to reject the bill altogether.

Sir Samuel Romilly said, he could not suffer the question to be put without offering one or two observations. This bill was so contrary to the principles of the English constitution, to the policy of our ancestors, and to the feelings of the people of this country, that nothing but a very strong case of necessity could warrant the proposal of it. The noble lord had shewn no such case, but now proposed it on the very same ground on which he had proposed it in 1816. But in 1816 there was no ground to warrant it, and now there was no pretence whatever for it. He had opposed it in 1816, and, a fortiori, he must oppose it now. It went upon a principle, which, though never openly avowed, was now indirectly stated, namely, that the government of this country was to minister to the views of the despots of Europe. (Hear, hear.) Formerly it had been the boast and glory of England to afford shelter and protection to the oppressed and persecuted from other countries. (Hear, hear.) It was not yet 24 hours since he had heard it stated in that house, that although the burthens of the people were great, yet they could afford to purchase a literary collection for the support of our national character. The purchase was proper, but its importance to the national character sunk into insignificance, when compared with the present question. England had always been the sanctuary of the distressed;—for the outraged victims of foreign oppression her hallowed soil, once touched by the persecuted refugees, was absolute safety from further tyranny. He should be unworthy of the protection which his ancestors and himself had received against persecutions, such as were at the present moment suffered in Spain—he should be most ungrateful for the advantages which he had derived from English kindness to persecuted aliens—he should be totally unworthy of those benefits, if he did not struggle to extend them to others, whether persecuted for religion or politics. (Hear, hear, hear.)* They merely desired to be allowed to remain in peace under the supreme protection of the British constitution. Was this desire to be now refused? The noble lord had referred to 1802 and 1814, as periods of peace in which this measure had been adopted. But every one knew that, in 1802, the peace was a sort of armistice, during which, those passions which had embroiled Europe, had been for a moment quieted, only to spring up into more acrimonious hostility. But even then, it was brought forward only for one year, and that by the secretary of state for the home department. Indeed, it was natural to think that with him such a measure should originate. He was the official guardian of internal tranquil-

* The great-grandfather of Sir Samuel, (as he has himself stated in a speech which he made at a dinner of electors at Bristol, who had invited him to become candidate for the representation of that city in parliament, in 1812,) was born heir to a considerable landed estate near Montpellier, in the south of France. His ancestors had early imbibed and adopted the principles and doctrines of the reformed religion, and he had himself been educated in that faith. On the revocation of the edict of Nantz, by Louis XIV., he tore himself from his native country, and sought an asylum in England, where he had to support himself entirely by his own exertions. He embarked in commerce; he educated all his sons to useful trades; and he was contented, at his death, to leave them, instead of his original patrimony, no other inheritance than those habits of industry which he had given them, the example of his own virtuous life, an hereditary detestation of tyranny and injustice, and an ardent zeal in the cause of civil and religious liberty. The father of Sir Samuel was born in London, and, applying himself to business, acquired great eminence as a jeweller, and realized a handsome fortune. His mother's name was Garnault: she was also descended from a family of French refugees.

lity—the police of the country was under his peculiar care. But, in 1816, the bill had been proposed, not by him, but by the representative of foreign potentates. (Hear, hear.) It was then, for the first time, introduced by the secretary for foreign affairs, and for the preservation of peace in other countries. The noble lord had talked of it as a mitigated measure. In what respect was it mitigated? It was not limited to those who had lately come into the country, but extended to those who had been long established in it. By the returns before the house there appeared to be not less than 20,000 persons who were in a manner naturalized, who had adopted this country from choice; and those persons were now to be banished at the will of ministers; nay, what was infinitely worse, when any individual, from private motives, chose to complain of them. The evil was much aggravated by the burthen being thrown upon every one to prove himself a natural-born subject. This was often difficult to be proved, and the bill would, therefore, throw an obstacle in the way of natural-born subjects. There was one point which he wished to press upon the attention of the members for Scotland, if there were any of them then in the house. This bill went directly in violation of that great charter of their rights, the act of Wrongous Imprisonment. It had never, in any part of Great Britain, been made matter of legislation, that the king could send aliens out of the country. There was only the opinion of Judge Blackstone for such a doctrine*. But no one had ever imagined that the king had the power to send them into any other country. In the treaty of Amiens it was stipulated, that criminals should be delivered up by the one country to the other, yet this was done under particular limitations. None were comprehended in those stipulations but persons charged with murder, forgery (which was thought thus equally deserving of exception as murder), and fraudulent bankruptcy, and in these cases the evidence must be shewn to be so strong as to ensure conviction. Yet, when those stipulations had come to be acted upon, the crown was unable to send the persons charged with those crimes to the country from which they had come, and it was obliged to apply to parliament. (See page 1044.) There had been a similar treaty with America, and there was a similar necessity for application to parliament. But the act of wrongous imprisonment distinctly provided, that none should be sent out of the country, and the decision of the Court of Session had clearly established that this exception extended to aliens. The question was fully tried in the year 1778, in the well known case of Wedderburn and Knight. Knight had been a native of Africa, and had been bought five or six years before by Wedderburn, who had brought him with him to Scotland, and afterwards wished to take him back to Jamaica. Both points, his condition as slave or free, and his obligation to return with the man who had regularly bought him, were decided by the Court of Session. He was not only declared to have been free from the moment he came into Britain, but it was also found, that he could not be again sent out of the country. It was true that parliament could repeal this act, as they had repealed the act of Habeas Corpus; but, at least, the members for Scotland ought to be aware of this circumstance. It had not been previously noticed, but it certainly deserved attention. This bill, therefore, as utterly unnecessary, as derogatory to the character of the nation, as subservient to the evil designs of other countries, he could not suffer to pass through this its first stage without resisting it as much as was in his power.

The house then divided.

Ayes, 55—Noes, 18.

The bill was then brought in, and read a first time.

LIST OF THE MINORITY.

Abercromby, Hon. J.	Morpeth, Vis.
Atherley, A.	Power, Richard
Barnett, James	Romilly, Sir S.
Barham, J. F.	Russell, Lord G. W.
Carter, John	Sharp, Richard
Folkestone, Vis.	Smith, Wm.
Macdonald, James	Tavistock, Marquis
Martin, John	Tierney, Rt. Hon. G.
Monck, Sir C.	Wilkins, Walter

TELLERS.

Althorp, Vis.	Lambton, J. G.

BANK RESTRICTION BILL.] This bill was committed.

Mr. Tierney asked whether the preamble had been altered?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that it had, and read the whole bill as follows:—"Whereas it is highly desirable that the Bank of England should, as soon as possible, return to the payment of its notes in cash: and, whereas an act was passed in the 44th year of the reign of his present Majesty, intituled, 'an Act to continue until Six Months after the Ratification of a Definitive Treaty of Peace, the Restrictions contained in several Acts, made in the 37th, 38th, 42d, and 43d years of the Reign of his present Majesty, on Payments of Cash by the Bank of England;' which act has, by several subsequent acts, been continued until the 5th day of July, 1818: and whereas unforeseen circumstances, which have occurred since the last of the said acts, have rendered it expe-

* The passage in Blackstone here referred to by the hon. and learned member, is as follows:—"Great tenderness is shewn by our laws, not only to foreigners in distress (as will appear when we come to speak of shipwrecks), but with regard also to the admission of strangers who come spontaneously. For as long as their nation continues at peace with ours, and they themselves behave peaceably, they are under the king's protection; though liable to be sent home whenever the king sees occasion." (See 1 Comm. pp. 259, 260.)

dient that the said restrictions should be further continued, and that another period should be fixed for the termination thereof; be it enacted that the said act shall be, and the same is hereby further continued, until the 5th day of July 1819."

The house then resumed, and the report was received.

SCOTCH BURGHS BILL.] Sir R. Ferguson presented a petition from the burgh of Dumfermline against this bill.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Sir S. Romilly said, he held in his hand a petition respecting the state of the Scotch burghs, which well merited the attention of those who had taken that subject into consideration. It was the petition of the incorporated trades of hammermen, shoemakers, and others, of the burgh of Irvine, and set forth the great grievance arising from the complete thraldom of most burghs to some neighbouring nobleman, and from the power of councils to contract debts, for which the individual burghers were answerable. The petitioners, therefore, prayed, that as parliament had begun to legislate on the subject, it would restore to them their ancient right of electing their own magistrates.—The hon. and learned member observed, that this had recently been done with the happiest success in the burgh of Montrose.

The petition was then brought up and read. It complained, that for the last 50 years the whole influence of the corporation had been in the family of the earl of Eglintoun.—It was ordered to lie on the table.

Sir S. Romilly then presented two other petitions from the corporation of bonnet-makers and dyers, and from that of wrights and masons, in Edinburgh, alleging similar abuses, and praying that the present bill might not pass into a law, it being calculated to increase the evil.—Ordered to lie on the table.

PORTUGAL SLAVE TRADE TREATY BILL.] A bill was brought in, and read a first time, "to carry into execution a Convention made between his Majesty and the King of Portugal, for the preventing of traffic in Slaves."

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, May 6.

PARDONS UNDER THE GREAT SEAL BILL.] The Marquis of Lansdowne moved the second reading of this bill. He observed, that, after what he had stated on a former occasion, it was only necessary for him to say, that the bill had for its object to relieve persons to whom the mercy of the crown had been extended, from the hardship of paying the fees on suing out a pardon under the Great Seal, which most of them were unable to do. This was the whole extent of the measure as it had come from the other house; but, in considering the subject as a whole, it was impossible for him not to feel that the relief ought to be carried farther than the present bill proposed to extend it. At the same time he was very sensible of the difficulty of pressing the relief, which he was of opinion ought to be granted to its full extent, at a time when the revenue was deficient. No source of revenue operated to produce greater mischief to the poorer classes than the stamps on law proceedings. The expense they occasioned was an obstacle to the attainment of justice. Hence the numerous applications to the legislature for the establishment of inferior jurisdictions, but of an anomalous and unconstitutional nature. The institution of such courts would never be desired by the people, were it not for the difficulties they experienced in obtaining justice before higher tribunals. This was a state of things with respect to the administration of justice in which the country ought not to exist *. As to the present

* Many years ago, Mr. Jeremy Bentham wrote a small tract, entitled "A protest against Law Taxes, shewing the peculiar mischievousness of all such impositions as add to the expense of Appeal to Justice." He observes, that "a tax on bread, though a tax on consumption, would hardly be reckoned a good tax; bread being reckoned among the necessaries of life. A tax on bread, however, would not be near so bad a tax as one on law proceedings: A man who pays to a tax on bread, may, indeed, by reason of such payment, be unable to get so much bread as he wants, but he will always get some bread, and in proportion as he pays more and more to the tax, he will get more and more bread. Of a tax upon justice, the effect may be, that after he has paid the tax, he may, without getting justice by the payment, lose bread by it: bread, the whole quantity on which he depended for the subsistence of himself and his family for the season, may, as well as any thing else, be the very thing for which he is obliged to apply to justice. Were a three-penny stamp to be put upon every three-penny loaf, a man who had but three pence to spend in bread, could no longer indeed get a three-penny loaf, but an obliging baker would cut him out the half of one. A tax on justice admits of no such retrenchment. The most obliging stationer could not cut a man out half a latitat nor half a declaration. Half justice, were it to be had, is better than no justice: but without buying the whole weight of paper, there is no getting a grain of justice." He then proceeds to prove —that a law tax is the worst of all taxes, actual or possible;—that for the most part it is a denial of justice, that at the best, it is a tax upon distress:—that it lays the burthen, not where there is most, but where there is least, benefit:—that it co-operates with every injury, and with every crime:—that the persons on whom it bears hardest, are those on whom a burthen of every kind lies heaviest, and that they compose the great majority of the people:—that so far from being a check, it is an encouragement to litigation: and that it operates in direct breach of Magna Charta, that venerable monument, commonly regarded as the foundation of English liberty.—He observes, that "the statesman who cares not what mischief he does, so he does it without disturbance, may lay on law taxes without end: he who makes a conscience to abstain from mischief will abstain from measure, it went merely to relieve unfortunate persons from paying the fees on pardons, which amounted on each to about 60*l.* and therefore it could operate in a very slight degree towards the reduction of the revenue.

The bill was read a second time.

LOAN BILL.] This bill was read a second time, and the committee being dispensed with, was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, May 6.

CITY OF LONDON.] The following accounts (ordered on the 28th of April) were presented, and ordered to lie on the table. 1. Balance of unclaimed dividends due to proprietors of orphans' stock. 2. Amount of duties on coals and wine. 3. Balances of wine duty. 4. Monthly payments and balances of duty on coals.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (SCOTLAND) BILL.] A petition of freeholders and justices of the peace of Aberdeenshire against this bill was presented, and ordered to lie on the table.

The following abstract of Returns from the clergy of Scotland, respecting the number of Lunatics in that part of the kingdom, was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. At large, 2840; confined, 649; male, 1643; female, 1761; adult, 2769; non adult, 576; furious, 622; fatuous, 2688; maintained by parish, 533; partly by parish, 944; wholly by relations, 1020: total, 3486.

PARISH VESTRIES BILL.] On the motion of Mr. S. Bourne, the report of this bill was taken into farther consideration.

Mr. D. Gilbert moved an amendment, by which a person not assessed at 5l. per annum should be precluded from voting at the vestries. He observed, that he had heard and known of many evil effects arising from tumultuous vestry meetings, which had often only a tendency to squander the parish money.

Mr. Bourne thought the amendment proposed, adding to them : he whose ambition it is to extirpate mischief, will repeal them. General error makes law, says a maxim in use among lawyers. It makes at any rate an apology for law: but when the error is pointed out, the apology is gone."

In the notes to a second edition of this tract, Mr. Bentham writes as follows: "Mem.—Anno. 1796. At a dinner of Mr. M. P.'s, in —— Street, Mr. R. in the presence of Mr. William Pitt, (then minister) took me aside, and told me that they had read my Pamphlet on Law Taxes; that the reasons against them were unanswerable, and it was determined there should be no more of them.

"Anno, 1804, July 10, 12, 14, 18.—This being in the number of Mr. Addington's taxes, Mr. Pitt, upon returning to office, took up all those taxes in the lump. On the above days, this tax was opposed in the House of Commons: and Mr. Windham, according to the report in The Times, on one of those days, spoke of this Pamphlet as containing complete information on the subject; observing at the same time, that it was out of print. On behalf of administration, nothing like an answer to any of the objections was attempted: only the Attorney-General (Perceval) said, that the addition to those taxes, was no more than equal to the depreciation of money.

"26th February, 1816.—Unalleviated by any adequate hope of use, too painful would be the task, of hunting out, and holding up to view, the subsequent additions which this worst of oppressions has, in this interval of twenty years, been receiving.

"Money, it is said, must be had, and no other taxes can be found. The justification being conclusive, the tax receives its increase: next year, from the same hand, flow others in abundance.

"Grievous enough is the Income tax, called, lest it should be thought to be what it is, the Property tax. —Grievous that tax is, whatever be its name; yet, sum for sum, compared with this tax, it is a blessing. Instead of 10 per cent, suppose it 80 per cent. Less bad would it be to add yet another 10 per cent. than a tax to an equal amount upon justice.

"Grievous have been the additions, so lately and repeatedly made, to the taxes on Conveyances and Agreements. Extensive the prohibitory part of the effect, though the pressure,—confined as usual to the poor, i. e. the great majority of the community, who have none to speak for them,—is scarcely complained of by the rich. Yet, were all law taxes taken off, and the amount thrown upon Conveyances and Agreements, this—even this—would in reality be an indulgence."

Mr. Bentham then mentions two cases which had recently occurred in the Court of Chancery.—"In one case, the defendant, in his answer to the plaintiff's bill, submitted, that he ought not to be compelled to set out certain accounts which had been required by the bill, as the expense of taking what is called an office copy of them,—a necessary preliminary to any farther proceeding on the part of the plaintiff in the cause,—would amount to the sum of 29,000*l.* an expense almost wholly arising from the Stamps on Paper, on which the office copy of the answer is compulsorily made. In that case the court determined, that it was not necessary these accounts should be set out: but in coming to this conclusion, how far the court was determined by the nature of the particular case, or by the magnitude of the expense that would thus be occasioned;—or whether if, without any such objection, the Defendant had actually set out these accounts, the Plaintiff could have been relieved from pursuing the regular mode of procuring a copy of them, and thus incurring the above expense;—or whether, if the expense had been instead of 29,000*l.* only 28 or 27 thousand pounds, such an objection would have been listened to,— it is extremely difficult to say."

"The other case was,—that the expense of merely putting in an answer by one of the defendants to a bill in Equity, amounted to the sum of 800*l.*: what part of this expense was occasioned by the tax on law proceedings cannot be accurately ascertained, but it assuredly constituted a very considerable proportion of that sum."

"The one case shews, that it is not always safe for a man to become a plaintiff, without 28,000*l.* at least in his pocket, to begin with, over and above what is necessary for his maintenance. The other case shews, that a man may not be always able to resist a demand, however unjust it may be, without being able to support an outlay of at least 800*l.*!"

a matter of importance, but he could not see that it was desirable to press it at present, as it went a good deal further than what was proposed by the bill. He considered that the bill, as it stood, would tend to produce economical management, and to increase the comforts of the poor. It had long been circulated through the country, but, as appeared by several petitions, had been misapprehended in many places. The sums which entitled persons to vote had been reduced one half, namely from 100*l.* to 50*l.* and from 50*l.* to 25*l.* (see page 984) and it was farther provided, that no inhabitant should be entitled to give more than six votes. He trusted the house would let the bill come before them again in its present state, and that the hon. member would withdraw his amendment, otherwise he must feel it right to take the sense of the house upon it.

Mr. D. Gilbert said, that though the subject was of importance, he would not press the house to a division.

The report was then agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

POOR LAWS' AMENDMENT BILL.] On the motion of Mr. S. Bourne, the report of this bill was taken into further consideration.

General Thornton moved that the clause obliging landlords to pay rates for houses let at any rent not exceeding 20*l.*, nor less than 4*l.* by the year, for any less term than one year, or on any agreement by which the rent should be reserved or made payable at or within any shorter period than 3 months—be expunged.

Mr. Speaker.—Does any one second the motion?

None having seconded this motion, it dropped of course.

The report was then agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that, considering the interest that had been taken in the different provisions of this bill, it might be expedient to send it as early as possible to the other house, with a view to which he should postpone the second reading of the alien-bill till Friday se'nnight.

BUILDING OF CHURCHES BILL.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the further consideration of the report of this bill.

On the motion of the same right hon. gentleman, the bill was then recommitted, and several verbal amendments introduced.

Dr. Phillimore proposed a clause to prevent the opening of any grave, cemetery, or church-yard for the interment of dead bodies, within twenty feet of the site of every new church respectively, unless such grave, &c. be enclosed by an arched stone or brick vault, under the penalty of 50*l.*

The clause was adopted, and the report being agreed to, the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

GRAND JURY PRESENTMENTS (IRELAND) BILL.] Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald moved for leave to bring in a bill "to provide for the more deliberate investigation of presentments to be made by grand juries for roads and public works in Ireland, and for accounting for money raised by such presentments." He stated, that in consequence of the impossibility of procuring competent persons to fill the office of county surveyors, that part of the act of last session had been suspended early in the present. In the bill which he now intended to introduce, the clause for the appointment of county surveyors would be omitted altogether, and no alteration would be madé as to the time of making presentments. His object was, to enable the grand juries to transact their business with greater facilities than they now possessed, and to check the present system of taking oaths, which was most offensive to the best interests of religion and morality, and most dangerous to the people at large.

Sir George Hill seconded the motion.

Mr. Denis Browne had no objection to the introduction of the bill, but desired to observe, that the grand juries were not chargeable with any defect in the present system. The money levied by them was applied not merely in the construction of roads and the building of bridges, but in paying constables, supporting gaols, and a variety of other local objects.

Sir H. Parnell approved of the motion, but wished another effort to be made to carry into execution the system of county surveyors.

Mr. Peel said, that he had been last year friendly to the appointment of county surveyors, but, on mature consideration, he had seen reason to change his opinion. There had been a fair trial, and the commissioners reported, that they could not find any person sufficiently qualified for the office, although ninety-five persons had applied for it. Every certificate produced to them bore on the face of it the most respectable qualifications, but it was not confirmed by subsequent examinations.

Leave was then given to bring in the bill.

CORONERS ELECTION BILL.] This bill was considered in a committee, and ordered to be reported to-morrow.

PURCHASE OF GAME BILL.] Mr. George Bankes having moved the second reading of this bill,

Mr. Curwen said, he did not think that the discussion of a bill of such importance should be brought on in so thin a house. He recommended to the hon. gentleman to postpone the second reading till there should be a fuller attendance.

Mr. G. Bankes objected to the postponing of the second reading any longer. He had put off the discussion too often already at the recommendation of hon. members. It was extremely necessary that the second reading should take place before the holidays, if it were to take place at all. He had reconsidered the measure now proposed, and saw no reason to alter the opinion he had formerly stated. He brought in the bill on the principle that every branch of the law should be rendered effective, so long as the law itself was not repealed. So long as we had statutes against the sale of game, we ought to give them effect by provisions calculated to ensure their execution, and proceed as far as we could in preventing the punishment for offences, by taking away the temptation to commit them. This bill placed the purchaser of game on the same footing with the seller, and levelled all distinctions of classes, by subjecting them to the same penalty. He knew that there were gentlemen of a different opinion from that which he was now supporting, and who thought that game ought to be allowed to be sold in the most unrestricted manner. A report had been made to the house on the game laws, in which there was a recommendation to make game private property. That report had been laid on the table of the house two years ago, and had as yet produced nothing. When any member should bring forward a comprehensive measure founded on that report, he should be willing to agree to the repeal of all the game laws; but so long as they existed, their operation should be made uniform, which was the object of the present bill*. The game-laws had now, instead

* The following is the Report here alluded to.

"The committee appointed to take into consideration the laws relating to game, and to report their observations and opinion thereupon from time to time to the house, have considered the matters to them referred, and agreed upon the following report:

Your committee, in investigating this important subject, proceeded to the consideration of the present existing laws for the preservation of game; their adequacy to their professed object; their policy and justice; and their effects upon the habits and morals of the lower orders of the community. In considering the existing state of the law upon this subject, their attention was naturally directed, in the first place, to its state in the early periods of the common law; and in that your committee finds concurrent and undisturbed authorities for contemplating game as the exclusive right of the proprietor of the land ratione soli. In a law of Canute's (vide 4th Institutes, p. 230,) your committee find that he thus expresses himself: Præterea autem concedo ut in propriis ipsius prædiis quisque tam in agris quam in sylvis excitet agitetque feras; and in Blackstone II. p. 415, Sit quilibet homo dignus venatione sua in sylvâ et in agris situ propriis et in dominio suo. In the preamble of the statutes 11th Hen. VII. c. 17. a parliamentary recognition of the common law is most distinctly made, and in unequivocal language. It states, that persons of little substance destroy pheasants and partridges upon the lordships, manors, lands, and tenements of divers owners and possessioners of the same, without license, consent, or agreement of the same possessioners, by which the same lose not only their pleasure and disport, that they, their friends, and servants should have about hawking, hunting, and taking of the same, but also they lose the profit and avail that should grow to their household, &c.

In the 4th Institutes, p. 304. it is laid down, that seeing the wild beasts do belong to the purlieu men ratione soli, so long as they remain in his grounds he may kill them, for the property ratione soli is in him. In 11 Coke's Reports, p. 876. it is laid down, that for hawking, hunting, &c. there needeth not any license, but every one may, in his own land, use them at his pleasure, without any restraint to be made, if not by parliament, as appears by the statutes 11 Hen. VII. c. 17. 23 Eliz. c. 10. and 3 James I. c. 13.

In Sutton and Moody, 5 Modern Reports, p. 375, Holt, C. Justice, says, the conies are as much his, in his ground, as if they were in a warren, and the property is ratione soli. So in the Year-book, 12 Hen. VIII. pl. 10. if a man start a hare in his own ground, he has a property in it ratione soli.

In limitation, and to a certain degree in derogation of the common law, a variety of statutes has subjected to penalties persons who, not having certain qualifications, shall even upon their own lands kill any of those wild animals, which come under the denomination of game.

By the 13 Richard II. stat. 1. c. 13. laymen not having 40s. per annum, and priests not having 10l. per annum, are prohibited from taking or destroying conies, hares, &c. under pain of a year's imprisonment (this statute appears to be the first introduction of a qualification to kill game.) By the 32 Henry VIII. c. 8. a penalty upon selling game was first enacted; but this was a temporary law, which was suffered to expire, and the sale of game was not again restrained till the 1st James I. c. 27. By the 3d James I. c. 13. the qualification to kill game was increased to 40l. in land, and 200l. in personal property.

By the 22 and 23 C. II. cap. 25. lords of manors, not under the degree of esquire, may by writing under their hands and seals appoint gamekeepers within their respective manors, who may kill conies, hares, &c. and other game, and by the warrant of a justice may search houses of persons prohibited to kill game.

It appears to your committee, that the statute 22 and 23 C. II. is the first instance, either in our statutes, reports, or law treatises, in which lords of manors are distinguished from other land-owners, in regard to game.

The same statute, section 3. confines the qualification to kill game to persons having lands of inheritance of 100l. per annum, or leases of 150l. (to which are added other descriptions of personal qualifications;) and persons not having such qualifications are declared to be persons not allowed to have or keep game-dogs, &c.

The 22 and 23 C. II. c. 25. was followed by 4 and 5 W. and M. c. 23. and the 28 Geo. II. c. 12. which enacted penalties against unqualified, and, finally, against qualified persons, who shall buy, sell, or offer to sell, any hare, pheasant, partridge, &c. Similar penalties are therein enacted against unqualified persons having game in their possession.

Such appears to your committee to be the state of the laws respecting game, as they at present stand. The various and numberless statutes which have been enacted upon the subject, and to which your committee have not thought it requisite to allude, have not been unobserved by them; but seeing that they are merely supplementary to those to which your committee has made reference, they have not felt it important to enter into a detail of their enactments.

Your committee cannot but conclude, that by the common law, every possessor of land has an excluof being more severe than formerly, lost almost all their rigours; and he did not object to improvements by which their remaining penalties might be lessened; but as this was a work requiring mature deliberation, and attended with much difficulty, it should not be precipitately undertaken. In the mean time, temptation to a breach of the law, while it existed, should be reduced as much as possible, and this would be done by the present bill. He had heard it objected to this bill, that if it passed, as game could not be afterwards bought, the class of consumers who now purchased it would have no means of obtaining it. He did not see the force of this objection. Game not found in the market would be sent to town as gifts, and the tables of the rich might thus be as amply supplied as before. If there were any thing enviable in the situation of a country gentleman, as connected with this species of wealth upon his estate, it was the power of making presents of game to his friends. The value of this privilege depended on a prohibition to sell, either on the part of the proprietors, or of those who might invade their rights. It had been said that this bill enforced severe penalties, and might lead to oppression. This was not the case. It merely enacted penalties against the higher ranks for the purpose of removing temptation from the lower. He had received a letter from the city of Bath yesterday which illustrated his present object. Some poulterers there having been prosecuted, stated that they could not have incurred the penalties had they not customers, who would be their customers only so long as they could supply them with game. His bill, therefore, by prohibiting the purchase of game, would protect this helpless class of persons. The hon. gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the bill.

Mr. Curwen wished that there had been a fuller attendance of members when another severe law was proposed to be added to a system already odious for its penalties and oppressive enactments. He would oppose this measure, because it was not only severe, but would be nugatory. It would impose hardships on others, but would not reach the persons whom it was intended to affect. The house ought to pause before it added any new penalty to laws already too penal. The number of persons prosecuted, as appeared by papers moved for in the course sive right ratione soli to all the animals feræ naturæ found upon his land; and that he may pursue and kill them himself, or authorize any other person to pursue or kill them; and that he may now by the common law, which in so far continues unrestrained by any subsequent statute, support an action against any person who shall take, kill, or chase them.

The statutes to which your committee have referred have, in limitation of the common law, subjected to penalties persons, who, not having certain qualifications, shall exercise their common law right, but they have not divested the possessor of his right, nor have they given power to any other person to exercise that right without the consent of the possessor.

It appears to your committee, that the 22 and 23 C. II. has merely the effect of exempting from those liabilities which were previously enacted against unqualified persons, such gamekeepers as shall receive exemption from them by the lords of manors (and which exemption the said lords of manors are thereby empowered to give), but that the restraints upon the sale of game equally affect the entire community.

Your committee conceive, that in the present state of society there is little probability that the laws above referred to can continue adequate to the object for which they were originally enacted. The commercial prosperity of the country, the immense accumulation of personal property, and the consequent habits of luxury and indulgence, operate as a constant excitement to their infraction, which no legislative interference that your committee could recommend appears likely to counteract.

It appears that under the present system, those possessors of land who fall within the statutable disqualifications, feel little or no interest in the preservation of the game, and that they are less active in repressing the baneful practice of poaching than if they remained entitled to kill and enjoy the game found upon their own lands. Nor is it unnatural to suppose, that the injury done to the crops in those situations where game is superabundant may induce the possessors of land thus circumstanced, rather to encourage than to suppress illegal modes of destroying it.

The expediency of the present restraints upon the possessors of land appears further to your committee extremely problematical. The game is maintained by the produce of the land, and your committee is not aware of any valid grounds for continuing to withhold from the possessors of land the enjoyment of that property which has appeared by the common law to belong to them.

The present system of game laws produces the effect of encouraging its illegal and irregular destruction by poachers, in whom an interest is thereby created to obtain a livelihood by systematic and habitual infractions of the law. It can hardly be necessary for your committee to point out the mischievous influence of such a state upon the moral conduct of those who addict themselves to such practices; to them may be readily traced many of the irregularities, and most of the crimes, which are prevalent among the lower orders in agricultural districts.

Your committee hesitate to recommend, at this late period of the session, the introduction of an immediate measure upon a subject which affects a variety of interests: but they cannot abstain from expressing a sanguine expectation, that by the future adoption of some measure, founded upon the principle recognized, as your committee conceive, by the common law, much of the evils originating in the present system of the game laws may be ultimately removed.

Upon mature consideration of the premises, your committee have come to the following resolution:—

Resolved—That it is the opinion of this committee, that all game should be the property of the person upon whose lands such game should be found."

of last session by an hon. and learned gentleman (Sir Samuel Romilly), amounted, in the whole of England, in one year, to 1200, which spoke sufficiently for the severity of the game laws. The feelings of the great proportion of the country gentlemen were against the law, and on this account nine-tenths of the property of the country were unprotected by it. It should be considered, that when the game laws were enacted, landed property was almost the only property in the kingdom; and, therefore, by securing the game to the landed proprietors, it was converted into no monopoly, but divided among nearly as many as were entitled to it; but the case was now altered, as the capital from trade, and funded property, was seven times as great as that arising from land. Game ought to belong to the occupier of land, and a protection of it purchased by the landlord from the tenant if he wished to preserve it. At present, as the law now stood, the farmer was more destructive to game than the poacher; his interest lay in exterminating it, as he suffered the loss of maintaining it without being allowed to derive any advantage from it. He had here a right to say that the law, instead of protecting, was calculated to destroy the game.—The hon. gentleman, recurring to the bill before the house, said, he would oppose it, among other grounds, because it would have a tendency to make servants spies on their masters, by giving them inducements to inform against them, in the case of purchasing game. If the bill should have any operation at all, it would be highly injurious to the country; and he, for one, would not consent to any step that should tend to perpetuate the game laws.

Mr. Brand said, that the game laws, as they at present existed, were opposed to nature, justice, morality, and social intercourse. Their severity ought to be diminished instead of being increased. The system demoralized the lower orders; for persons who were rich would buy game at any events. It was also objectionable on the principle of universal justice; it was but fair that he who maintained the game should have the enjoyment of it, and the occupier maintained the game as much as his own stock. For the last two years he had intended to bring the subject before the house, but had delayed it, partly on account of its difficulty, and partly because another measure was before the house, and he wished to hear the opinions of some, who, he knew, agreed with him, and of others who differed from him. He opposed the present bill, in the hope that the present cruel and mischievous system might meet with reprobation: and he trusted that they would get rid of this absurd remnant of feudal aristocracy, which caused so much discontent, and bribed the poor into vice. He wished to make game property, and give all who could afford it an equal chance of the enjoyment. It had been objected to this plan, that if a man made a preserve for the purpose of sale, his neighbour might kill all his game that flew out of the preserve; and so, in his opinion, the neighbour ought, for he contributed mainly to its support, and the preserver might avoid the inconvenience by purchasing the next field. The oppressive severity with which the present laws were enforced, was attested by the fact of 1200 persons having been imprisoned for offences relating to the game last year (hear, hear), and their resistance had caused the death of many others. Besides all this, the poacher's habits led to other vices, and the laws that attempted to repress them were in every respect promotive of the evil.

Mr. Lockhart said, the bill was unnecessary. Unqualified persons were already subject to penalties for having game in their possession, and a bill which prohibited purchasing could not prevent it more than those penalties. As to qualified persons, they had a right to the possession; and therefore to convict them under this bill, the contract must be proved. But by whom? by the seller?—would he so destroy his own market? By the poacher?—would he impeach his best friend? The contract could only be proved by the treachery of servants or near relations, and by creating dissension in families. Clauses of this description, excusing an offender if he discovered another, had been found ineffectual in other statutes; for holding out indemnification to the person who made discovery of an offence, and therefore excusing his own, only led to chicanery. An offender might inform against a person in league with him, who was constantly on the move, and in some distant country. In the statutes against bribery, a clause of this description had wholly failed, and the law only removed the punishment from the head of the tempter to one who was comparatively innocent. In all our penal statutes, the offence was, having goods in possession, not merely buying. Thus, as to smuggled goods, or the embezzling of naval stores. The bill did not say that game had decreased, and he believed that it had considerably increased in quantity. As to the proposal for making game property, he did not think it would obviate all the evils of the game laws; it might be very well for one who possessed a whole parish, but the small landholder might find it worth his while to league with poachers, and allow them to decoy his neighbour's game on his own slip of land. In France it was found advantageous for the commune to appoint a game-keeper, and let any person sport who would pay for the privilege. Though he despaired of seeing any radical change in the game-laws, he thought the present bill unnecessary.

Sir C. Burrell defended the bill. The game-laws, he said, occasioned no injustice where the landlord retained in his lease the right of sporting. He thought the bill would not have the effect of shifting the punishment from the most guilty. As to the 1200 persons committed, there had been an increase of crimes in every way, and this was but a small proportion of the whole. A man of large personal property would in all probability have 100 acres of land somewhere, so that there was no exclusion in the present system. It was not that system which encouraged crime, but the purchasers of game. There had been very little unanimity in the former committee, except on the question as to the sale of game. He himself wished, that game were made property; he thought it the only way to cure the evils of the game-laws. But as he considered the present bill salutary, and the house was so thin, he should move that the debate be adjourned till Monday the 18th instant.

Colonel Wood opposed the bill. He thought that the game-laws led to all sorts of mischief and crime; the only way to prevent which was to make game private property.

The second reading of the bill was then postponed till the 18th instant.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, May 7.

LOAN BILL.] This bill was read a third time and passed.

ROYAL ANNUITIES.] The Earl of Liverpool moved the third reading of a bill for granting an annuity to the Duke of Cambridge.

The Earl of Lauderdale moved, that the message from the crown, relative to the marriage of the royal dukes, be read.

The clerk having read the message, and the address voted on it,

The Earl of Lauderdale said, he had desired the message and the address to be read, in order to bring to the recollection of their lordships, that a principle had been implied in the proceedings which had taken place on this subject. The declared principle on which their lordships had acted was, that provision was to be made for certain members of the royal family, in consequence of their nuptials. It was not, that provision should be made for one in preference to another, but for all such members of the royal family as married with the consent of the crown. Their lordships knew it to be the law, that no member of the royal family could marry without the consent of the crown. If that were an improper law, it ought to be altered; but while it existed, it should be fairly acted upon. On the contrary, it was a desertion of duty in parliament to make it a matter of favour, whether or not a provision should be voted, after a marriage had been regularly contracted according to law. The provision was a mere abstract question, which ought to have no reference either to party feelings or prejudices of any kind. If it were withheld on account of any particular prejudice, it might be granted from motives of favour. Thus a system might be established of granting money merely on the grounds of favour or prejudice, and this might be carried so far as to lead to the dangerous and unconstitutional practice of canvassing parliament when such grants were in contemplation. In looking at the bills on the table, their lordships would find, that there was one member of the royal family who had married, with the consent of the crown, and for whom no provision had yet been made. Now, if the question were viewed by their lordships in the light in which he had endeavoured to place it, they would be of opinion, that an abstract right of provision existed in consequence of the marriage. It appeared, however, from what had been done in this case, that some other principle must guide the decisions of another place. Whether it were that provision ought to be granted from favour, or withheld from dislike, or on some other ground equally objectionable, he could not say. To him, however, this proceeding appeared in the utmost degree unfair and improper. With that member of the royal family who stood in the situation to which he had adverted he was in no way connected. No man could have been more politically hostile to him; but so far was that from exciting any feelings of animosity in his mind, that he the more respected the Royal duke, for having acted with zeal and sincerity in support of the political principles which he thought right. There was another illustrious person nearly connected with the Royal duke, against whom a prejudice had existed in a certain quarter. He was happy, however, to see, from one of the bills on the table, that if that prejudice had prevailed, in another place, it was now removed; but why a stigma should be cast, without any apparent reason, on the Duke of Cumberland, was what he could not understand. If there existed any real ground for stigmatizing that illustrious person, the proper course would be, to introduce a bill to exclude him from the crown; but while he was allowed to retain his rank in the order of succession, it was most unfair and uncandid to withhold from him that provision which ought to be granted on principles abstracted from any personal considerations. In this situation, it had become a matter of consideration with the consort of the Royal duke, whether she could accept the grant made by parliament. Her feelings would have inclined her to refuse it; but he thought she had acted properly in consulting her Royal consort, and complying with his advice. She had exhibited an example of that propriety of conduct which became a princess of the royal family of England, by yielding to the will of her husband. With respect to herself, there was now nothing to injure her feelings, except the observations which had appeared in the public papers, and these he could not help believing to be misrepresentations of what had passed in another place. He did not suppose it possible that there could be any person so base as to malign an illustrious stranger in the way the representations to which he had alluded indicated. If there were any man possessing such a mind, he might perhaps have the satisfaction of knowing that he had given pain; but he would also see an example of the exercise of the most virtuous feelings in the quarter where he had thrown his unjust reflections. He had thought it his duty to say thus much on the subject of the bill under consideration. Their lordships, he was confident, would give him credit for not wishing to offend the feelings of any one. He had the consolation of reflecting, that he could never accuse himself of doing any thing to promote discord in quarters where agreement was most important; being of opinion, that in all situations, from the highest to the lowest, union was the first and most important of domestic virtues. He did not object to the motion for the third reading, but had considered himself bound to explain to their lordships the view he entertained of the measure.

Lord Holland said, he did not object to this grant on account of its amount, but on account of the manner in which it was given. He should not, however, have troubled their lordships with any observations on the motion, had he not thought it necessary to notice some part of what had fallen from his noble friend near him. He wished to remind his noble friend, that, according to the old constitutional system, much anterior to that to which he had alluded, provision was always made for the members of the royal family out of the revenues of the crown, and these revenues were subject to the control of parliament. The ancient principle was, that such a sum should be granted to the crown as appeared sufficient to support its splendour and dignity; and the branches of the royal family, as part of that splendour and dignity, were supplied from the same sum. When he considered the sums of money which had, at different periods during the present reign, been voted by parliament to the crown, he could not help considering them fully adequate to the purpose for which they were destined; and he was of opinion, that the splendour of the crown would be much better consulted, if the provisions necessary on the marriage of members of the royal family were advanced out of these sums, than by applying to parliament for additional grants with the chance of having to experience a refusal. Such a result was in itself a considerable evil, besides the disagreeable situation in which such applications placed public men. The course taken was, however, as he had said, totally unnecessary, for not less than a million a year, independently of the droits of the admiralty, and other sources which he should not now name, went to the support of the dignity and splendour of the crown. But he could not help adverting to the manner in which this business had come before their lordships. After the noble earl (Liverpool) had brought down the message from the crown, he had chosen to depart from the usual practice, and adjourned the motion for an address, because he had not made up his mind as to what he ought to propose. When, however, the consideration of the subject came on, he detailed the sums, which, he said, ought to be granted, and declared that nothing less could do. The measure, however, now came before their lordships in a very different shape. The noble earl might have had very sufficient reasons for changing his opinion, and finding that a less sum would be sufficient; but he had never yet stated those reasons. He recollected that, when there was a proposition for reducing a lord of the admiralty, though the question turned only on 1000*l.* the ministers of the Prince Regent declared that they could not carry on the government of the country if they were obliged to make that reduction; but now, though they had thought it right to recommend very large sums to members of the royal family, they could endure the rejection of their proposition with the greatest tranquillity. They had pocketed the affront, and kept their places. At the same time, whether any explanation should be given on this subject or not, he agreed with his noble friend that it was quite improper to canvass the characters of those for whom such grants were proposed; but then his objection went to the whole of the system which had been acted upon. He could not admit that parliament were bound to grant a provision on the marriage of a member of the royal family, as a matter of course; for though the royal marriage act placed in the crown the sole right of consent, it must be recollected that the constitution had placed in the house of commons the sole right of granting money. It would be a strange proposition to say that, because the crown had given its consent, parliament were bound to grant any demand of the crown which followed upon that consent; and it was very unfair to infer from a refusal, that a bad opinion must necessarily be entertained of the individual for whom the application had been made. It was not fair to the other house of parliament, to insinuate that its decisions were influenced by motives of that kind. He had risen, however, not to oppose the sum proposed to be given, but the imposing of any additional burthen on the public. It was not the amount, but the fund from which it was taken, that he considered objectionable. It was most unjust to charge the consolidated fund with this provision. If their lordships considered what had already been granted to the crown during the present reign, they would find that it enjoyed at least double what, at the commencement of this reign, it had a right to expect. (The Earl of Liverpool seemed to intimate his dissent.) He had come down unprepared with calculations, and should not then attempt to enter into minute details; but he would prove what he then asserted, whenever the noble earl might please to enter at large into the question. He would demonstrate that the crown now received, for the support of its dignity and splendour only, totally independent of what went to any civil or military services, at least double of the revenue it had been in the contemplation of parliament to grant.

The Earl of Liverpool admitted that the granting or not granting of a provision on the marriage of a member of the royal family, was a matter within the jurisdiction of parliament. The noble earl who spoke first had not denied that proposition; but he had fairly contended, that when what was granted to one was withheld from another, a reflection was conveyed. He certainly did not mean to say that the house of commons had not the right of acting as they had done; but, at the same time, he perfectly concurred with the noble earl in the general principles he had laid down. Such distinctions made by parliament must lead to decisions more or less capricious, and consequently unjust. He therefore concurred in the opinion, that if there were any real objection to the conduct of the illustrious individual alluded to, it ought to be carried farther, and made the subject of a particular measure; unless this were done, all attempts at capricious distinctions were highly censurable. The noble lord had adverted to the proceedings which took place on the message. It would be recollected, that he stated, when he moved the address, what appeared in his opinion a proper provision. Part of his recommendation had been assented to, and part refused. This was an occurrence consistent with the nature of the constitution. So long as this government was a government of king, lords, and commons, there must exist a liability to such decisions. He must say, however, that he did not reject the decision so much on the account of any individuals affected by it, as on public grounds; because he did not think the question had been determined on the principles which ought to have decided it. But the noble lord did not object so much to the sum as to the fund whence it was to be derived. The grant was voted on this occasion, as usual, out of the consolidated fund. The marriage act, it was true, contained nothing relative to provisions for the branches of the royal family; but, in other reigns, grants for that purpose had been made by parliament. If these provisions were now thrown on the consolidated fund, it was because the revenue of the crown, since the accession of his present Majesty, had been placed on a different footing. He did not dispute with the noble lord, that the hereditary revenues of the crown were subject to be voted by parliament; but it ought to be recollected, that it was then the practice of parliament to grant a minimum of revenue. The revenues granted to King William, Queen Ann, and other sovereigns, were capable of great increase. And if his present Majesty had enjoyed the same sort of improveable revenue which was granted to his ancestors, instead of receiving 1,000,000*l.*, as the noble lord said, the crown would now be in the receipt of 2,000,000*l.* of revenue. The arrangement which had been made at the commencement of the present reign, instead of leaving to the crown an improveable revenue, fixed the civil list at a determined sum; thus establishing, not a minimum, but a maximum of revenue. But how could it be expected that the sum then voted could be sufficient, since it was given at a time when his Majesty had no family? The numerous offspring which his Majesty had had, as well as other circumstances, required an alteration. He was ready to enter into a detailed view of the subject, whenever the noble baron might think proper to bring it forward; and he was convinced that, on a fair investigation, it would be found that the arrangement made at the commencement of the present reign had placed his Majesty in a less favourable situation with respect to revenue than any sovereign since the revolution.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed, as was the Duchess of Cumberland's annuity bill.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, May 7.

FORGERY OF BANK NOTES.] Mr. Canning presented a petition from certain merchants of other inhabitants of Liverpool, complaining of the great distress which many persons in that town and its neighbourhood suffered from the number of forged notes in circulation, and praying the house to take such steps as might render forgery more difficult.—The right hon. gentleman observed, that not only Liverpool, but the whole county of Lancaster, was interested in having some effectual check put to the practice of forgery, as it was well known that the circulation there consisted, for the most part, of Bank of England one and two pound notes.

General Gascoyne corroborated what the right hon. gentleman had said, and observed, that it had been in contemplation in Lancashire to form several private banks.

Mr. J. Smith said, that not having been in the house, when this subject was before it on a former evening, he wished to correct a mistake which had been made, with respect to prosecutions by the Bank solicitor. All the prosecutions which were carried on by the Bank were under the orders of a select committee of the directors, and the solicitor had only to obey those instructions which were given to him.

Mr. Manning said, the Bank would be glad to find that provincial banks were established, as the hon. and gallant general had mentioned, for they had no desire that their small notes should circulate in counties so remote from the metropolis. As to the number of notes in circulation in Lancashire, he could not see how it was to be prevented by the Bank, since they had on several occasions given notice in the Gazette, with the signature of Mr. Speaker, according to the act, that they were ready to pay their one and two pound notes of certain dates in gold. The Bank felt disposed to do every thing in their power to prevent the increase of forgeries.

Mr. Canning said, he did not mean to impute any blame to the Bank: but the evil must be admitted to be great in a large town like Liverpool, which, relying almost exclusively for its circulating medium on Bank of England notes, must take a particular interest in the prevention of forgeries. As to sending up a few small notes to be exchanged, people's minds were influenced by the fear of their being rejected. He only mentioned this to shew the propriety of some remedial measure.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

TRANSUBSTANTIATION.] General Thornton rose to move "That leave be given to bring in a bill to repeal such parts of the acts of 25 and 30 of Charles II, as require, in certain cases, declarations to be made against the belief of Transubstantiation, and asserting the worship of the church of Rome to be idolatrous." He observed, that he had given notice of his motion for a considerable time, and was glad to find that no petitions had been presented against it, from which he inferred that protestants were in favour of it. He then read over the oaths and declarations to be taken and made by Roman catholics. He thought it extraordinary that those declarations should ever have become law. But at that time there were many reports of popish plots, though most of them, he believed, were unfounded. He admitted, that Charles II. was a catholic in his heart, and that his brother, the duke of York, openly professed the Roman catholic religion: but the established church was no longer in danger, and therefore, he conceived, that those declarations ought to be repealed. The real test was, the oath of supremacy. Belief in transubstantiation did not imply a belief in the supremacy of the Pope. Transubstantiation was believed in the Greek church, in the same sense as in the Roman, but the supremacy of the church of Rome was denied.—The hon. general concluded by moving for leave to bring in the bill, which, he said, would contribute very much to complete that cordial union between catholics and protestants which had begun to manifest itself in Ireland.

Mr. W. Smith seconded the motion.

Lord Castlereagh said, he entertained no doubt of the good intentions of the hon. and gallant general; but he apprehended that it would be necessary to refer the subject to a committee of the whole house. He trusted, therefore, that the hon. and gallant general would not persevere in his motion, particularly at this period of the session. It would be forcing on the house the consideration of the catholic question, which did not appear very likely to come on in any other shape this session. He should therefore, without any feeling of disrespect, move the previous question.

Mr. W. Smith said, he had seconded the motion to hear what might be said about it. He could not agree with the noble lord, that it would tend to no practical good, though he admitted it was preferable to discuss the whole subject of the catholic question together. An old maxim said, "words will not alter the nature of things," but they very often went to give a wrong colouring to things, and he believed that the acts alluded to by the hon. and gallant general occasioned unfavourable impressions of the Roman catholics which they did not deserve. The oath of supremacy was the hinge on which the real question turned. Belief or non-belief in the doctrine of transubstantiation was another matter, and a test respecting it was not necessary. He wished to promote more of political and social union among the people at large, and to refrain from reproaches, which always conduced to animosity and hatred.

The previous question was then put and carried without a division *.

CROWN LANDS.] Mr. Huskisson moved for leave to bring in a bill for the improvement of parts of Hainault Forest, in Essex, with a view to encourage the growth of naval timber. He adverted to some plans of improvement in the forests that had been entertained with a similar view. In Epping-forest, he said, there were so many villas connected with forest scenery, &c. that any plan must be accompanied with considerable limitations.

Mr. Brougham expressed his surprise at the diversity exemplified in the manner in which these sales were negotiated. For instance, a sale was effected in favour of a noble lord, a cabinet minister, for 10 years' purchase, whilst, in other cases, 25 and 30 years' purchase were required. The noble lord paid only 9000*l.* for lands estimated at 500*l.* per annum; but, had the sale been public, a much larger sum would have been obtained. There was no instance in the reports of the commissioners of a public sale, except in the case of Mr. Corbett, who had paid at the rate of 80 years' purchase for a piece of marshy land in Merionethshire. As to honours, an hon. member of that house, Sir Walter Stirling, had purchased a barren honour in Kent, for 3000*l.* while, in a variety of instances, they were lavished on individuals without any pecuniary consideration. Lord Lonsdale had obtained the barony of Kendal in Westmoreland, at 30 years' purchase, without paying a farthing for the honours of the acquisition. It was offered to no one but Lord Lonsdale, to whom the possession of it was unquestionably more valuable than to any other person, as it was just in the neighbourhood of his estates. It was certainly valued at only 30 years' purchase by two surveyors upon oath; but any one who had witnessed the proceedings in a court of law, on subjects connected with the value of property, would know how to appreciate such an opinion, for never were two or even ten surveyors brought forward on the one side in such proceedings, but two or ten were immediately brought forward on the other, to swear to a value different from that sworn to by the former. It was a mockery, therefore, to talk of the opinion of two surveyors, as a test of the value of landed property—the best test was to let various bidders come forward. Seven or eight years ago, Lord Lonsdale obtained the barony of Kendal for 14,000*l*., although it would have brought four times that sum by public auction. A wealthy individual had since said, that he would have given three times that amount for it; and he (Mr. Brougham) understood, that, since the purchase, the noble lord had gained more than the sum which he gave, by enfranchisements.

* It may be remembered, that this question was brought forward towards the close of the last session, when it was disposed of in a similar way. (See Vol. I. p. 1604.)—Many persons, not acquainted with parliamentary proceedings, are at a loss to know what is meant by "the previous question." The "previous question is,—"Whether the question should be now put,"—and, if carried, the original question falls to the ground. Sir Henry Vane is the reputed author of the previous question; but Mr. Hatsell says, that the first instance he has found of putting that question is, on the 24th of May, 1604. (See 2 Hats. 111. edit. 1818.)

Mr. Huskisson observed, that he was favourable to the mode of public auction, where it was convenient. He had himself, in most cases, taken care to have the sale of the property advertised. But the fact was, that the great bulk of what had been sold consisted of fee-farm rents, which would hardly have borne the expense of an auction. With respect to the particular transactions to which the hon. and learned gentleman had alluded, as none of them took place while he had been connected with that department, he could not give any precise answer to them; but if the hon. and learned gentleman, instead of throwing out loose allegations, would bring forward specific statements, he was persuaded there would appear very ample and satisfactory reasons for the course which the treasury had adopted.

Sir J. Graham begged to trouble the house with a few words on this subject. And first, with respect to the barony of Kendal, he must state, that it had been in the possession of the Lonsdale family, as lessees of the crown, for more than 150 years. It consisted of a variety of small rents, the expense of collecting which was almost as great as the amount of them. Lord Lonsdale himself had not set on foot the contract for the purchase; it was proposed to him by the crown, the possession then being in him. The commissioners, so far from shewing any favour to him, had valued the property at a sum which no other man would have given; they demanded no less than 40 years' purchase, while the rents amounted to little more than 300*l*. a year. And then, with respect to the manorial rights, he could assure the house, that the noble lord had not obtained 1000*l*. by enfranchisements. In his opinion, and he could form some judgment on questions of this nature, Lord Lonsdale had given one-third more than the value of the estate, and twice as much as any other person would have given for it, he himself having at the time a life-interest in it.

Mr. Brougham conceived that the right hon. gentleman, and the hon. baronet had totally misunderstood him. He had made no charge against any one. He had only asked, why one man had been allowed to acquire crown property at 10 years' purchase, while from others 25, 30 and even 80 years' purchase were required? As to Kendal, his argument was, why could not the crown have done what the purchaser had since done, by way of enfranchisement and otherwise? He had enfranchised the occupants at a certain rate each, pocketed the money thus obtained, and still reserved the honours to himself.

Sir J. Graham repeated that Lord Lonsdale had not received 1000*l*. altogether, and, therefore, all these clamours and misrepresentations were totally unfounded.

Leave was then given to bring in the bill.

ALIEN BILL.] Mr. Lambton rose to call the attention of the house to the subject of the bill which the noble secretary of state for foreign affairs had introduced on a former night respecting aliens. He understood that the noble lord had stated the necessity of co-operating with foreign governments, for the purpose of protecting the state against the conspiracies of individuals. Such a declaration could not fail to astonish him, when he recollected, that the alien bill was not introduced with a view to foreign powers, but for the protection of British interests. He wished, however, to have more information on the subject before the bill was again discussed; and, therefore, he thought it his duty to move, first, for "copies or extracts of all correspondence since the 20th of Nov. 1815, between any of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state, or his Majesty's ministers abroad, and the ministers of foreign states relating to aliens;" secondly, for "copies or extracts of all correspondence since the 20th of November, 1815, between his Majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, and his Majesty's ambassador in the Netherlands, relating to passports granted or refused to individuals either going to or coming from the Netherlands, not being natives of the United Kingdom, or of the kingdom of the Netherlands, or any of their respective dependencies." He did not know whether the noble lord would object to this motion; but he begged to say, that if his Majesty's ministers should find any difficulty in giving the names, they might leave blanks for them in the returns.

Lord Castlereagh denied that he had drawn any argument in favour of the bill from the situation of the Netherlands. He had only attempted to shew the advantages that would arise from continuing the system in this country. He certainly objected to the information which the hon. member had called for. Government had never used the powers of this bill for any other than British interests; and he would now repeat, that it would not be wise to allow persons to come here and abuse our hospitality, by disturbing the general peace.

Sir F. Burdett observed, that it was very well for the noble lord to say, that no abuse had been made of this power, but he would defy the noble lord to shew any instance that would have rendered it necessary to send any alien out of this country under this act. Was it too much to demand an account of individuals towards whom this power had been exercised? It was well known how liable it was to be abused. He recollected the case of some merchants who were coming to this country to claim certain debts owing to them. They were then in the Low Countries, and, by a trick of their debtors, in order to avoid payment, they were said to be coming upon some plan of assassination, and were long detained in prison. (Hear, hear.) He recollected the case of a professor of music, who, being informed against, was about to be sent out of the country, but being acquainted with a clerk in office, he escaped. (Hear, hear.) It was impossible not to see on what slight grounds the powers given to government by this bill might be exercised. In his opinion, it was a measure most disgraceful to those who had proposed it; it was most unconstitutional; it was hostile to the spirit of liberty, and contrary to the policy of all former times. The noble lord had given no reason why he should not furnish the information, and therefore he felt it his duty to support the motion of his hon. friend.

Mr. Abercromby wished to know, whether there had not been a correspondence between this country and the Netherlands, relative to aliens? If that were the real state of the case, and if it should appear that this government had induced foreign powers to interfere respecting its subjects, in what situation would this country be placed? It amounted to this—that this country could not deny the claim of any foreign government to interfere with aliens who might be in this country. He did not think that the noble lord had shewn sufficient grounds for refusing the motion, and therefore he should give it his support.

Mr. Bennet thought it a very bad symptom, that when a charge was made in that house, ministers refused papers that would exculpate them if it were unfounded.

Mr. Lambton wished to ask the noble lord, whether he had not joined with the rest of the Allied Powers, at the time of the treaty of Paris, in demanding that certain Frenchmen should be given up, who had taken refuge in Switzerland, the Netherlands, and on the Banks of the Rhine?

Lord Castlereagh not answering,

Mr. Lambton said, he should take the sense of the house on his motion.

The house then divided.

Ayes, 30—Noes, 68.

LIST OF THE MINORITY.

Abercromby, Hon. J.	North, Dudley
Atherley, Arthur	Ossulston, Lord
Brougham, H.	Parnell, Sir H.
Burdett, Sir F.	Parnell, W.
Calcraft, John	Ponsonby, Hon. F.
Coke, T. W.	Rancliffe, Lord
Douglas, Hon. F. S.	Ridley, Sir M. W.
Dundas, Charles	Romilly, Sir S.
Fergusson, Sir R.	Russel, Lord G. W.
Heron, Sir R.	Smith, W.
Latouche, John	Teed, John
Lefevre, C. S.	Walpole, Hon. G.
Lloyd, J. M.	Warre, J. A.
Madocks, W. A.	Wilkins, Walter
Moore, Peter	Wood, Alderman
Newport, Sir J.

TELLERS.

Lambton, J. G.	Bennet, Hon. H. G.

OFFICE OF CONSTABLE (IRELAND).] Sir H. Parnell moved " that a select committee be appointed to inquire into the laws relating to the office of constable in Ireland, and to report their observations thereon to the house."

After some observations from Mr. Peel, who stated that the subject required more consideration than could be given to it at this period of the session, the motion was, by leave, withdrawn.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.] Mr. D. Gilbert presented another report of this committee. It related to Miscellaneous Services, and was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

PARISH VESTRIES BILL.] Mr. S. Bourne moved that this bill be read a third time.

Mr. Calcraft said, he did not mean in this late stage to oppose the further progress of the measure, but he still entertained great objections to it, because it curtailed the rights of the poorer classes of society. On the same principle on which parish vestries, as now constituted, were objected to, objections might be made against all public assemblies whatever. All public meetings were in some degree tumultuous; but, for his own part, he had never experienced the impediments which this measure was designed to obviate.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre had also great doubts as to the propriety of the measure, and should be very glad to hear any grounds pointed out for this innovation. The only case brought forward to justify it, was but the case of an individual. The present mode of management had been found most beneficial. He trusted, therefore, that the house would pause before they set it aside by the bill now before them. He had presented a petition from the borough which he represented (Reading) against the bill. Their poor were as well managed, and their rates were as low, as in any part of the kingdom. There was no occasion, therefore, for special vestries.

Mr. S. Bourne said, that the object in view was, to follow the analogy of kirk-sessions in Scotland, so far as the very different system of poor-laws in England would admit. In Scotland, the wealthier classes had the greater influence in managing the provision for the poor. By this bill it was proposed to bring back the wealthier classes to attend parish vestries. Their absence was occasioned by the numbers and the clamour of others who attended, of whom some were connected with paupers, and some were employed in trades which made it their interest to be liberal to certain paupers. In 1807, Mr. Whitbread had introduced a measure, the same in principle, and similar in its modifications to the present. Surely the lapse of time, the increase of population, and the increase of paupers, had not since 1807 made such a measure less necessary. He begged leave to read to the house the sentiments of Mr. Whitbread on this subject. He had remarked, that the tumultuous assemblies and clamour of vestries had disgusted the wealthier and the more respectable classes from attending; and, to remedy this, he had proposed to give two votes to those who paid a certain sum of poor-rates; to others, three; and, to others, four, which was the highest number of votes to be allowed. Mr. Whitbread had been singularly conversant with this subject. His great attention ensured accurate discrimination; and what must have some weight with gentlemen on the other side, he could be suspected of no hostility to the poorer part of the constitution of vestries. He would appeal to any member whether it were reasonable that one who paid a third and even a half of the poor-rates, should have no more influence in vestries than one who paid the very lowest sum. The same principle which was proposed in this bill had been adopted in other assemblies. It was so with the proprietors of East India Stock. Mr. Gilbert's bill had gone infinitely farther. It had disfranchised all who had not been rated to the amount of 5*l.* But he now thought it better, that the right of all who pay rates to vote should be retained; but that those who paid a certain proportion should have a greater number of votes.

Mr. Curwen was against the bill. He had heard nothing to shew that it was necessary. If vestries were now tumultuous assemblies, it arose from the higher orders not doing their duty. He had never known one instance where the higher classes were not able to exercise great influence in preserving order. To give every man a vote was more proper in itself, and would be more satisfactory to the parishioners at large.

Mr. F. Douglas professed himself friendly to the bill, because it was calculated to encourage the attendance of persons of character at vestries. No law could force men of intelligence to attend, but it ought to remove every obstacle that repelled or disgusted them. Yet, though he was friendly to the bill, he thought the principle of it might have been better adapted to the evil. The bill proposed, that every one who paid 50*l.* should have two votes; 75*l.* three votes; 100*l.* four votes; 125*l.* five votes; and 150*l.* six votes, which was the utmost number allowed. Now he had to object to this arrangement, that, according to it, parishes might be divided into separate classes, and 7 or 8 persons, who represented neither the population nor the property of the parish, might have the whole controul. (Hear, hear.) He should, therefore, prefer, that every one who paid to the amount of 25*l.* should have an additional vote; 60*l.* a third vote; 100*l.* a fourth vote; and so on. He was not quite sure as to the precise sums, but by adopting a scale of this kind, the objection which he had mentioned could be avoided.

Mr. Barham said, he had known instances in which persons who paid hardly any rates at all attended vestries, and made such a clamour as to drive home the more respectable persons who attended. Some remedy was quite necessary for such an evil.

The bill was then read a third time.

Mr. S. Bourne moved a clause to except the city of London from the operation of the bill, which was agreed to.

Mr. Barclay moved a similar clause for Southwark, which was also adopted.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre rose to move a clause, that the borough of Reading should be excepted.

Mr. D. Gilbert asked, whether Reading, like London and Southwark, were governed by local laws?

Mr. S. Lefevre answered in the negative, and the clause was rejected.

The bill was then passed.

Poor Laws Amendment Bill.] Mr. S. Bourne moved that this bill be read a third time.

Mr. F. Douglas said, he felt insuperable objections to the clause which empowered parish officers to take away children from their parents when unable to support them, and to place them in schools established for that purpose. He was aware of the high authority with which these bills came forward. He understood, however, there had been a difference of opinion on this point in the committee.

Mr. D. Gilbert suggested, that this was not the time to bring forward those objections, as the question before the house now was, that the bill be read a third time.

The bill was read accordingly.

Mr. F. Douglas then rose, and moved the omission of the clause which enabled the parish to place the children of paupers in a house of industry. He considered the separation of parent and child as a greater evil than any which it was intended to remedy.

Mr. Alderman Wood expressed the same opinion.

Mr. S. Bourne said, that the clause was, in point of fact, a return to the statute of Elizabeth, and he could not believe that it would afford any additional encouragement to the improvident marriages of the poor. The effects of the prevailing practice of administering relief were most detrimental both to the poor and to the children; for the money intended for the benefit of the latter was too frequently spent in dissipation, whilst they were left starving at home. The hon. gentleman had talked of the felicity of a cottage life; but where there was an actual incapacity of maintaining the family inhabiting the cottage, he feared that felicity was not the general character that belonged to it. In the present state of the poor, and the laws affecting them, in this country, he could not imagine any thing more humane or desirable than the regulation provided by this clause.

Mr. Curwen felt assured that the intentions of those who framed the present measure were most humane; but he must object to every regulation which did not go to the principle of making the labourer's wages equal to his maintenance. Every measure that stopped short of that object would only serve to confirm the existing evil, and to continue the system of paying those wages to a certain degree out of the poor-rates. It was to be lamented also, that children should be separated from, and grow up without any affection for their parents; for he knew not how the place of that affection could be supplied. No good could be effected whilst the poor were taught to believe that there was no disgrace in dependence on a public fund. He disapproved, therefore, of legislating on the presumption that parents would be unable to support their children.

Colonel Wood supported the clause, and contended, that in all the southern parts of England the wages of labour had decreased in a greater proportion than the poor-rates had advanced. In a pecuniary view, it was indifferent to the labourer whether he received the whole amount of his wages from his employer, or the moiety of them from the parish; but the effect of the latter practice was to debase and demoralize him. The great recommendation of the clause was, he thought, that it would tend to raise wages, at the same time that the children, by being placed in schools, would learn various kinds of industry or handicraft, instead of being, as the children of a particular district generally were, confined to the knowledge and exercise of one.

Mr. Lamb opposed the clause, as contradictory to the principle of the report, and on the ground that the house, before it passed, ought to have distinctly in view those ulterior measures which were to be founded on it. His fear was, that the bill would be found in practice to carry a bad principle still farther, by thus legislatively recognizing its existence, and that the poor would marry as improvidently, when their children were to be provided for in the proposed manner, as they were inclined to do at present. The separation, indeed, might only add to their carelessness by extinguishing their natural affections. He thought, however, the committee had done much, and deserved well of the house and the country, though he could not help suggesting the propriety of withdrawing this particular measure for the present. He entertained a sanguine hope that great advantages would be derived from their continued labours, and believed that the work of improvement would be most effectually commenced by a diligent inquiry into the present system of administering the poor-laws.

Mr. Courtenay supported the clause, as a judicious compromise between many conflicting evils.

Mr. Calcraft objected to the clause. It would not, he said, prevent the wages of labour from being made up out of the poor-rates; for it told a man, that if he made an improvident marriage, his children should be supported out of the poor-rates; with a threat, that if he behaved ill, they should be taken from him. By the effect of the poor laws, the earnings of the poor had been gradually lessened, though the nominal amount of wages had been increased. It was, nevertheless, too much to say, that the character of the poor had been degraded by the poor-laws. It had been degraded by the effects of taxation and low wages; and these low wages had been occasioned by allowing money out of the poor-rates. To take away the children and support them was the same thing as to allow the present wages out of the rates. The spirit of the clause was in contradiction to the report of the committee, and tainted the whole measure; it would have no effect but to encourage improvident marriages, and the increased competition for employment must again lower the wages of labour. He thought the bill might be generally beneficial, but that the clause in question was highly mischievous.

Mr. Broadhurst objected to the clause. It tended, he thought, to destroy the affection which existed between parent and child.

Mr. W. Smith supported the clause. It had, he said, only the common failing of all human institutions—a balance of good and evil. He thought the good prevailed. We could not recede from the system of poor-laws all at once; all that we could do was, to mitigate their ill effects. The clause in question did not take the children from parents under circumstances half so harsh as the old law: they were now retained in the parish, but before, might be removed to any distance. The children were now to be educated; before, they might have been taken away, and their education neglected.

The house then divided.

For the clause 46—Against it 14.

The bill was then passed.

BUILDING OF CHURCHES BILL.] On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, this bill was read a third time, and passed.

CORONERS ELECTION BILL.] This bill was reported, and ordered to be read a third time on the 18th instant.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, May 8.

ROYAL ASSENT.] The royal assent was given by commission to the Duke of Cambridge's annuity bill, the Duchess of Cumberland's annuity bill, the Loan bill, and the Longitude and Northern Passage bill.

The commissioners were the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Shaftesbury, and Lord Redesdale.

BUILDING OF CHURCHES BILL.] This bill was brought up from the commons by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and read a first time.

PARISH VESTRIES BILL.] This bill was brought up from the commons by Mr. S. Bourne, and read a first time.

POOR LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.] This bill was brought up from the commons by Mr. S. Bourne, and read a first time.

COTTON FACTORIES BILL.] The Earl of Lauderdale presented a petition from certain cotton spinners in Manchester, praying to be heard by counsel against this bill. The noble earl observed, that the proper time for hearing counsel against the principle of a bill was the second reading; but the noble lord (Kenyon) had intimated his intention of moving that stage to-night. The petitioners would be prepared with counsel and evidence by Monday se'nnight, the 18th. If the noble lord would agree to postpone the committee to that day, the petitioners might then be heard against the clauses to which they more particularly objected.

On the motion of Lord Kenyon, the bill was read a second time.

The Earl of Lauderdale then said, that the petitioners wished to bring up medical men who could give evidence not only to the general health of the factories, but to the state of health of each child employed. On that point, he was assured, they could bring forward a complete body of evidence. The petitioners proposed also, to prove the injurious consequences which would result from this bill to the cotton trade; for while this restriction was threatened to be imposed on the cotton factories, the labour was left perfectly free in the worsted and other factories.

Lord Kenyon had hoped that the progress of the bill would have been more rapid than that which must follow from the delay insisted on by the noble earl. He wished it first to be considered, whether, after the evidence that had been heard by the committee of the other house, the minutes of which were now before their lordships, any farther investigation could be necessary. If, after perusing that evidence, their lordships should be of opinion that they ought to have more information on the subject, they would doubtless call for it; but it was not requisite to agree to hear further evidence, until they should find what they possessed was insufficient. He should therefore wish the committee to be fixed for an earlier day, subject to postponement, if it should be thought fit to hear counsel and evidence.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, that the noble lord wished the house to decide on evidence on the table, which none of their lordships had yet had time to peruse—on evidence taken before a committee of the other house of parliament in the year 1816, and which was, in the opinion of many of the most distinguished members of that committee, perfectly unfit for being made the foundation of any legislative proceeding. He wished to know whether their lordships were prepared to encroach upon that great principle of political economy, that labour ought to be left free, and without taking upon themselves the trouble of investigating the subject.—He moved that the bill be committed on Monday se'nnight.—Ordered.

The Earl of Harrowby thought it proper to observe, lest the noble earl, or any other noble lord, should go away with the impression that evidence must necessarily be heard against the bill in the committee, that the order which had been made implied no such thing. He, for his part, could see no evidence which could be brought against the bill, unless the noble earl meant to say that he would prove that children, compelled to labour 16 hours a-day, were not over-worked, which was impossible.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, he was not prepared to state what would be the particulars of the evidence, but this much he understood, that medical men of great skill and reputation would prove that the children in the cotton factories were as healthy as children generally are. He never heard of their being worked 16 hours a-day, nor did he believe that to be done in the factories of the petitioners; but he must observe, that the observations did not depend upon the time, but upon the constitution and strength of those who were to labour. It would be a greater hardship to make some children work 8 or 10 hours, than it would be to make others work 16. The fault of the bill was, the fixing a limit to the exercise of labour, which was much the same as if one size of shoe were ordered to be made for every foot. The only rational course of proceeding was, to leave labour free, and then the time of labour would be properly regulated between the employers and the employed.

The Earl of Liverpool concurred in the observation which had been made by his noble friend (Lord Harrowby.) Even if the house agreed to hear counsel, he should, from the view he had taken of the subject, probably oppose the hearing of farther evidence.

The Earl of Lauderdale repeated what he had before stated respecting the nature of the evidence received from the house of commons.

To say that their lordships might hear counsel, and not evidence, appeared to him very absurd. What would it avail their lordships to hear counsel only? Counsel stated any thing, just what they were instructed, whether true or not. (A laugh.) He always understood that counsel spoke from their briefs; but to say that their lordships would listen to counsel with a predetermination to refuse to receive evidence, was a more extraordinary proposition than any he had ever heard in that house.

The Earl of Harrowby observed, that their lordships had applied to the other house for evidence, and all he wished was, that they should not, before they had read that evidence, decide that there was a necessity for hearing more.

The Lord Chancellor wished to remind their lordships, that in consequence of a communication with the other house, they had received the report of a committee on the cotton manufactories. That document had been dignified with the name of evidence; but, in the sense he understood that word, it was no evidence. But, whatever it was, the bill before them had advanced to a second reading, without their lordships having had the opportunity of perusing a word of it, and the committee was fixed for Monday se'nnight. The noble lord who had moved the second reading wished to forward the bill. On the other hand, the noble earl was anxious that witnesses from Lancashire should be heard against it as well as counsel. Let the question be considered in any way, their lordships must come to this conclusion—that if the statement made by counsel appeared to be such as they ought to be called upon to prove, and which they would pledge themselves they could prove, it would then be the duty of the house to hear evidence. In such a case the house would doubtless do its duty.

The Earl of Liverpool said, he did not object to hear counsel; but the house would not decide to hear evidence until after the counsel had made their statement.

The Lord Chancellor said, that the house not only reserved to itself the right of refusing to hear evidence, but also counsel, if they should so think fit, because it would always be competent to them to discharge any order they might make. It was usual, however, to make an order for hearing evidence as well as counsel; otherwise, if, after the counsel had made their statement, the house should desire to hear evidence, the witnesses might not be in attendance.

The Earl of Lauderdale wished the order to be made, because he was confident the parties might then go to the expense of having the witnesses in attendance; for he was certain that, when their lordships heard what he knew the counsel would state, they would consider it their duty to hear evidence. Their lordships, he was convinced, would act in this case as they had done in that of the bill respecting climbing boys. They had not rested satisfied with the evidence on which it had been passed by the other house, but had resolved to investigate the subject themselves. The consequence of that inquiry was, that even those who were in favour of the bill at first would now hesitate to agree to it. The committee on the present bill would, he was sure, have a similar result if evidence were received; and to refuse to hear evidence, would be, on the part of their lordships, a dereliction of duty.

The Earl of Liverpool rose again, in consequence of the allusion made by the noble earl to the chimney-sweepers' regulation bill. The case of that bill was very different from the present. It was true that, with regard to that as well as to this bill, their lordships had applied to the other house of parliament for information. But the objection to the former bill was, that it would not be practicable, consistently with the safety of the metropolis, to discontinue the use of climbing-boys, and trust to machinery. The necessity of guarding against fire might, therefore, render a modification in the measure necessary. But had this any analogy to the objection to the present bill? Was it possible to say that children compelled to labour more than 15 hours a day were not overworked? What evidence could negative that proposition? If all the medical staff of Manchester were brought to the bar to prove it, he would not believe the evidence.

Here the conversation ended, with an understanding that counsel and evidence should be heard against the bill before a committee of the whole house.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, May 8.

LUNATIC ASYLUM (SCOTLAND) BILL.] A petition was presented against this bill from the Reverend the Moderator and remanent Members of the Presbytery of Dunkeld; also, of Freeholders, Justices of the Peace, and others, of Dumfries; also, of Landholders of Perth.

Ordered to lie on the table.

LONDON, &c. PRISONS COMMITTEE.] A report was presented from this committee, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

WATCHMAKING REGULATION BILL.] Mr. P. Moore brought in a bill "for the more effectual prevention of frauds and abuses in the manufacture, exportation, and importation, of sundry wares, and for the relief of distressed workmen brought up to practise the manufacture of Clocks and Watches."—It was read a first time.

CROWN LANDS.] Mr. Huskisson having brought in a bill to amend the 48th of the king, so far as relates to the Great Forest of Brecknock, in the county of Brecknock,

Mr. F. Douglas rose and said, that he understood that, on a former evening, an hon. and learned friend of his had reflected on the conduct of a noble lord, to whom he was related, while in office. He could have wished that his hon. and learned friend had given him notice of his intention, as he should then have had an opportunity of shewing, that the noble lord, during the time he was in office, had produced a variety of improvements in the land revenue of the crown, and had put an end to the system of jobbing which previously existed.

Mr. Brougham begged to assure his hon. friend, that the subject itself came quite suddenly before him. He had formed no previous intention of speaking on it, and should not have mentioned it but for the occasion presented by the bill of the right hon. gentleman. He had made no charge against the noble lord; he could not, indeed, have made any charge against him, as he was not aware that he was in office during the transactions to which he had alluded. He had only contended, that the crown lands ought not to be let, sold, or exchanged, without inviting public competition.

Mr. F. Douglas expressed his satisfaction at this candid explanation of his hon. and learned friend.

Mr. Huskisson said, he had referred to the transactions which had been mentioned on a former day, and he found that, both in the case of the barony of Kendal, and that in which a cabinet minister, the earl of Westmoreland, had been concerned, the greatest attention had been paid to the interest of the public. The earl of Westmoreland had bought at ten years' purchase, but previously to that, he held the rights of soil and timber, and the crown possessed only some rights of minor importance, such as pasturing deer, &c. In fact, the lands could in no way have been made profitable to the crown nor to any individual, unless those rights could have been obtained which lay in the earl of Westmoreland himself. In such a case, a public auction would have brought no bidders: the noble earl, indeed, might probably have purchased on what terms he pleased. Some years, however, elapsed before he could make up his mind to give what at last was paid for those nominal rights of the crown. As to the barony of Kendal, it had been in the possession of the Lonsdale family for nearly two centuries: but there was a reversion to the crown on the termination of one life. It had been valued by two sworn surveyors at 13,000*l.* Upon this, 14,000*l.* was tendered by the earl of Lonsdale, and the right of pre-emption was given to him, only in consideration of his being in possession.

Colonel Lowther said, that the barony of Kendal was no bargain to the purchaser: he was satisfied that the same terms would not have been obtained, had the property been sold by public auction.

Mr. Brougham said, he should be glad to see all the documents relating to these transactions. He did not mean to throw any blame on the earl of Westmoreland or the earl of Lonsdale, for making the best terms they could; but he certainly disapproved of the system of close contract on which the government had acted.

The bill was then read a first time.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR BILL.] The order of the day being read, for the house resolving itself into a committee on this bill,

Mr. Brougham rose, and spoke to the following effect.—Sir, in rising to perform the duty cast upon me by the Education Committee, of describing to the house the progress of its inquiries, I am afraid I shall have occasion to trespass for some time upon your indulgence. First of all I must advert to the apparently slow progress which we have made in the investigation. Two years have elapsed since our labours began, and the bill now before the house is the first measure we have brought forward. I confess, that, to me, this delay appears salutary. It has afforded ample time for the serious and repeated consideration, which the vast importance of the subject prescribes to those who would legislate upon it; and an opportunity has likewise been given of obtaining the most valuable information from various sources. What I am about to lay before the house is to be taken as the result of that reflection and evidence. In considering the want of education among the poorer classes of society, and the best measures for supplying it, we shall do well to regard the subject in two distinct points of view: attending, first, to the situation of the people in cities and towns of considerable size; secondly, to the circumstances of the people in small towns or villages, and in districts wholly agricultural, where hardly even a village exists. The house will soon perceive that a due attention to this division, and the diversities of situation upon which it is founded, furnishes a clue to guide us a great part of the way in our inquiries, if indeed it does not lead us to the conclusion. Now in large towns, in those I mean, where the population exceeds seven or eight thousand inhabitants, there exist, generally speaking, sufficiently ample means of instructing the poor; not that there is almost any town where all can at present be taught; but that the laudable exertions of individuals are directed everywhere to this object, and are daily making such progress as will in time leave nothing to be wished for. Societies are formed, or forming, of respectable and opulent persons, who, to their infinite honour, beside furnishing the necessary funds, do not begrudge what many withhold, who are liberal enough of pecuniary assistance—their time, their persevering and active personal exertions. It is difficult to describe such conduct in terms of adequate praise: nor is it confined to the metropolis and the larger cities. We find hardly a town of any note in which some association of this sort has not been formed; and there can be no doubt, that a sufficient number of schools to educate all the poor of such populous places may be maintained by the voluntary contributions of such bodies, if the obstacle is removed which the first expense of the undertakings, the providing school-houses, occasions. Where so powerful a disposition to carry on this good work, exists in the community itself, we should be very careful how we interfere with it by any legislative provisions. The greatest danger is to be apprehended, of drying up those sources of private charity, by an unguarded interposition of the public authority. The associations, to which I refer, act for the poor, both as benefactors, as advocates, and as trustees. They contribute themselves; they appeal to the community through the usual channels of private solicitation, of public meetings, and of the press; they raise sums by donations to begin the undertakings, and by annual subscriptions to meet the current expenses; they manage the expenditure, for the most part, with a degree of economy, which I am afraid can never be hoped for in the distribution of any portion of the state revenue. Should parliament now shew a disposition to assist those societies by annual grants (as we do the chartered schools in Ireland), no one can doubt, that the zeal of the collectors, and the exertions of the contributors, would be immediately relaxed. Nor can it reasonably be questioned, that the funds so bestowed would be applied less economically. We might expect soon to see those incomes now raised for the education of the poor—in less considerable towns amounting to 100*l.* or 200*l.* a-year, in larger cities to 1200*l.*, 1500*l.*, and even 2000*l.*,—dwindle to nothing, while others only in embryo might perish, and many benevolent schemes would assuredly never be formed at all, which the charity of the richer classes, if left to itself, neither controlled nor assisted, might speedily have accomplished. The line traced out for parliament, with regard to the populous districts, by all the evidence given to the committee, seems sufficiently plain. It should confine its assistance to the first cost of the establishments, and leave the yearly expenses to be defrayed in every case by the private patrons. The difficulty, generally experienced, in forming a school, arises from the expenses of providing the school-room and the master's house. In many places the inhabitants could raise so much a-year to keep the thing going, provided it were once started; but something in the nature of an outfit is wanted; and undertakings are thus often abandoned from the difficulty of meeting this first and greatest expense. Whatever parliament may be disposed to do, should be confined to removing this impediment, and thus calling into action the charitable dispositions of the community, without in any wise superseding the necessity of them.—The house, I am persuaded, will be gratified to learn how extensive has at all times been the operation of public charity upon the education of the poor in this country. I speak now of the funds raised by occasional contributions, independently of the magnificent endowments of charitable establishments. The extent of these subscriptions in the present day is well known; but the committee have been furnished with an account of the sums raised a century ago, by the kindness of Mr. George Dyer, a man greatly to be respected for having devoted a long and active life to literary pursuits. It appears by this statement, published in 1713, that in the city of London no less than 4952 children then received their education from annual subscriptions, and the collections made at charity sermons The expense of teaching and clothing them was 8859*l.* a-year, including the cost of even boarding a small number. This is a curious fact, when contrasted with the great expense of such establishments in these times. I have compared the charges of a school in Bloomsbury, as stated before the committee in 1816, where 101 boys, and 60 girls, were taught and clothed, with the charges of a school mentioned in the old tract, where 100 boys, and 60 girls, were taught and clothed: the whole cost in queen Ann's time, appears to have been 212*l.*, and in the present day it exceeds 1200*l.* It must, indeed, be confessed, that this increase of expense is, in part, owing to certain abuses in the management of our charities. The Committee have found several instances of tradesmen subscribing to the funds of a school with the view of obtaining its custom; and the trustees, instead of checking their large charges, appear frequently to have some fellow-feeling, which makes them connive at the excess, as well as allow an undue amount of purchases. The examinations of these matters, which took place two years ago, and the discussion to which our report gave rise, I would fain hope, may already have applied the only remedy which is adapted to this mischief, by exciting the more scrupulous attention of the subscribers and of the public to the administration of those funds.—When we turn from the considerable towns, and populous districts, to parts of the country more thinly peopled, we perceive a very different state of things, in all but one essential particular, in which every quarter of the kingdom seems to agree. The means of instruction are scanty; there is little reason to look for their increase; but the poor are everywhere anxious for education. From the largest cities to the most solitary villages—to remote districts where the inhabitants live dispersed, without even a hamlet to gather them together; whether in the busiest haunts of men, the seats of refinement and civility, whore the general diffusion of knowledge, and the experience of its advantages or pleasures might be expected to stamp a high value on it in all men's eyes; or in the distant tracts of country, frequented by men barely civilized, and acquainted with the blessings of education rather by report than observation—in every corner of the country the poor are deeply impressed with a sense of its vast importance, and willing to make any sacrifice within the bounds of possibility to attain this object of their ardent and steady desire. All the evidence collected by the committee evinces the truth of this statement, so honourable to the character of our country; and I make it with a feeling of pleasure and pride, because it shews the existence of a noble spirit in Englishmen, which all the calamities of the times have not been able to undermine or to subdue.—We have recently issued a circular letter, containing queries addressed to all the clergy of England and Wales, respecting their several parishes. Already answers have been received from above seven thousand places; and I cannot avoid expressing the sense entertained by the committee, of the zeal and alacrity shewn by those reverend persons, who laying aside all other avocations have not lost an hour in applying themselves to the consideration of this important subject. The house will better judge of this meritorious exertion, when I add, that these answers have all been received within the space of nine days, and the remainder are hourly pouring in. I have been enabled to form some opinion upon the information which the returns contain, by the assistance of the officers of the house, and the kind attention bestowed by two learned gentlemen, who are aiding us in digesting this great mass of materials. Reserving for a subsequent part of my observations an account of the other purposes, to which these inquiries have been subservient, I shall at present state the results of the evidence, as far as they bear upon the difference between the inhabitants of the populous and thinly peopled districts.—The difference is twofold. In the first place, where the town is considerable, though the people may be of various religious denominations, no impediment to instructing the whole arises from that circumstance, because there is room for schools upon both principles. The churchmen can found a seminary, from whence dissenters may be excluded by the lessons taught, and the observances required; while the sectaries, or those members of the establishment who patronize the schools for all without distinction of creed, may support a school upon this universal principle, and teach those whom the rules of the church society exclude. But this is evidently impossible in smaller towns, where the utmost exertions of the wealthy inhabitants can only maintain a single school. There, if the bulk of the rich belong to the church, no school will be afforded to the sectarian poor; though, certainly, if the bulk of the rich be dissenters, the poor connected with the establishment may profit by the school, which is likely to be founded. If, on the other hand, the wealthy inhabitants are more equally divided, and the members of the church refuse to abandon the exclusive plan, no school at all can be formed. Accordingly it is in places of this moderate size that the difference between the two plans is the most felt, and where I can have no doubt, that the progress of education has been materially checked by an unbending adherence to the system of the national society. The moderate size of the place renders the distinction of sects most injurious to education, even where there exist the means and the disposition to establish schools by subscription. But, secondly, in the smallest towns, and in villages and country districts, there is not found the same inclination to plant schools, which so honourably marks the conduct of more populous places. Where individuals live in very narrow communities, still more where they are scattered in the country, they have not the habits of assembling in meetings, and acting in bodies. Their zeal is not raised by the sympathy and mutual reflection, which constant communication excites; and even where their dispositions are good, they know not how to set about forming or promoting a plan which must essentially depend on combined operations. In such districts, we certainly cannot expect the great work of educating the poor to be undertaken by the voluntary zeal of the rich. And here, therefore, it is, that I must look forward to legislative interference, as both safe and necessary. I am aware how dry and uninteresting this subject is to many persons present.—(There was considerable noise about this time in some parts of the house.)—It has nothing of a political, or party, or personal nature. It involves no inquiry into the conduct of the royal family. It regards no violation of the privileges of the house. It is alike unconnected with the preservation and the pursuit of place, and can afford gratification to no malignant or interested feeling. It has but a sorry chance, then, of fixing the attention of such as love to devote their minds to those higher matters. But I stand here to do my duty as chairman of your committee, and if the task which interests me should prove dull to others, I only beg to assure them, that I neither desire their attention nor their presence; and if perchance they have any more pressing avocation elsewhere, at this particular moment, I should feel obliged by their pursuing it, and leaving us, without disturbance, to the dull, plodding, ignoble work, of vindicating the cause of the poor; of supporting those who can have no other advocates; of urging the necessity of universal education, and imploring parliament to impart that blessing which can alone preserve the virtue of a populous, commercial, and luxurious empire, and prevent its stability from being shaken, by the progress of its refinement. The only plan to which we can look with confidence for securing this mighty object, is the application of a parish school system to those parts of the country where voluntary exertions are not to be expected from the higher classes of society. In Scotland this system has long been established with the happiest effects, and it was begun there at a time when all that portion of the island was in the same situation with those districts of England, to which I now consider it as peculiarly applicable. To towns of a considerable size I deem it inapplicable; and if applicable, not desirable. But there seems no other way of providing education for all the poor in smaller towns, and in country parishes. Something of this sort has heretofore been submitted to the attention of the house. About eleven years ago, a very dear and most lamented friend of mine broached it, prematurely, perhaps, but usefully, and with all the force of his powerful and virtuous mind—a mind which ever seemed to bend its faculties most earnestly to subjects that touched the well-being of the poorer, and more helpless classes of the community. The benevolent views of Mr. Whitbread then met with great opposition; and I think not unnaturally; for the house was called upon to legislate upon a great and complicated question, without any previous inquiry, and to proceed, as it were, in the dark, among a variety of unascertained obstacles. He had besides strong prejudices to encounter, even in men of high character and talents. Among these, it is painful to recollect that there was one, who ranked with the greatest ornaments of his age; one who never failed to captivate his hearers by the brilliant displays of his fancy, even while they felt that his subtleties were leading their good sense astray; whose ingenuity, indeed, was constantly laying snares for his own better judgment; and who too often tried to mislead others by paradoxes, which, on cooler reflection, he must have been the first to despise. It is melancholy and even humiliating to reflect on this, the greatest of all his paradoxes, that Mr. Windham, himself the model of a finely educated man, the most finished specimen of the power of cultivation, should have stood forward as the active opponent of national education. He was followed, as great men usually are, by persons who would have been left at an immeasurable distance, if they had attempted to reach the course of his noble genius and virtues, but who found it an easy matter to ape his eccentricities and errors. Nay, with the servile zeal of imitators, they outstripped their master, and maintained, that if you taught plowmen and mechanics to read, they would thenceforward disdain to work. It is a most comfortable reflection that such prejudices and fancies have now entirely died away. During this, and the two last sessions, in all the discussions that have taken place, both in the house, in the committee, and in the country, I have never heard a single whisper hostile to the universal diffusion of knowledge. Every thing like opposition to the measure itself is anxiously disclaimed by all. The only question entertained is touching the best, that is, the surest and the most economical method of carrying it into effect.—I have stated, that, in my humble opinion, we ought to adopt the system which has already been tried with so much advantage in Scotland, with such changes as may adapt it to the situation of this country. The attention bestowed from the earliest times, upon the important subject of national education in that part of the kingdom, reflects immortal honour upon its inhabitants. As far back as the fifteenth century, in the year 1494, when it would be very difficult to trace any attention to such matters in the proceedings of the English or the Irish parliament, that comparatively poor and barbarous country introduced into its statute book an Act, the mention of which, I suspect, may excite merriment in the house—an act to compel persons of a certain station, barons, and freeholders of substance, to have their eldest sons well grounded in Latin at the grammar schools, and afterwards to study the laws for three years, to the end that "justice might remain universally through all the realm." Other legislative provisions of inferior importance were made in the course of the sixteenth century, and, at length, in the reign of Charles I., the attention of government was directed to the establishment of parochial schools.

[illegible]

[illegible]ently marked the difference of his conduct towards England, and towards his ancient hereditary kingdom. In this respect he somewhat resembled a celebrated chief of our own times, who always treated with much more favour the country of his birth, than that of his adoption. So, whatever Charles I. may have been in England, in Scotland he was a great reformer. She owes to him the most beneficial change that was ever effected in ecclesiastical polity, the general commutation of tithe; and, about the same time, he laid the foundation of another improvement, hardly less important both to the state and the church, the system of parish schools. In the preceding reign, an Act of Council had passed, 1616, directing the bishops "to deal and travail," with their respective dioceses for "providing the means of entertaining schools." And the Statute of Charles, in 1633, compelled the landholders to undertake this work. It was not, however, till after the revolution, that the measure was rendered effectual, in 1696, by one of the last and best acts of the Scottish parliament; a law justly named among the most precious legacies which it bequeathed to its country. The experience of above a century has borne irresistible testimony to the salutary tendency of this scheme. The expense attending it is moderate. The school-house is a building little better than a barn, which, in Scotland, may cost 40*l.* or 50*l.*; and, in England, may be erected for 100*l.* or 150*l.* The yearly salary of the master, originally from 5*l.* to 11*l.*, was raised in 1803 to its present amount of 16*l.* to 22*l. For sums no greater than these, expended in every parish, the whole of Scotland enjoys the inestimable benefits of an education, which extends to the poorest classes of her inhabitants, and, in its effects, confers a thousand advantages upon the highest orders in the state. The system is efficient as cheap—extensive as useful—permanent as salutary. The distinctions which it bestows are as honourable as its effects are beneficial; and neither the one nor the other is confined to the country itself. Go where you will over the world, the name of a Scotchman is still found combined in the minds of all men, perhaps with some qualities to which sincere regard for that good people restrains me from mentioning; but certainly with the reputation of a well educated man. To the possession of this enviable characteristic, and not, I trust, to the other qualities sometimes imputed to them, we may fairly ascribe the high credit, the great ease, and what is usually termed the success in life, which generally attends Scotchmen settled abroad. Other countries where they have settled have partially followed their example, as, indeed, into what part of the world have they not emigrated?—(There was considerable cheering at this question.)—Aye, Sir, and let me ask, where have they gone without conferring benefits on the place of their adoption? In what place have they settled, that has not reaped, at the least, as much advantage from them as it has bestowed upon them? In Sweden, where a number of the noble families are of Scotch extraction, something upon the model of the parish school system has long been established. In the Swiss Cantons and in many of the protestant countries of Germany, the example has been followed, with more or less closeness, and wherever the plan has been adopted, its influence upon the improvement of the lower classes, and the general well-being of society, has, if I may trust my own observation, and the concurring testimonies of other travellers, been abundantly manifest*. America affords another instance which deserves to be cited as a triumphant refutation of the whimsies of ingenious men, who fancy they can descry something in education incompatible with general industry. That is surely the last country in all the world, where idleness can expect to find encouragement. The imputation upon it has rather been that the inhabitants are too busy to be very refined. An idler there is a kind of monster; he can find no place in any of the innumerable tribes that swarm over that vast continent. In the rapid stream of its active and strenuous population, it is impossible for any one to stand still a moment; if he partake not of its motion, he will be overwhelmed or dashed aside. Yet such is the conviction there, that popular education forms the best foundation of national prosperity, that in all the grants made by the government of their boundless territory, a certain portion of each township, I believe the twentieth lot, is reserved for the expense of instructing and maintaining the poor.—I have already adverted to the introduction of this subject some years ago by Mr. Whitbread. The only sound objection which was then urged against a plan, resembling in some of its principles the one I am now upon, though differing in many important respects, is so germain to the matter in question, and proceeded from so respectable a quarter, that I must here shortly notice it. Mr. Perceval deemed my honourable friend's proposal premature; he thought it was beginning at the wrong end, to legislate before we had inquired; and he recommended (what I was not aware of two years ago, when I first proposed the present measure) that before any thing farther were done, a commission should be appointed to examine the present state of the charitable foundations, and other institutions for educating the poor. The committee has already made great progress in the investigation of

* By 43 Geo. 3. c. 54. More accurately, the old stipends were from 5*l.* 11*s.* 1*d.* to 11*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.*; the new stipends are from 16*l.* 13*s.* 3*d.* to 22*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.* and they are to be corrected every 25 years, according to the price of grain.

* In the year 1814, the Editor passed four months in Switzerland, where he had an opportunity of witnessing the great advantages derived from education. With respect to Scotland, it is only necessary to compare the present state of that country with what it was a short time before the parish school system was completely established. In 1698, the celebrated FLETCHER of Saltoun declared—"There are at this time in Scotland 200,000 people begging from door to door; and though the number of them be perhaps double to what it was formerly, by reason of this present great distress"—a famine then prevailed—"yet in all times there have been 100,000 of these vagabonds, who have lived without any regard or subjection, either to the laws of the land or those of God and nature." He accuses them as guilty of robbery, and sometimes of murder. Soon after parochial schools were established, these beggars disappeared; they betook themselves to honest employments, and mixed with the other population of the country. With respect to the commission of crimes, HUME, in his introduction to the Laws of Scotland, says, "I am certain that I am within the truth when I mention, that on an average of 30 years preceding the year 1797, the executions for all Scotland have not exceeded six in a year; and as to inferior punishments, I have it from good authority, that one quarter sessions for the single town of Manchester has sent more felons to the plantations, than all the Scotch judges do for ordinary in a twelvemonth."—On an average of the last nine years, commitments for crimes, in proportion to population, have been estimated as follows:—In Manchester, 1 in 140; in London, 1 in 800; in Ireland, 1 in 1,600, and, in Scotland, 1 in 20,000! Taking this upon a scale, much less favourable to Scotland, what an irresistible argument does it afford for the religious, moral, and mental culture of the people of this country!—In the first Report of the Police Committee, Mr. Evance, one of the magistrates at Union Hall, states, that "the public schools established in the Borough, have not lessened the number of children that commit crimes," and Mr. Stafford, of Bow street, says, that "he has not observed any material alteration in morals since public schools were established." Some other witnesses express the same opinion; but these statements should not discourage those who have hitherto protected those noble institutions. In another part of the Report it appears, that there has been a great this subject; it has received a prodigious mass of information from all parts of the country. We are now diligently employed in prosecuting these researches, and in digesting their results into tables, which may exhibit, at one view, a general, but minute chart of the state of education throughout the empire; so that the eye may readily perceive in each district, what are the existing means of public instruction, and wherein those means are deficient; how many children in any given place are taught, and after what manner; how many are clothed or maintained; how the funds for their instruction or support arise; with much information of a miscellaneous nature, affording valuable suggestions to the commission which is about to issue, for the more rigorous investigation of all charitable abuses. When these tables shall be laid before the house, an ample foundation will be prepared for the legislative measure, which, sooner or later, I am convinced must be adopted; for they will indicate the kind of districts where parish schools are most wanted, and enable us to frame the provisions of the law, so as not to interfere with the exertions of private charity, and to avoid unnecessary, and, what is worse, hurtful legislation.—The more immediate subject, however, of our consideration at present, is the measure of inquiring effectually into the state and management of charitable funds, and I am persuaded that the house will feel with me the necessity of adopting it, when I state a few particulars to shew the large amount of those funds and the abuses to which they are liable. The returns in pursuance to the 26th Geo. III. commonly called Mr. Gilbert's act, are known to be exceedingly defective; yet they make the yearly income of charities about 48,000*l.* from money, and 210,000*l.* from land, in the year 1788 *. It appears from evidence laid before the committee, that in one county, Berkshire, only a third part of the funds was returned. If we suppose this to be the average deficiency in the whole returns, it will follow that the whole income actually received by charities was between 7 and 800,000*l.* a year. But this is very far from an accurate estimate of the real annual value of charitable estates. Several circumstances concur to keep the income down. In the first place, the trustees have, generally speaking, very insufficient powers for the profitable management of the funds under their care. They are thus prevented from turning them to the best account. I know of many cases where, for want of the power to sell and exchange, pieces of land in the middle of towns lie waste which might yield large revenues. The right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Huskisson), connected with the department of the land revenue, is perfectly aware how important an increase of income might be derived from an addition of this sort to the powers of trustees. It is a power which the donors would in almost every instance have conferred, had they foreseen the change of circumstances that renders it so desirable. Another source of diminution to the revenue of the poor is the loss of property through defects in the original constitution of the trusts, and a consequent extinction in many cases of the trustees, without the possibility of supplying their places. Negligence in all its various branches is next to be named, including carelessness, ignorance, indolence, all the sins of omission by which men suffer the affairs of ohers to perish in their hands, when they have the management of them gratuitously, and subject to no efficient check or control. Add to all these sources of mismanagement, the large head of wilful and corrupt abuse in its various branches, and we shall probably underrate the amount of the income which ought now to be received by charities, if we say that it is nearer two millions than fifteen hundred thousand a year; by far the greater part of which arises from real property.—It is very material to observe the intimate connection between this subject and another, which at present justly occupies a large share of our attention, and excites increase of juvenile offenders, but that most of them were deserted by profligate or indigent parents at an early age, and scarcely any of them had received the least education. The latter fact is fully confirmed by the evidence of Mr. James Miller, who belongs to "a Committee for inquiring into the causes of juvenile delinquency." He is asked, "Have you generally found the children you have visited in the different prisons to be without education?" He replies, "About two thirds of them are without education; and, as to those who state they have been in schools, when we come to investigate, we find they have not attended schools with any regularity, nor been enabled to read." This answer must be highly satisfactory to those who are friendly to the plan of educating the poor, and reminds one strongly of the language of Minutius Felix to the enemies of Christianity:—"Your prisons overflow with criminals; but there are no Christians to be found in them; except those whose only crime is their religion, or who have abandoned the faith!"—Upon the whole, we should keep our eyes continually fixed on the benefits which Scotland has derived from her parochial establishments. Horace very justly asks, "Quid leges sine moribus vanæ proficiunt?" My lord Bacon remarks that, "The ancient wisdom of the best times did always make a just complaint, that States were too busy with their laws, and too negligent in point of education." (Works, 4to. vol. i. p. 11.)

* According to the returns under this act, in the East Riding of Yorkshire, 73 places are said to possess 67 charitable donations for schools, and their united revenue is stated at 880*l*: whereas, it is now ascertained, that one school alone, that of Pocklington, has a revenue of about 900*l.* a year. In Middlesex the whole revenue is returned under 5000*l.* in 151 donations, possessed by 64 places; but the revenues of 3 schools, the Charter-House, Christ's Hospital and St. Paul's School, are proved to exceed 70,000*l.* a year.—In Pocklington School, at the beginning of the present year, only one boy was taught, and the room was converted into a saw-pit!

a most lively interest throughout the country—the poor laws. Were I to suggest that an inquiry into the extent of the funds already destined to charitable purposes, and the best means of making them available to those ends, ought naturally to accompany, if not to precede a revision of the laws for supporting the poor, I should hardly be accused of taking a fanciful, or sanguine view of the question, or of falling into the error so commonly observed in projectors and authors, who are prone to imagine that their favourite subject shoots its ramifications into all others. I have the authority of the legislature, which by its practice has sanctioned the position, that the present inquiry is connected with the poor laws. The first statute of charitable uses, which was a temporary one, passed in the 39th of Elizabeth, at the time when the state of the poor was attracting the notice of Parliament. The well known act of the 43d of that reign which followed, was passed in the same year with the celebrated poor law, and stands next but one to it in the statute book. The preamble to Mr. Gilbert's act recites the expedience of inquiring into charitable donations at the time when "the legislature are directing inquiries into the state and condition of the poor*." The present then seems an equally appropriate occasion for undertaking the investigation which I now recommend, when we are occupied in revising the system of the poor laws.—As the mass of evidence examined by the committee cannot for some time be accessible to the members of this house, I think it may be useful if I now state a few cases of mismanagement and abuse, to serve for a sample of those which may be found in every part of the country. I shall not at present name the particular places, but only the counties whence the cases have come; because inaccurate reports of the charges made here against individuals are apt to get into circulation. When the whole details shall be presented in the committee's report, the persons accused will be pointed out; but they will then have an opportunity of seeing the statements on which the charges rest, and knowing the names of their accusers. A strange neglect, to say the least of it, has appeared in the administration of some Berkshire charities. In the reign of Charles I. the sum of 4000*l.* was left to be laid out in land for the use of a school, and in 1660 the purchases were completed, for 3900*l.*, the remaining 100*l.* having probably gone for the expenses of the conveyance. What rent does the house think these lands have yielded? In 1811 it was only 196*l.* a year, five per cent. on the original purchase money a century and a half ago, and only 10*l.* more than was received a few years after the restoration. The good and diligent trustees in Charles the Second's time dealt wisely and well with the estate, for they very soon made it yield 5 per cent; but the less careful, I will not say less honest, stewards in the reign of George III. granted a sixteen years' lease at a rise of ten pounds above the rent in the seventeenth century. In 1811, indeed, the rent was doubled; though there is every reason to believe that it is still very inadequate. To another school in the same county belongs an estate let at 450*l.* which the surveyors value at above 1000*l.* a year. And the income received from lands purchased seventy years ago, by different charities, with sums amounting in the whole to 22,000*l.*, is now only 379*l.*, being little more than one and a half per cent on the purchase money. A certain corporation in Hampshire has long had the management of estates devised to charitable uses, and valued at above 2000*l.* a year by surveyors. They are let for 2 or 300*l.* a year on fines. How are the fines disposed of? No one knows; at least no one will tell. Those interested in the application inquire in vain. The corporation wraps itself up in a dignified mystery, and witholds its books from vulgar inspection. The same worshipful body has obtained possession of a sum of 1000*l.*, part of a bequest well known by the name of White's charity. In former times sir Thomas White, a merchant in London, left certain estates to form a fund for assisting poor tradesmen with small loans, somewhat according to the plan adopted by Dean Swift, but which his peculiar temper frustrated, and rendered a source of great uneasiness to himself. The corporation to which I allude, became intrusted with 1000*l.* of this money; and what they have done with one half of it I know not; they may have lent it to poor traders; but I am aware that the other 500*l.* has not been so lent, either with or without interest, but applied to pay a corporation debt, and in this ingenious manner: it has been lent without interest to the creditors of the corporation in satisfaction for the present of their debt, and a truly marvellous recommendation has been entered on the corporation books to their successors, to do the same as often as the demands of the creditor might require the operation to be performed. I hold in my hand forty or fifty more instances of abuse, extracted from the numerous returns made by the resident clergy. The committee room is directed to be opened to every member of the house; gentlemen will there see the returns arranged in piles, under the heads of the several counties, and the praise-worthy zeal of the two learned gentlemen (Mr. Parry, and Mr. Koe) who assist the committee, will help them to find any of the particular cases to which I am now referring, as well as many others which I am obliged to omit. At a place in Devonshire the question, What funds exist, destined to the purposes of education, is answered by a statement, "that the funds of the foundation school are known only to Mr. Such-a-one." In another return it is said, that no account whatever can be obtained of the funds; and in a third, the estate belonging to the charity is alleged to have been let on a ninety-nine years' lease. Now this lease of itself I hold to be an abuse. To let and take a fine is an abuse; to let for so long a term without taking a fine is a gross mismanagement of the property. What then will the house say of leases for eight and nine hundred years? We have evidence of both; and in one case for a peppercorn rent. In the county of Norfolk, a school was founded in 1680, for educating forty children; but none are now taught there at all. The reverend author of this return observes, that great mystery hangs over this charity—a remark the less surprising, when we find that the estates produce 300*l.* a year, and that the accounts have not been audited for thirty years. A school was anciently endowed in Derbyshire, and the lands produce 80*l.* a year, but no children are taught; and the return describes the management of the funds to be "most shameful and abominable." The master has done nothing for ten years; the trustees are all dead; and no successors have been appointed. In Essex a school was founded many years ago, and at one time it had fallen into such mismanagement, that only a few boys were taught, I believe, by a mechanic whom the master appointed. The present incumbent provides for the education of 70 children, but so ample are the funds, that he receives about a thousand a year, after paying all the expenses of the establishment. Owing to the neglect of the trustees, the whole management of another school in that county has lapsed to Magdalen College, Cambridge, and the clause in the present bill exempting all charities under the control of colleges, will prevent the commissioners from inquiring into the causes of this devolution, for which no blame can attach to Magdalen, but certainly the greatest neglect must be imputed to the trustees. In one place, in Leicestershire, the property belonging to a school has lately been offered for sale, by what possible right or title I am unable to divine. A surplus fund is stated in another return to have been pocketed by the trustees. In Nottinghamshire there is a free school, the funds of which our reverend informant scruples not to say are grossly abused. The scholars are wholly neglected, and hush money is given to the master. The income is stated to be 400*l.* a year. In Worcestershire a charitable foundation, which existed a few years ago, is said to have entirely disappeared. In the same county there is a school endowed with an income of 1000*l.* a year; and timber was lately cut upon the estates which sold for 370*l.* By the deed of foundation all the inhabitants of the place are entitled to have their children educated; but the master has made so many exceptions and restrictions, that only eight boys belonging to that place are taught. In the North Riding of Yorkshire is a school, the revenue of which amounts to 1800*l.* a year; six boys are taught. The master of a school in the East Riding receives his salary and lives in the West Riding; he has done so for thirty years past: it is needless to add, that "the school is a sinecure, and the funds grossly misapplied." In one of the Northamptonshire returns, the clergyman says, he can learn nothing of the application of a school estate of 75*l.* a year, which never was registered, and he adds, that other charities in his parish are misapplied, and more in danger of being lost, "in consequence of the parish clerk having been plundered of all writings relative to charities." In Derbyshire one return gives this answer to our question, What funds exist in your parish for education? "None; my lord Such-a-one and his ancestors have withheld the rent of certain lands of considerable value from the grammar-school." A similar case seemed to be presented to our notice, by a remark in a county history: the author says, that in a certain parish (in Westmoreland) a school was amply endowed and begun, "but being only in its probationary state, it was thought fit by the owner of the estate to be discontinued." In other words, the scholars were (to use the technical phrase) dismissed, the school broken up, and since that time no man had heard any thing of it. Pursuing this hint we caused the probate office to be searched, and there found a will in 1700, devising a manor, a capital messuage, the tithes of a parish, and the tithes of a hamlet, for the establishment and support of a school. Yet this school had never passed beyond "its probationary state." It is true, that some of those to whom the estate devolved have lately, as an act of their own charity, founded a small school in their own name. But it is fit that all persons should learn one lesson; when funds are given to the poor, gratitude is due, and I trust is always rendered; and then the funds belong to the poor, who are not to be called upon a second time to thank those from whom by piecemeal the same property is again doled out, which had been given entirely, and once for all, above a hundred years ago. I know another instance, in the Northern parts of Yorkshire, where for an income of nearly 500*l.* a year the master teaches four or five scholars, when, within the memory of many now living, the same endowment used to educate forty or fifty.—It may be observed of the cases which I have stated, that they are all (except two) taken from the returns furnished by the parochial clergy; and consequently they are beyond every suspicion of exaggeration. Indeed there can be no doubt that those reverend persons are rather disposed to understate the abuses in their neighbourhood, from a disinclination, perhaps pardonable upon the whole, to become the accusers of those with whom they live in friendly habits. I must add another observation upon the source of our intelligence. The returns and indeed the labours of the committee relate only to charities connected with education, and consequently we have received no evidence regarding any other abuses, although it is manifest that all charities are as liable to mismanagement as the class more particularly examined.—I shall now strengthen the inferences which I am pressing upon the house, by the high authority of the committee which sat in 1786 and 7 upon the returns under Mr. Gilbert's act. The report states, that many charitable donations have been lost, and others were in danger of being lost, from the neglect and inattention of those who ought to superintend them; that the matter seems of such magnitude as to call for the serious and speedy attention of parliament; and it admits that the returns under the act are exceedingly imperfect.—Yet, strange to tell, this recommendation has been wholly neglected by parliament for above thirty years. I shall add another testimony to the general existence of abuses, the more unexceptionable because it comes from an unexpected quarter: I mean the late Lord Kenyon; an authority greatly to be respected on every account, but peculiarly entitled to deference when it appeared in opposition to public malversations, which that noble and learned person never shewed himself peculiarly zealous to denounce. I allude to a case in the sixth volume of the Term Reports, the King v. Archbishop of York. A schoolmaster had been refused a licence on account of unfitness, and the court of King's Bench was applied to for a mandamus. The lord chief justice begins his judgment in the prelates favour with these remarkable expressions*. "Whoever will examine the state of the grammar schools in different parts of this kingdom will see to what a lamentable condition most of them are reduced, and would wish that those who have any superintendance or control over them, had been as circumspect as the archbishop of York has been on the present occasion. If other persons had equally done their duty, we should not find as is now the case empty walls without scholars, and every thing neglected but the receipt of the salaries and emoluments. In some instances that have lately come to my own knowledge, there was not a single scholar in the schools, though there were very large endowments to them."—When such are the abuses that exist, and so high the authorities which proclaim them, I surely may venture to assert the absolute necessity of parliament taking immediate steps thoroughly to investigate and sift the whole matter to the bottom. But let me here notice the clamour which has already been raised against the powers proposed to be conferred upon the commissioners charged with this important inquiry. I hear it said, that they are inconsistent with the rights of private property. Under the flimsy pretence of great tenderness for those sacred rights, I am well aware that the authors of the outcry conceal their own dread of being themselves dragged to light as robbers of the poor, and I will tell those shameless persons, that the doctrine which they promulge, of charitable funds in a trustee's hands being private property, is utterly repugnant to the whole law of England. That law regards the inheritance of the poor as matter of public, not of private jurisdiction, and deals with it as it does with the rights of the crown and the church. I am anxious to correct once for all the misrepresentation of which I now complain, because it is artfully disseminated with a view to excite prejudices against the proposed measure, by appealing to the very just delicacy that prevails on every thing connected with private rights. I therefore again assert, that a more gross abuse of language never was committed by ignorant or by wilful perversion, than the statement that charitable funds are of a private nature. The legislature has at all times treated them as public. The 43d of Elizabeth orders commissions to be issued for examining all abuses of those funds, with powers not merely to inquire, but to reform by making "orders, judgments, and decrees." Who ever thought of a commission to investigate, or control the management of private property? When a private estate is dilapidated—when land is let for an elusory rent—when the interests of the remainder-man are in any way sacrificed by the tenant for life—who ever dreamt of allowing any one not interested (except in tthe case of an infant) to apply for a judicial investigation of the injury? Yet, by the statute of Elizabeth, commissioners may be sent into any county with powers to impannel a jury, and proceed judicially against all who mismanage, or abuse funds destined to charitable uses, without any previous complaint at the instance of any party interested in the property. In like manner Mr. Gilbert's act requires every person in whose hands any such funds are, whether arising from land or other sources, to return the nature and amount of the estates within three months, on pain of forfeiting one half of the property at the suit of a common informer. The two statutes passed in 1812, proceed upon the same view of the question. By one of them (52 Geo. III. c. 101) a registry of charitable donations is prescribed; and the other (52 Geo. III. c. 102) gives a remedy for any abuse of them, by petition to a court of equity, which any two persons may present; a proceeding which has, however, proved most inadequate to the correction of the mischief. Such is the light in which charitable fnnds have always been regarded by the legislature, and so little have they ever been considered as private property! But I might appeal to the view which the common law takes of them, when it places them, as it were, under the joint protection of the crown and the community, authorising the attorney-general to file an information on the relation of any individual, who may state that a charity has been abused. What is there analogous to this in the whole law of England with respect to private rights, unless, perhaps, in the case of infants? It seems as if the law regarded all charitable funds in the light of an infant's estate, and took the poor under its especial protection. But it is said, that there is some hardship in calling upon individuals to produce their title deeds. I have endeavoured so to frame the measure in contemplation, as to remove every pretence for this complaint. Where the whole of a deed or other document relates to the charity, the person possessed of it must shew it; and he cannot possibly apprehend any injury from doing so. Where only a part of the writing relates to the charity, and the rest may be supposed to regard the other titles of the possessor, then he is only compellable to produce an attested copy of the portion which relates to the charity. And if a document is called for, which the possessor will swear does not relate to any charity, he will then not be required to produce either the instrument or an excerpt. Thus, where the title of the charity is mixed up with the title of the private property, the latter is sacred from all inquiry; although indeed the great majority of such cases are matter of public notoriety, being generally bequests and devises in wills disposing of whole estates, and accessible to all at the probate offices. Where documents are in the hands of agents, trustees, or mortgagees, a provision is made that they shall not be obliged to produce them without due notice being given to their principals, cestui-que-trusts or mortgagors, so that any objection available to the latter may hold good to prevent the production in the hands of the former. The power of commitment given to the commissioners has also been objected to: I answer, that such a power appears essentially necessary to make the machine work. Where abuses of such magnitude, as I have described, exist, we cannot expect the strong interest of individuals in concealing them to be overcome without the application of a force which shall at once defy such resistance. Ample guards and checks are however provided to preclude the possibility of this power being abused, and to give the party aggrieved speedy relief, particularly by a direction that the whole examination which leads to any commitment shall be set forth in the warrant.—The provisions exempting the two universities, and the four great schools, is the only other part of the details of the measure that may require observation. It has been asked, why those bodies should be excepted? If there be no abuses in the management of their funds or in the administration of their other concerns, what have they to dread from inquiry? If, on the contrary, there are such abuses, why no examine and correct them? I confess myself one of those who feel the force of the remark. I will allow much to the high dignity of those bodies, especially the universities; but I cannot easily imagine that it could be injured by an investigation leading to an acquittal which must place them beyond all suspicion. Nay, I think, the truest dignity is that which, conscious of innocence, defies and courts inquiry; not that which wraps itself up in mystery and affects to place itself above being questioned. For it must be observed, that as such a refusal is equivocal, and may proceed alike from fear of exposure, and repugnance to being suspected, there will never be wanting persons to believe that all the mystery so proudly affected, is intended to consult their safety rather than their dignity. But, beside the apprehension that a refusal might have endangered the bill in certain quarters, the reason which has influenced me in acceding to the proposed exemption is, that those great establishments are placed conspicuously in the eyes of the public, and may be examined by the ordinary proceedings in chancery, and by the inquiries of this house. In most cases the danger of abuses arises from the obscurity of the charity, the existence of which is often unknown, even to those who ought to act as the trustees. Into such cases, the committee above stairs cannot inquire as they may into the universities; and individuals can neither discover the abuse nor undertake a litigation for that purpose. It is singular enough, that the statute of charitable uses originated in a charge of abuse preferred against the universities. From a passage in D'Ewe's Journals*, it appears that a complaint was preferred to this house, "of many corruptions in the masters of colleges in Oxford and Cambridge, in abusing of the possessions of the same contrary to the intents of the founders, converting the benefit thereof to their own private commodities," and the "advice of the house was prayed for reform and for a bill." In consequence of this statement, a bill was passed, and sent up to the lords. But mark the progress of it. Their lordships returned it by the hands of the Archbishop of Canterbury, with an amendment; upon looking into which, it was found to be a clause exempting the universities from the provisions of the act: the act having been deemed necessary, in consequence of supposed malversations by those very universities!—It has been said, that the statute, of which I have just mentioned the notable origin, affords a sufficient remedy for the evil. The history of the proceedings under it affords the best answer to this objection. During the first year after it passed, forty-five commissions of charitable uses were issued. From that time to the year 1643, the returns are defective, the docket books in the crown office having been destroyed. From 1643 to the Restoration, there were two hundred and ninety-five commissions. The troubled state of the country during the civil wars having probably occasioned great neglects and abuses of charities, a considerable increase took place in the number of commissions, and no less than three hundred and forty-four were issued, between 1660 and 1678. From that time to 1700 there were one hundred and ninety-seven: from 1700 to 1746, only one hundred and twenty-five: and from thence to the beginning of the present reign no more than three. So that the whole number from 1643 to 1760, was nine hundred and sixty-four. Since the latter period, and indeed for twenty years before, this remedy may be said to have fallen into disuse. There have been only three commissions in this reign, and only six in the last 75 years, of which number only one has issued since 1787, when the committee stated the urgent necessity of investigating charitable abuses. It is hardly needful to shew the reasons, why the statutary remedy is inapplicable to the present times, and in itself cumbrous and inefficacious. Suffice it to observe, that it leads him who pursues it sooner or later into the Court of Chancery; and in truth, as the law now stands, that well known court is the only refuge of those who complain. See then the relief held out to us by those who oppose, or threaten to oppose this measure, and who bid us resort to the ancient laws of the land! It is admitted to be true, that glaring abuses everywhere prevail—true that hardly a parish or a hamlet can be named where complaints are not heard—true, that the highest judicial authority proclaimed the extent of the grievance—true, that a committee of the house of commons, thirty years ago, vehemently urged you to afford redress. But your remedy is at hand, say the objectors—what reason have you to complain? Is not the Court of Chancery open? Come, all ye who labour under the burthen of fraud or oppression—enter the eternal gates* of the Court of Chancery! True, you are the poor of the land—the grievance you complain of has robbed you of every thing: but pennyless though you are, you are not remediless—you have only to file a bill in equity, and the matter will take its course! Why, if there were nothing in the reality, there is something in the name of the Court of Chancery that appals the imagination, and strikes terror into the unlearned mind. I recollect a saying of a very great man in the court of King's Bench. The judge having said of his client, "let them go into a court of equity;" Mr. Erskine answered, in an artless tone of voice, which made Westminster Hall ring with laughter, "would your lordship send a fellow creature there?" There may be some exaggeration in the alarms created by the bare name of this court; but, as long as it exists, a barrier is raised against suitors who only seek redress for the poor, though no bars of oak or of iron may shut them out. Yet that the prevailing panic has some little foundation, I will shew you by a fact. I have mentioned that only one commission had issued since 1787, and I am now enabled to state the result of its execution. It was fully executed in 1803; and in 1804, a decree was made, and the court was petitioned to confirm it. Exceptions were taken as usual. Much and solemn argument was held, and I will venture to say, from what I know of that court, the case was most learnedly and plentifully debated. In 1808 the matter was deemed ripe for a decision, and since that time it has, to use the technical, but significant expression, stood over for judgment. For ten years it has awaited this final issue; and during the last four years it has stood at the head of the Lord Chancellor's paper, first among the causes waiting for judgment†. Now, in the

* On the 6th of June, Mr. Wm. Dutton Harding was examined before the Education Committee, relative to the real value of the charitable funds at Croydon in Surrey. He then delivered in a statement, entitled, "an abstract of the estates belonging to the hospital of the Holy Trinity in Croydon, on the foundation of archbishop Whitgift," from which it appears, that the rental of 1812 was 336*l.* 7*s.* 9¾; that the new rental in 1818 is 860*l.* 4*s.* 1¼*d*; but that the real annual value of the estates, surveyed by a land surveyor of great eminence, amounts to 2,675*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*

* 6 T. R. 493.

* 39, 40. Eliz. anno. 1597.—D'Ewes. 559.

* Per me si va nell' eterno dolore;
Per me si va tra la perduta gente;—
———— ed in eterno duro
Lasciate ogni speranza voi che 'ntrate!
DANTE.

† On the 1st of June, Mr. George Watts, Mr. William Wilmington, and Mr. Henry Collins, were examined before the Education Committee. They had all been churchwardens at different times of the parish of Yeovil, in Somersetshire. In that parish there are estates possessed by trustees, and destined to four different charities, one of which is a school. An estate, it appears, worth 700*l.* a-year, educates only seven or eight boys; lands valued at 1100*l.* or 1200*l.* a-year, afford only a wretched pittance to 16 paupers; and property worth 150*l.* a-year is let at 2*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.*, chiefly to the trustees themselves. The following is an extract of the examination relative to proceedings in Chancery.

"To Mr. Watts.] Did you go into the court of Chancery soon after the year 1802?—We instituted proceedings there in 1804.

How long were you in Chancery?—We are not out yet; we have paid twelve or thirteen hundred pounds, and only received about three hundred from the town.

Have you found that court afford you relief?—Oh, it has ruined me.

Have you found the expenses heavy?—Oh, good God, I have wished myself out of the world a thousand times since I have got into it; it has entirely ruined me; I had a nice business, which brought me in four or five hundred a-year, which it has ruined; and I have now a wife and family.

To Mr. Wilmington.] Have you suffered any thing in this court?—My heart is almost broken; indeed my nerves are so shook by the losses I have sustained by this proceeding, that I scarcely know what I am speaking of, and I have a wife and eight children; it is the most grievous thing to me I have ever known; I was a churchwarden only two years.

To Mr. Collins.] What have you found the court of Chancery to be?—It has cost me about 500*l.* and I am afraid I do not know the worst of it yet; I suppose the other party will bring in a bill against us.

To Mr. Watts.] By whose desire did you institute the proceedings?—By an order of the vestry, dated 24th April, 1804, to the following effect: "At a vestry duly called and held, we whose names are hereunto signed, do order and authorize the churchwardens to call upon the occupiers of the church lands, and every other person whom it might concern, for payment of the rents and arrears thereof, and on nonpayment, to sue any person or persons for the said rents and arrears thereof; and also to language of the profession, "this is my case." If any one tells me that the statute of charitable uses affords a remedy, I answer that the grossest abuses being everywhere notorious, the remedy has only thrice been resorted to for above half a century, and only once within the last thirty years; and I bid him look at the fate of that one attempt to obtain justice. I trust that the time is now come when parliament will adopt the only measure which can secure a real, effectual investigation of all charitable abuses. For this purpose it is absolutely necessary, that able and active men of business, chiefly lawyers, should be engaged to devote their whole time to the inquiry. They must be persons not only of incorruptible integrity, but of a stern disposition, and inaccessible to the cajolery which oftentimes shuts the eyes of those whom grosser arts would assail in vain. They must be easy of approach to all accusers—never closing their ears to suggestion or information, because it may proceed from spiteful or malicious motives, or may denounce abuses too enormous to be credible, or accuse parties too exalted to be suspected—not even rejecting the aid of informers who may withhold their names, as well aware that their office is to investigate and not to judge, and that anonymous, or interested, or malignant sources may supply the clue to guide inquiry; in a word, their propensity must be to suspect abuses, and lean towards tracing them; their principle must be, that no man who complains of an evil is to be disregarded, be his apparent motives what they may. It is only by such persons that this measure can be well carried into execution; and I consider the peculiar excellence of its mechanism to consist in the divisibility of the board. The eight acting commissioners are to be separated into four bodies of two each, who move from place to place through the country, and carry on their inquiries at the same time. Thus it becomes hardly possible to appoint mere cyphers, as each individual will be called upon to act almost alone; it becomes equally difficult to waste time in debates of a board, where all can talk and nothing may be done; it becomes certain that a rivalry will exist among the different bodies, which shall detect most abuses or neglects; and even if each body were only to do as much as the large boards usually named for such inquiries, four times more business would be transacted in the same space of time by their multiplication. I confess, that I am very sanguine in my expectation of the benefits to be derived from this part of the measure; I consider it as a contrivance of eminent utility and of universal application; and I trust that no new board will ever henceforth be created without the adoption of this principle.—I have already detained the house much longer than I could have wished, but in justice to individuals whose request of the trustees of the church lands, or any other person, to produce to them all deeds and writings relative thereto for their information; and further, to prosecute any suits, to the maintaining and re-establishing the charity and rights of this town; and we hereby authorize and empower the said churchwardens to reimburse themselves all costs and expenses attending this business aforesaid by rates. As witness our hands this 24th of April, 1804." Signed by fourteen principal inhabitants of the town. This was a meeting held after many different vestries had been called on the subject. The reason of this was, that Mr. Phillips, the vicar, promised to meet the vestry three weeks before on that day; and instead of his coming, he sent a note by his curate, Mr. Tomkins, to say, the gentlemen that had any books, deeds or writings relative to the charities, were to withhold them; and if the town and churchwardens were not satisfied, there was a court to apply to.

Is it, according to your estimate, estates, some in hand, and some on leases, to the amount of upwards of 2000*l.* a-year, that ought to be applied to four charitable purposes in Yeovil?—Yes, I know the property well; I have been over it and seen it several times, and I have no doubt of that being about the valuation, was it not leased out, or more.

How came you to be so much money out of pocket, and that you have not reimbursed yourself out of the rate?—Many of the trustees would not pay a farthing.

Have you any means of reimbursing yourself?—Only by the court of Chancery; the parish is in our debt about 523*l.*, as on the church book.

Have you ever levied a rate for it?—They will not grant any thing.

Do you mean to say, that you have been ousted of your places as churchwarden by the opposite party, in consequence, as you represent, of having taken part in these inquiries, they being in possession of the offices, refuse to levy a rate to reimburse you?—Yes.

Might you not have brought your action against your successors of the parish generally?—Yes, but what can we do; we have no money to go to law with, we have spent so much already.

Do you mean to represent, that having found the court of Chancery so expensive, you were unwilling to go to further expense?—We cannot go further; we have dropped every thing. There was a man who promised to pay his share, amounting to 50*l.* of that 500*l.*; I went to law with him; it came on at the last assizes, and it cost me nearly 200*l.*

Did you recover the 50*l.*?—No, they said it could not be done, because it was not out of Chancery.

How much has it cost you altogether for your proceedings in Chancery and at law?—About 1200*l.*, besides our trouble and travelling expenses, and about 200*l.* at the assizes the other day.

For this 1400*l.* and upwards, what have you gained for the charity?—It is almost as bad as ever it was. There is little or no difference, and we suppose, have got our opponents to pay likewise.

How long have you been in the court of Chancery?—Ever since 1805; it is complete ruination; it is worse now than ever it was, as the attorney employed is dead.

Is the case heard, and does it stand for judgment? is it ready to be decided?—It is in no state at all, that we know of; it is not two pence better than it was at first."

characters may seem to be aspersed, I cannot conclude without observing, that many abuses exist without blame being imputable to any one. Neglects may be handed down as it were from father to son, until the right course of administration is forgotten. A person may hold funds as his own which some remoter ancestor diverted from their proper object, and for many years the existence of the misappropriation may have been unsuspected. Trusts are everywhere found defeated by their originally imperfect construction; most commonly by defective powers of appointment where vacancies arise. And cases have come before the committee, where those who were bound to make payments could find nobody entitled to receive, so that they were obliged to keep the money in their own hands. My decided opinion is, that a great majority of the abuses discovered will be found to consist of these classes, and to reflect no blame on any one, except perhaps the original founders of the charity, who may have been negligent, or their immediate successors, who may have begun the abuses that time has both perpetuated and made innocent by concealing their origin.—It is impossible for me to close these remarks without expressing the extraordinary gratification which I feel, in observing how amply the poor of this country have in all ages been endowed by the pious munificence of individuals. It is with unspeakable delight that I contemplate the rich gifts that have been bestowed—the honest zeal displayed by private persons for the benefit of their fellow-creatures. When we inquire from whence proceeded these magnificent endowments, we generally find that it is not from the public policy, nor the bounty of those who in their day possessing princely revenues, were anxious to devote a portion of them for the benefit of mankind—not from those, who, having amassed vast fortunes by public employment, were desirous to repay in charity a little of what they had thus levied upon the state. It is far more frequently some obscure personage—some tradesman of humble birth—who, grateful for the education which had enabled him to acquire his wealth through honest industry, turned a portion of it from the claims of nearer connections to enable other helpless creatures in circumstances like his own, to meet the struggles he himself had undergone. In the history of this country, public or domestic, I know of no feature more touching than this, unless, perhaps, it be the yet more affecting sight of those who every day before our eyes are seen devoting their fortunes, their time, their labour, their health, to offices of benevolence and mercy. How many persons do I myself know, to whom it is only necessary to say—there are men without employment—children uneducated—sufferers in prison—victims of disease—wretches pining in want—and straightway they will abandon all other pursuits, as if they themselves had not large families to provide for, and toil for days and for nights, stolen from their own most necessary avocations, to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, and shed upon the children of the poor that inestimable blessing of education, which alone gave themselves the wish and the power to relieve their fellow-men! I survey this picture with inexpressible pleasure, and the rather because it is a glory peculiar to England. She has the more cause to be proud of it, that it is the legitimate fruit of her free constitution. Where tyrants bear sway, palaces may arise to lodge the poor, and hospitals may be the most magnificent ornaments of the seat of power. But though fair to the eye, and useful to some classes, their foundations are laid in the suffering of others. They are supported, not by private beneficence, which renders a pleasure to the giver as well as a comfort to him who receives; but by the hard-won earnings of the poor, wrung from their wants, and frequently by the preposterous imposts levied upon their vices. While the rulers of any people withhold from them the enjoyment of their most sacred rights,—a voice in the management of their own affairs—they must continue strangers to those noble sentiments—that honest elevation of purpose, which distinguishes freemen, teaches them to look beyond the sphere of personal interest, makes their hearts beat high, and stretches out their arms for the glory and the advantage of their country. There is no more degrading effect of despotism than that it blunts the charitable feelings of our nature, rendering men suspicious and selfish, and forgetful that they have a country*. Happily for England, she has still a people capable of higher things. But I have been led away from my purpose, which was only to express my admiration of those humane individuals, whose conduct I have so long witnessed—of whom if I have spoken very warmly, it is because I feel much more for them than I can describe—and whose deserts are indeed far, far above any praise that language can bestow. (Hear, hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh said, that after the speech, so interesting and so full of information, which the house had heard from the hon. and learned gentleman, he should not long occupy their attention. His speech had been in the first place directed to national education, and, secondly, to what was the particular object of the bill. The latter subject was that to which attention was drawn, because it was rather their business at present to consider the state of charitable funds, than to enter on any other part of the question. Notwithstanding the statute of Elizabeth, there had been greater abuses in former times than at present: but the natural tendency of all institutions towards abuse, required specific remedies to be applied from time to time. The hon. and learned gentleman had insinuated, that much injury arose from the delay of decisions in the Court of Chancery. In that court it was well known that decisions were founded upon the spirit of equity, as well as upon the precedents in similar cases; and a power of deciding quickly, and a power of deciding at the same time equitably, were two great desiderata that seemed hitherto undiscovered. All that the hon. and learned gentleman had proposed was a commission of inquiry, and a report upon the management of institutions for education. He protested, therefore, against the introduction, in making such a motion, of invidious complaints against the Court of Chancery; for after all that parliament could do, recourse must be had to that court. The hon. and learned gentleman could not propose that the commissioners should of themselves decide in all cases of abuse. He went along with him in thinking that a commission would do great good. They would do good, in the first place, by calling the attention of parliament to the management of funds for education. Individuals who were interested must be impelled to diligent inquiry and active vigilance, by the knowledge that the disposal of the charities which they superintended was under the consideration of parliament. The nature and the amount of the funds would thus be ascertained and directed to their proper object. He agreed with the hon. and learned gentleman in thinking that those funds were, in some respects, public property; at least they were public property so far as that the laws ought to attend to the management of them: but as they must have been appropriated to specific objects by the original founders, they ought not to be diverted from those objects. (Hear, hear, from Mr. Brougham.) If the proposed commission should not be modified differently from its original intention, as he had understood it, he could not give it his support. It was not in any view similar to the naval inquiry instituted by Lord St. Vincent. He thought it was much more similar to the inquiry into the administration of education in Ireland, and ought to be similarly conducted. In 1806, commissioners had been appointed to inquire into that subject. Of those, six had been named by the Lord Lieutenant, and five by the Corporation of Charitable Donations. They had taken a long time to bring their investigations to a conclusion; for it was not till 1813 that a bill had been introduced into the house to regulate the charities which they had been appointed to inquire into. He believed that great good could not have been done in a shorter period. That, therefore, was a valuable precedent. When the house should have an account of the funds appropriated to education, they could then legislate for the application of them, better than if they instituted an inquiry and a remedy at the same time. Notwithstanding the enactments of the statute of Elizabeth, those inquiries were not to be rashly taken up; for, as they could not be concluded in a short period, they could not be conducted without considerable expense. He should suggest, too, that according to the precedent which he had mentioned, men of rank and consideration ought to be named in the commission. The six named by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had been persons of considerable importance in the country, and the five named by the Corporation of Charitable Donations had been distinguished as men of eminence. But, much more ought this to be the case in a country where the charities were more numerous, where the funds were much richer, and where the difficulties of every kind to be encountered were much greater. A certain proportion of the commissioners ought, therefore, to be persons of great station, who, although they should not go into the laborious part of the investigation, could yet be aiding and assisting by their counsel and authority. If the commissioners were persons unknown to the public, it could not be expected that their investigations would be successful, or their report satisfactory. They should, therefore, be partly persons of rank and station, such as he had described, and partly persons who could give the ministerial labours required. He wished the hon. and learned gentleman had mentioned those who were to receive remuneration. He begged leave to say on this point, that it were better that they should come to parliament and receive pay during their labour, as the remuneration could, in that case, be proportioned to their trouble. The hon. and learned gentleman had named 1000*l.*; but, as they would have to go into various parts of the country, their expenses must be added to any allowance of that kind. Upon these views of the subject, he should feel great gratification in supporting the bill. The better mode of proceeding, he thought, was to have the bill printed, and to defer all further proceedings till after the holydays. He had only further to say, that as the universities and great schools, which were always in the eye of the public, had been excepted from the operation of this bill, the Charter-house ought also to be excepted. The hon. and learned gentleman had himself borne testimony to the good management of that school. It ought, therefore, to be excepted, on the same principle on which Winchester and every other great school had been excepted.

* The poet Gray observes, that "To a native of free and happy governments his country is always dear:

"He loves his old hereditary trees." (Cowley.)

While the subject of a tyrant has no country; he is therefore selfish and base-minded; he has no family, no posterity, no desire of fame; or, if he has, of one that turns not on its proper object."—Works, by Mason, v. 2. p. 62.

Mr. Brougham said, he intended no insinuation against the Court of Chancery, but had only expressed his wish, that as much delay would necessarily occur, a receiver should be appointed upon the filing of a bill, in order to prevent further dilapidation in the funds. A second point on which he had been misapprehended, was that of giving a power to the commissioners to file a bill. It did not require any act of parliament to empower a person to file a bill; but, without such a power they would be liable to expenses. He willingly acceded to the proposal to print the bill, and to defer further proceedings till after the holydays.

Mr. Leslie Foster made some observations on the commission of the same kind in Ireland, and remarked that in filing a bill in Chancery, it would give a great advantage to a person that he had a substantial interest in the management of the funds.

Mr. F. Robinson proposed that Harrow school should be excepted. A bill had been filed in Chancery against the managers of that school eight years ago, and the late Master of the Rolls had completely confirmed the whole system upon which it was conducted.

Mr. Brougham thought it was most unreasonable in itself, and destructive of the whole object of such a measure, that one gentleman should except one school, another some other school, and so leave the bill to operate only as to schools for which no member could say any thing. If Harrow school were so well managed, this bill could bear no hostility towards it.

Mr. Peel contended, that Harrow school ought to be excepted, as the Master of the Rolls had decided that it was conducted according to the will and intentions of Mr. Lyon, its founder.

Mr. Abercromby said, that if Harrow school should be excepted, every school that happened to have been in Chancery ought to be excepted. It was no proof that no inquiry ought now to be instituted into the management of a school, that it had been well managed 8, 10, or 20 years ago. It was not becoming in any school to claim exemption; because, if there was nothing wrong, inquiry could do them no injury. On the same principle every school ought to be exempted, unless there should be a specific ground of suspicion. The commissioners ought to inquire into all charities, otherwise the object of their appointment could not be effected. The noble lord had divided the subject into two parts—the inquiry, and the remedy. He must express his hope, that the only remedy was not to be found in the Court of Chancery. His hon. and learned friend had not represented those charities as public property, any farther than they were intended by their founders. If the commission consisted of persons who should take no active part in the investigation, it required no spirit of prophecy to foresee the result. On the contrary, they ought to be persons who would be most persevering in the discharge of a difficult duty. They ought to anticipate every opposition from those who knew every branch of the subject, who were interested in the present system, and who would naturally resist any improvement. They ought to be persons of integrity, activity, and of no other occupation. The noble lord, by some of his observations, seemed to hint that they ought to be gentlemen at the bar. Those gentlemen were, in his apprehension, the most unfit of any; they had professional duties to occupy them, and compared with which they must consider any other employment as secondary. Another class recommended by the noble lord were persons of the greatest respectability, and of high rank. The propriety of appointing an ornamental class of this description he could not perceive. Let them be persons of character, talents, and reputation; but he could not conceive the good of appointing men of high rank: nay, he believed it would be detrimental, because those ornamental commissioners, if not active in the inquiry, must retard the purposes of the commission. They must be persons to go into the country, and to investigate the wills or deeds by which charities were founded, as well as the manner in which they were managed. High rank could be of no advantage then; and if legal advice were necessary, the learned member opposite (the Attorney-general) would be the proper person. But, above all, he hoped provincial barristers would be excepted. The house and the country were much indebted to his hon. and learned friend for having applied his great talents to this subject, and for the lucid statement he had given this night. (Hear, hear, hear.)

The house went then into a committee on the bill.

Mr. Robinson proposed an amendment to the clause, excepting from the operation of the bill, the schools of Eton, Westminster, Winchester, and the Charter-house, for the purpose of adding that of Harrow.

Mr. Brougham protested against adding any further to the number of exceptions. If this mode of proceeding were to be adopted, the bill ought to be entitled, not a bill to promote but to exempt from inquiry.

Mr. Mills said, that if the proposition for exempting Harrow were adopted, he should feel himself justified in proposing the exemption of Rugby.

Mr. Harvey said, that if Harrow and Rugby were exempted, he should propose the exemption of the free school at Norwich. (A laugh.)

Mr. Bennet thought that the free school of Shrewsbury was equally entitled to exemption. (A laugh.)

Sir M. W. Ridley felt satisfied that the free school of Newcastle had strong claims on the consideration of the committee. It had produced many great men, among whom he might number the present Lord Chancellor and his brother. (A laugh.)

Lord Castlereagh wished the question to be met fairly upon its own merits. It appeared to him that there was sufficient reason for excepting Harrow, and he had no objection to include Rugby; but beyond Rugby he could not consent to go. (A laugh.)

The committee then divided.

For the exemption of Harrow . 30
Against it 53

The house then resumed, and, on the motion of Mr. Brougham, an instruction was given to the Committee, to extend their inquiries to Scotland.

SCOTCH BURGHS BILL.] This bill was ordered to be read a second time on this day three months.

CONTAGIOUS FEVER IN IRELAND.] Sir J. Newport presented the report of the committee on this subject.—It represented, that the origin and progress of the disease were generally ascribed to the privations under which the lower orders had suffered so severely for some time past, and to the crowds of wretched mendicants by whom the country had been traversed in all directions.—The mortality had been much greater among the higher ranks of society, whom the disease had attacked, than in the labouring classes; and the physicians and other medical attendants, as well as the clergy of different denominations, had felt its destructive force in much more than an ordinary proportion, as the discharge of duty, uniting with the claims of humanity, exposed them peculiarly to its visitation.—The disease was now generally on the decline, but it had frequently abated for a time to break out with renewed violence.—The committee therefore recommend, that a greater number of Fever Hospitals should be established, and observe, "that it is highly desirable that some exemptions from the Hearth and Window taxes should be granted to lodging-houses, under certain regulations, so calculated as to secure the benefit of such exemptions to the persons who lodge therein."

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.] On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the house adjourned from this day till Wednesday, the 13th instant, for the Whitsun holydays.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, May 13.

COTTON FACTORIES.] Lord Kenyon intimated, that certain noble lords, who wished to be present when this bill came under consideration, could not attend on Monday next. He therefore moved that the bill be re-committed on Tuesday.

The Earl of Lauderdale repeated what he had formerly stated, that in consequence of the great importance of the subject, it would be impossible for their lordships to avoid going into the consideration of the measure to the fullest extent.

Lord Holland said, he held in his hand two petitions against this bill. They had been intrusted to him to present, though, from the view which he had taken of the subject, he disapproved of their prayer, namely, that the bill should not pass. The petitions were from Mansfield, near Nottingham, and Teesdale, in Derbyshire. They stated, that the children in the factories were generally in good health, and that they were never overworked; that the principle on which they were engaged applied to other manufactories as well as the cotton; and that if the bill passed, it would ruin the petitioners.

The petitions were ordered to be referred to the committee on the bill.

MARRIAGE OF THE DUKE OF KENT.] The Earl of Liverpool brought down the following message from the Prince-Regent.

"George, P. R.

"The Prince Regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty, thinks it right to acquaint the house of lords, that he has given the royal consent to a marriage between his royal highness the duke of Kent, and her serene highness Mary Louisa Victoria, widow of the late prince of Leiningen, and sister of the reigning duke of Saxe Cobourg of Saalfeld, and of his royal highness Leopold George Frederick prince of Cobourg of Saalfeld.—His Royal Highness is persuaded that this alliance cannot but be acceptable to his Majesty's faithful subjects; and he has the fullest reliance on the concurrence and assistance of the house of lords in enabling him to make a suitable and proper provision with a view to the said marriage.—G. P. R."

The Earl of Liverpool gave notice, that he would propose the consideration of this message to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, May 13.

COPYRIGHT BILL.] Mr. Smyth presented a petition from Trinity College, Dublin, against this bill. He presented it because the hon. member for that university was necessarily absent.—Ordered to lie on the table.

MARRIAGE ACT.] Dr. Phillimore moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend certain parts of an act passed in the 26th of Geo. II. commonly called the marriage act. His object was, first, to enact, that in all cases where the marriage of any person under the age of 21 years should have been solemnized by licence, without the previous consent required in the said act of the 26th Geo. II. if no suit should have been instituted for the purpose of annulling or setting aside the same before the party or parties should have attained the age of 21 years, or within one year after the party or parties so married had attained the age of 21 years, such marriage should be good and valid to all intents and purposes whatsoever.—Secondly, that all marriages where either of the parties (not being a widower or widow) should be under the age of 21 years, which should be solemnized under a publication of banns made in any other church or chapel than in the parish church or public chapel of or belonging to the parish or chapelry within which the usual place of abode of one of the parties about to be married should bonâ fide have been for 14 days immediately preceding the publication of such banns, should be absolutely null and void. Provided nevertheless, that if no suit should have been instituted for the purpose of annulling or setting aside any marriage so solemnized before the party or parties so married should have attained the age of 21 years, within one year after the party or parties so married should have attained the age of 21 years, such marriage should be good and valid.—Thirdly, that the bill should extend only to that part of the kingdom called England.—Leave was given to bring in the bill.

WELCH JUDICATURE.] Mr. Jones moved for leave to bring in a bill " to alter and correct the practice of the several courts of great sessions in Wales, and to amend the laws relating to the same." His object was, 1st, to enact, that witnesses residing out of the jurisdiction of the courts of great sessions might be summoned by writs of subpœna ad testificandum, and of subpœna duces tecum, issued from the court of King's Bench. Provided always, that no person should be compelled to appear, in obedience to such writs, in any cause depending in the chancery of any of the said courts of great sessions (excepting upon any issue directed by such court of chancery to be tried by the court of common law in any of the courts of great sessions.)—2dly, that in all actions upon the case for words, action of debt, trespass on the case, assault and battery, or other personal action, and all transitory actions, which should be brought in any of his Majesty's courts of record out of the principality of Wales, and the debt or damages found by the jury should not amount to the sum of and it should appear upon the evidence given on the trial, that the cause of action arose in the principality, and that the defendant was resident in the dominion of Wales at the time of the service of any writ or other mesne process served on him in such actions, and it should be so testified under the hand of the judge who tried such cause, upon the back of the record of nisi prius (on such facts being suggested on the record or judgment-roll) a judgment of nonsuit should be entered thereon against the plaintiff, and the plaintiff should pay to the defendant in such action his costs of suit, and the defendant should have like remedy to recover the same, as in the case of a verdict given for the defendant in such action; and in the taxation of all costs allowed and given to the defendant, the proper officer should allow to the plaintiff out of the defendant's costs the full sum given by the verdict to the plaintiff for his debt or damages, and although no judgment should be entered for the plaintiff upon such verdict, yet nevertheless such verdict, without any judgment entered thereon, should be an effectual bar to any action commenced in any court whatsoever, by the plaintiff for the same. Provided always, that no person should be precluded from commencing and carrying on any action, against any defendant so resident in the dominion of Wales, and from trying the same at the assizes at the nearest English county to that part of Wales in which the cause of action should be laid to arise, and obtaining full costs in such action, if the judge before whom the cause should be tried should certify on the back of the record, that the Title or Freehold of Land was chiefly in question, or that such cause was proper to be tried in such English county.—3dly, that for better preventing vexatious delays and expense, no writ of certiorari should be allowed to remove any action, or other proceeding at law*, commenced in any of the courts of great sessions, unless it be duly proved upon oath, that the party suing forth the same had given days notice thereof in writing to the other party concerned in the action, or other proceeding sought to be removed, and unless the party so applying or suing forth such writ should, upon oath, shew to the court in which application should be made, sufficient cause for issuing such writ, and so that the party therein concerned might have an opportunity to shew cause, if he should so think fit, against issuing or granting such certiorari; and that the costs of such application be in the discretion of the court wherein the application should be made for such certiorari.—4thly, that the fees to be paid on any fine or recovery levied or suffered at the several courts of great sessions, and the amount of king's silver to be paid thereon, should be in the same proportion as the fees and king's silver now payable on fines and recoveries levied and suffered in his Majesty's courts of common pleas at Westminster, and should not exceed the same. Provided always, that in every case where such fees and king's silver are now payable to any person duly authorized to receive and compound for the same, under any patent, the same sum as is now demandable and payable under such patent should be paid during the term thereby granted.—5thly, that fines which can now be levied in the courts of great sessions twice only in the year, might be levied four times, as in England.—6thly, that securities should be taken for money paid into court; such security to be given by a bond, binding every officer of the court, together with two or more sufficient sureties, in such penal sum as to the justices should seem proper, for duly accounting for the money so paid.—7thly, that his Majesty and his successors should be impowered to settle salaries on the respective judges of the courts of great sessions, in the like manner as his Majesty and his successors are impowered by the act of the 31 Geo. III. c. 10. to settle salaries on the judges of England. Provided always, that no salary to be settled on any judge of the said courts should exceed the sum of for the life of any chief justice of Chester, or the sum of for the life of any other chief justice of any other of the said courts; or the sum of for the life of any other judge of such courts.—

* The ordinary original writs or process of the king's courts at Westminster do not run into the principality of Wales, though process of execution does: as do also all prerogative writs, as writs of certiorari, quo minus, mandamus, and the like.

But, in Penry v. Jones (1 Doug. 212.), it was held, that a latitat from the King's Bench runs into Wales.

8thly, and lastly, that no person should be compellable to serve on any petit jury, at any court of great sessions, unless he possessed an estate of freehold of the clear yearly value of or upwards, or any chattel estate for the term of any life or lives, or for the term of 99 years from the commencement of such chattel estate, of the clear yearly value of .—The hon. member observed, that it would, perhaps, be better to alter the whole system; but the committee which sat on this subject in the last session (See Vol. I. pp. 786—1761) had not thought so, believing that, by some proper alterations, benefits might be derived from the separate jurisdiction. The present system had existed from the time of Henry VIII. and in part, from the time of the conquest of Wales by Edward I. He should therefore content himself with proposing the alterations he had mentioned, which, if carried into effect, would be very advantageous to the Principality.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.] Mr. Wynn rose, in pursuance of his notice, and moved "that an humble address be presented to his royal highness the Prince Regent, praying that he will give directions that Thomas Ferguson, who hath been guilty of a corrupt attempt to subvert the freedom and independence of election, and a high breach of the privileges of the house, be removed from the office of Surveyor of Taxes for the county of Lanark." The hon. and learned gentleman then cited a variety of cases where individuals, interfering improperly in the election of a member of parliament, were removed from their offices, in consequence of addresses from the house. He next quoted the acts of 5 and 6 William and Mary, 12 and 13 of William III. and 22 Geo. III. which prohibit, under severe penalties, any commissioner or officer employed in collecting or managing the duties of excise, customs, stamps, salt, or houses or windows, or any person concerned in the post-office, or in the conveying of mails, from interfering in the election of members of parliament.—He said, he was aware that it must be painful to the feelings of members to inflict additional punishment upon the individual who had offended; but the house must look to the circumstances of the case, to precedents, and to their dignity. The case in 1809, which had been referred to by an hon. baronet (Sir F. Burdett) on a former night, did not form a precedent for the present case; for there the house did not go into the question, and of course gave no decision upon it. But here they had decided, that a gross attempt at corruption, and a violation of the privileges of parliament had been committed.

Sir F. Burdett rose and moved, that the Petition, praying for a Reform of Parliament, presented on the 6th of May 1793 by Mr. (now Earl) Grey, from the Society of the Friends of the People, be read.

Mr. Wynn said, he would not oppose this proposition, but he begged to observe, that the mere circumstance of a petition being allowed to lie on the table, involved no acknowledgment on the part of the house of the truth of its allegations.

The clerk then read the Petition.—It stated, among other matters, "that 84 individuals do by their own immediate authority send 157 of your hon. members to parliament. And this your petitioners are ready, if the fact be disputed, to prove, and to name the members and the patrons.—That in addition to the 157 hon. members above mentioned, 150 more, making in the whole 307, are returned to your hon. house, not by the collective voice of those whom they appear to represent, but by the recommendation of 70 powerful individuals, added to the 84 before mentioned, and making the total number of patrons altogether only 154, who return a decided majority of your hon. house."

Sir F. Burdett then moved, that the Resolution of the 18th of April, 1793, relating to the Great Grimsby election, be read.

The Clerk read the Resolution, as follows: "Resolved, that it appears to this committee, that the hon. W. W. Pole was, by his agent, guilty of bribery at the last election of members to serve in this present parliament for the borough of Great Grimsby in the county of Lincoln."

Sir F. Burdett said, these documents needed no comment. He had desired to have them read merely to shew the gross injustice of adopting any farther proceedings against Mr. Ferguson, when cases of a much more heinous nature had been suffered to pass with impunity.

Mr. S. Bourne observed, that cases of this nature must stand on their particular circumstances. Ferguson had been brought before the house, and treated with as much severity as the house had power to inflict on him in their own way of proceeding. He had been committed to the custody of the sergeant-at-arms, which must involve him in considerable expense. He had been subsequently sent to the most ignominious gaol in the kingdom. He had, therefore, been severely punished; yet it was now proposed to remove him from his employment and means of living. He had no desire to excuse or palliate Ferguson's offence; yet, if information of circumstances of a criminal nature were obtained from an individual by interrogatories, while he was not cautioned or guarded against the consequences, he thought the house ought to act with moderation, let the crime be what it might.

Mr. Bathurst observed, that parliament had recognized the offence to be a very heinous one, and it was, in fact, one of considerable guilt. Ferguson had, he believed, other sources of emolument than that arising from the office of surveyor of taxes.

Mr. Denis Browne said, that as the individual had been already imprisoned, he might be supposed to have been sufficiently punished.

Mr. Jones observed, that Ferguson had answered such questions as were put to him, and yet he was to be punished by taking away the means of subsistence from him. He understood that he derived his whole subsistence from being surveyor of taxes. (Cries of no, no.) But he had another objection to this mode of proceeding, namely, that it would be taking away the benefit of the trial by jury. (Hear, hear, hear.) If Ferguson were convicted under an act of parliament, he would be declared incapable of holding any office under the crown. But what did the house do to him? They first extracted from him a confession of guilt, and punished him by sending him to Newgate, and then they proposed to punish him a second time, by depriving him of his office. (Hear, hear).

Mr. Methuen thought that Ferguson had been already sufficiently punished, and that any further punishment would amount to persecution.

Mr. Lyttelton believed that the house would not suspect him of being inclined to favour bribery and corruption. He could not, however, vote in favour of the motion. He thought that any further proceeding would be, on all grounds, extremely objectionable. If the hon. member meant to ground on his motion any general measure, there might be some greater reason for supporting it, than if, when he had spent his wrath upon Ferguson, he took no further proceeding. But he had not mentioned any general result whatever, and therefore he could not concur in his motion.

Lord Folkestone fully agreed with those who had stated, that the great offenders ought to have been punished; but he could not come to the conclusion, that the smaller one ought now to be permitted to escape. If the house did not sanction the motion, they would mark their approbation of all persons in similar situations who employed their means to influence votes at elections.

Lord Binning said, his hon. and learned friend had adduced certain precedents, but he thought he could shew, that scarcely one of them applied to the present proceeding. The first was that of the Bishop of Worcester, who was lord almoner, and who, as a peer of the realm, had interfered in an election. The crown, in consequence of an address of the house, deprived him of the office of almoner with a salary of 100*l.* per annum. (See page 1270, and the note.) It was only necessary to state the fact, to shew the difference between the direct interference of a peer and the present case of a poor man, between the bishop interfering in his capacity and the person in question, who was merely led away by his own corrupt zeal to serve his friend. The next case was that of the mayor of Winchester, the returning officer, who had been guilty of threats and other improper conduct in an election. Had he been sent to Newgate, and afterwards deprived of his office in the customs? He had been taken into custody, but he had not been sent to Newgate: but they had sent Ferguson to Newgate, and, in his opinion, there was not an atom of ground for depriving him of what was almost his only subsistence. The next case was that of the receiver-general of the county of Stafford, Mr. Burslam. And what had happened to him? He had been guilty of bribery at an election, and two members were elected chiefly in consequence of his proceedings. Had the house sent him to Newgate? It had been advised to remove him from his office, and he had been removed; they had taken him into the custody of the sergeant-at-arms, but he had not been imprisoned. The next case was that of a person who had been inspector of the customs between Berwick-upon-Tweed and Hull. He had engaged to pay annually a part of his yearly salary to a voter, for his vote, for the borough of Haydon. He had not been taken into custody at all; but the crown had been advised to remove him from his office, which, he believed, had been done. Another case was that of Mr. Middleton, high-sheriff for the county of Denbigh, for having returned sir John Middleton, contrary to a majority of votes, taken by him upon the poll; contrary to the state of the votes at the close of the poll, without any examination of the voters, and with having presumed to alter the poll, by giving a false colour to the returns. It would be wasting the time of the house to attempt to shew the difference between that case and the present. The sheriff had acted partially, unjustly, and illegally. The rights of freeholders, and the most important privileges, were attacked by his conduct. And for such conduct he had lost the situation of receiver which he held, and had been sent to Newgate. It was their duty to meet every violation of the law in such cases with proper severity, in order to discourage such proceedings; but he submitted, whether imprisonment in Newgate were not sufficient, if not to prevent such offences, at least to inform Ferguson and all others, that they could not offend in that way with impunity? Ferguson received 120*l.* a year as surveyor of taxes, and wrote in an office in Glasgow; but his salary arising from that was so small, that, if he lost his office of surveyor, he would be reduced to extreme penury. For all these reasons, therefore, he felt it his duty to move the previous question.

Mr. Brougham said, that with respect to the inquiry in the committee, it was decided to his satisfaction, that lord Douglas had had no concern in this transaction. He was glad of that, because he had been one of those who stated, when the case was first brought forward, that, primâ facie, there was enough against that noble lord to call on him to challenge farther inquiry.

Mr. Canning thought that the measure of punishment in this case had been sufficient. It had been originally in the option of the house whether they would send the man to prison, or move the address to the crown for removal from his office. As it was, his punishment had been all that justice demanded. There were precedents on which the hon. and learned mover had relied; but surely he would not say that the peccant part alone of each person had been punished. He would not say, that it was as almoner that the bishop of Worcester was punished. He had been removed from his situation as a general punishment, as the only mark of displeasure which the house could inflict on him: and they had given a substantial mark of their displeasure by sending Ferguson to prison. Upon full consideration, after a fair and complete examination, the house had made its option; and therefore, not as it would be a mark of its displeasure, but as it would be the utter ruin of the individual, he could not consent to the motion.

Mr. Wynn, in reply, observed, that the present proceeding was consonant to the invariable practice of the house. He could not see how the offence of the mayor of Winchester was greater than that of a person making use of corrupt influence to obtain votes. It ought to be recollected, that the office promised had been very nearly gained.—An hon. gentleman had doubted, whether he meant to introduce any parliamentary provision as a consequence of his motion. He had no idea of introducing any, for the laws at present were amply sufficient for carrying such proceedings into effect. When cases came before them, the house ought to deal with them as the laws and constitution required. He was not surprised, however, that the noble lord had moved the previous question. That noble lord had moved the same question in the case of Lord Castlereagh:—(hear, hear) but, though the house then felt a strong wish to favour the noble lord (Castlereagh), the previous question was negatived almost unanimously. He could not see what the petition which the hon. baronet had caused to be read had to do with the subject. Whatever was the mode of election, it would be still equally necessary to watch over the rights connected with it. Whether we had septennial or triennial parliaments, or whether according to the wishes of the great reformer of the day (Major Cartwright), who had lately published a letter to prove that Mr. Prynne was in favour of annual parliaments, as his work, entitled "Brevia Parliamentaria Rediviva," meant "short parliaments revived," (loud laughter)—whether he said, we had septennial, triennial, or annual parliaments, still it would become the house to watch over the purity of elections, and punish those who sold votes, or procured them by corruption. On the subject of reform he might say, that the very motion now before them was one of reform. The house had the power of reforming itself, by applying the existing laws to the punishment of offences. He had distinctly stated, when he moved for the committal to Newgate, that if the house were to take its choice, the removal from office was by far the more advisable proceeding. He had held, however, that both the one and the other ought to be resorted to, and that he should begin by moving for the committal, intending to follow it up with a motion for the removal from office. Where a man had been guilty of such an offence, there was no instance of his not having been removed from his office. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. W. Pole) had held no office, when his transaction was before the house. Commitment to Newgate would soon be forgotten; and, in fact, it was a much lighter punishment than remaining in the custody of the sergeant-at-arms, as the daily fees payable to that officer were very heavy. He should therefore persist in his motion.

The house then divided.

Ayes, 57—Noes, 100.

MARRIAGE OF THE DUKE OF KENT.] Lord Castlereagh presented a message from the Prince Regent, respecting the marriage of the Duke of Kent, in the same terms as that delivered to the Lords by the Earl of Liverpool. (See page 1726.)

On the motion of Lord Castlereagh, the house agreed to the following Address.—"To return his Royal Highness the thanks of this house for his most gracious communication of the intended marriage between his Royal Highness the duke of Kent and her serene highness Mary Louisa Victoria, widow of the late prince of Leiningen, and sister of the reigning duke of Saxe Cobourg of Saalfeld, and of his Royal Highness Leopold George Frederick prince of Cobourg of Saalfeld; to express our entire satisfaction at the prospect of this alliance with a protestant princess of illustrious family; and to assure his Royal Highness that this house will immediately proceed to the consideration of his Royal Highness's gracious message, in such a manner as shall demonstrate the zeal, duty, and affectionate attachment of this house to his Majesty's person and family, and a due regard to the importance of any measure which may tend to secure the succession of the crown in his Majesty's illustrious house."

The message was then ordered to be considered in a committee to-morrow.

GRAND JURY PRESENTMENTS BILL (IRELAND).] Mr. V. Fitzgerald brought in this bill, which, after some observations by Sir Frederick Flood, was read a first time.

ASSESSED TAXES (IRELAND) ACTS.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in a committee on this subject, observed, that whatever might have been the understanding or intention when Mr. Corry, the Irish Chancellor of the Exchequer, first proposed the window tax, it could not be repealed at a time when the charges of the state required its continuance. As well might it be contended, that some of the customs in England, which had been originally imposed for the current expenditure, but which were afterwards appropriated to the consolidated fund, ought to be repealed. He felt, however, that it was the wish of parliament to extend some relief to Ireland; and from the experience of the last three years, as well as from the particular distress occasioned by the window-tax, he was anxious to give relief, so far as would be consistent with the wants of the empire. From this tax he proposed to make a reduction of 25 per cent, which would bring it to what it had been before the last augmentation.—He proposed also to reduce the duties on servants, horses, and carriages. These taxes were partly of the nature of sumptuary laws, and he trusted, that a reduction of them would induce gentlemen of fortune to reside in their own country, and spend their incomes among their tenants and dependents. But there was one class of carriages in particular which he intended to relieve, namely, the jaunting car, which was the national carriage of Ireland. The tax on this vehicle was to be reduced from 6*l.* 10*s.* to 2 guineas. This, he hoped, would add considerably to the comforts and enjoyments of the people of Ireland. At the same time, however, he must observe, that he had no intention of proposing any alteration in the Hearth tax.—He had thus stated the nature of the measure much more shortly than the importance of the subject merited, and he would only further add, that he should be happy to answer any questions that might be put to him. He should therefore move, "That it is the opinion of this committee that the rates, duties, and taxes in Ireland imposed by former acts of parliament, in respect of Fire Hearths, Windows, Male Servants, Horses, Carriages, and Dogs, do henceforth cease and determine, and that the rates, duties, and taxes specified in the schedule annexed be substituted in lieu of them."

Sir H. Parnell admitted, that the objections to the hearth-tax referred more to the mode of collection, than to the tax itself. But the increased severity of surveyors had made the tax itself, as well as the mode of collecting it, odious and oppressive. The hon. baronet then referred to the proceedings in England, in the first year of the reign of William and Mary, respecting this tax, (see page 1480) and appealed to the committee, whether, with these proceedings before them, they would choose to deal out a different measure of justice to the people of Ireland.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that he certainly could not object to any argument which proceeded on the justice of applying the same principles of revenue and government to Ireland which had been established in Great Britain. There was, however, a very material difference in a constitutional point of view, between the present hearth-tax in Ireland, and the mode in which it was formerly levied in this country. The collecting officer in Ireland could not enter into every room of a house in order to make a correct return, but was obliged to form an estimate upon a general view, the tenant being obliged to shew the contrary, if he objected to it. It should be recollected, that if Ireland were relieved from the burthen in question, some equivalent measure, probably in the shape of a house-tax, must be resorted to. Much consideration had been given to the question of how far it might be expedient to substitute a tax on houses for the window-tax, but he had great reason to believe that the people of that country would not approve of such a commutation.

Sir H. Parnell said, that if the hearth-tax were abandoned, he should not at present press for the repeal of the window-tax. He therefore moved, as an amendment, to omit the hearth-tax.

Mr. Leslie Foster contended, that no tax in Ireland was felt as less oppressive than the hearth-tax. It had existed since the reign of Charles II., but had been considerably reduced. At the Union, every house having more than two hearths was taxed; but, since the Union, none under four. This went to exempt almost the whole of the agricultural population; for there was scarcely a farm-house which had more than four hearths and seven windows.

Mr. Denis Browne declared, that he had never known a single case of hardship in the collection of this tax. If it were abolished, some other tax, more burthensome to the lower orders, must be imposed in its stead.

Sir F. Flood said, that a tax which had been pronounced to be oppressive and slavish in England ought not to exist in Ireland. He appealed to the justice and generosity of British members, who had shewn in this session that they were as much alive to the interests and happiness of Ireland as of their own country.

Mr. V. Fitzgerald said, that if this tax were repealed, a substitute must be found for it, which the lower orders in Ireland might consider more oppressive.

Sir John Newport wished that the sum of 40,000*l.* could be raised in some other mode, than one which had been stigmatized so long ago in England. He denied that, in a discussion of this nature, it was incumbent on those who exposed the impolicy of one tax, to point out the means of providing another.

Mr. Peel thought that the best course would be, to continue the duty until the next session, and then to consider whether some substitute could not be adopted.

Sir H. Parnell then withdrew his amendment.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that the taxes on windows, specified in the schedule, be paid in Ireland.

Sir John Newport, after observing that he could add nothing to the unanswerable arguments lately argued by his right hon. and learned friend (Mr. Plunkett) against the continuance of this measure, said, he proposed at present only to submit a further modification of it, namely, that the reduction of this tax should be 50 instead of 25 per cent. One of his principal objects was to restore the benefits of light and air to lodging-houses, which were now too commonly the centre of contagion and disease in Ireland.

Sir F. Flood observed, that by the reduction of 25 per cent. the Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted that too much was laid on before. If the right hon. gentleman would reduce it 50 per cent., he would make the people of Ireland happy.

Mr. Peel observed, that the hon. member for the university of Dublin, (Mr. Plunkett) had argued this question upon the ground that, in the preamble of the act of 1800, it was stated, that the tax was to continue for one year only. But that hon. gentleman had omitted to state, that it was the practice of the Irish parliament to continue the tax annually. By this act, the custom and excise duties, and, in fact, all taxes were continued, though it was called an act for the continuance of the window-tax. It must be obvious, then, that there could be no breach of good faith in proposing the continuance of this particular duty; for if there existed any obligation to discontinue this tax on the return of peace, there must be the same obligation to discontinue every other tax. He acquitted the hon. gentleman of all intention to mislead the house, conceiving that he was not aware that the act on which he had founded his argument was an act which continued all taxes. But he would ask, when the right hon. baronet (Sir John Newport) continued this act in 1806, why did he not exclude the window-tax? It was, because it never entered his mind that there was an obligation on him to discontinue this tax on the arrival of peace. Nothing was more easy than to draw an affecting picture of the state of any country. He had no doubt whatever that there existed in Ireland a very general wish for the repeal of this tax; but that wish was a very fallible criterion of the policy of repealing it. The total charge in Ireland, in the last year, was 4,865,000*l*. The revenue was 4,388,000*l*. so that there was a deficiency of 477,000*l*.; and to this must be added at least 150,000*l*. more, if this tax were to be repealed. In that case, the deficiency must be supplied by this country, and he knew not where his right hon. friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) would be able to find a substitute. The present charge of England for the Irish debt was 4,476,000*l*. This was the sum which had been transferred from Ireland, and to it must be added the consolidated fund, which would make the whole extent of the burthen at least 5,000,000*l*. per annum. In the present financial situation of the country, he must beg to repeat, that the question was not merely the repeal of a tax in Ireland, but where we could find a substitute for it.

Sir John Newport said, that his reason for not making an express reservation with respect to this tax in 1806 was, because he knew not, at the time of its existence, of any such thing as a war tax in Ireland. What he had said or done in 1806, had nothing to do with the question. If he acted wrong then, there was no reason for pursuing the same measures now, nor any reason to prevent him from confessing his error; but he did his best then, and no false views of popularity would induce him to depart from his duty of recommending to the house what he considered necessary for the public interest.

Mr. James Butler thought that some other mode of taxation would be preferable to the present; he left it to the fertile mind of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to devise what; he should only state, that 900 four-wheel carriages, and 5000 two-wheel carriages, had been put down in Ireland in the last year. The same amount of taxation might be easily raised where the mode was not unpleasant. He knew a parish in Kilkenny where there had existed the greatest difficulty in collecting tithes, till the rector agreed to take 2*s*. 6*d*. an acre, and afterwards they were regularly paid.

Mr. V. Fitzgerald said, he could not understand the illustration given by the last speaker. He thought there was no tax that would not press heavier than those already established. He could add, however, nothing to the argument of his right hon. friend, by whom, he thought, the question of good faith had been set entirely at rest. It was a fair argument to refer to the conduct of the hon. baronet in 1806: but it was not fair to measure the question on statements made by members from the representations of their constituents, and petitions on the table. If the whole of the taxes of last year would not have met the debt of the country, it was too much to attribute the distress of Ireland to the rapid increase of taxation.

Mr. R. Shaw said, he still thought that the citizens of Dublin had a strong claim for the repeal of this tax, from the pledge given by Mr. Corry. The same faith ought in that respect to be observed towards Ireland as had been observed in England.

Mr. L. Foster maintained that Mr. Corry never entertained any idea that he was bound to redeem the pledge given by him in 1802, and yet at that time the property-tax was reduced in England. So that the comparison that had been made between England and Ireland in this respect was not a fair ground to proceed on.

Mr. Chichester thought, that a substitute might be found for this tax, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would revise the present distillery system.

Sir F. Burdett observed, that there was but little cause for jealousy on the ground of taxation, since England, Ireland, and Scotland, were all equally burthened to the utmost they could sustain. It appeared to him that one strong part of this case was, that this impost upon windows was originally adopted only as a war-tax, and if the Irish had not shewn that "ignorant impatience of taxation" which it had been said the people of England had evinced, it was no reason, now that they had remonstrated, why they should not be relieved. The other strong part of the case was, the grievous oppressiveness of the tax: it was a tax upon life, the most odious of all taxes, for, on the most authentic evidence, it appeared that disease and death were promoted by it. When Ireland was compelled to agree to the Union, she had little or no debt; it had nearly all been incurred since that calamitous event: yet the pretence of taking this burthen upon England had been made a matter of boast on the other side, and it was urged that on this account Ireland ought to sustain additional deprivations. Admitting, for a moment only, that she ought, the thing was impossible; Ireland could bear no more, and it would have been impracticable to collect more there than in this country at the time the income-tax was repealed. Each was equally overlaid; and before this tax were continued to the destruction of the population, Ireland had a right to call upon ministers to make all possible retrenchments, by the abolition of sinecures, and the reduction of the needless emoluments of office. The repeal of the tax would be most importantly beneficial in all views—it would augment the population, render the natives contented and happy, and diminish the necessity for so large a standing army.

Lord Carhampton expressed his decided hostility to this tax, and, in its place, recommended an extension of the hearth duty.

Lord Castlereagh said, that nothing would be more gratifying to him than to adopt any measure conciliatory towards Ireland, after the many sufferings she had recently endured in a manner that well merited the gratitude of the rest of the empire. It was easy, however, to rail, as the hon. baronet had done, against sinecures and a standing army; but each of those questions had already been decided by the house, and such topics were not likely to sooth feelings already too much irritated. The point urged by the hon. baronet, that the fever was to be attributed to the window-tax, was only one of those pictures which he was rather too fond of painting to the house, in which a visitation of Providence was charged as the consequence of the misconduct of ministers. The fever had not broken out till last year, though the tax had long existed; and it even pressed upon Scotland more severely than upon Ireland, for no house of less than seven windows was subject to it: so that to state that disease and death were promoted by it among the poor was both a perversion of reason and of fact. It was impossible, however, to exempt Ireland without burthening other parts of the empire, or other classes of subjects; for the hon. baronet would find few to agree with him in the opinion, that the exigency of public affairs did not require the collection of the present amount of revenue. He was, therefore, quite ready to sustain his share of the unpopularity that would attend voting against this unjust and unnecessary relaxation.

Sir George Hill expressed his approbation of the course taken by ministers, and was willing to share in the unpopularity of voting with them on this question.

The committee then divided.

For the original motion 88—Against it 55.

The several resolutions were then agreed to.

PORTUGAL SLAVE TRADE TREATY BILL.] This bill was read a second time.

STEAM BOATS BILL.] This bill was reported, and ordered to be read a third time on Friday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, May 14.

COTTON FACTORIES BILL.] The Earl of Lauderdale rose, in pursuance of the prayer of the petition which he had submitted to their lordships some days ago, to move that several persons be ordered to attend on Tuesday next, to give evidence before the committee on the bill. Four of the persons he proposed to call to the bar were petitioners in favour of the bill. One was the clergyman of the parish; and another, one of the first surgeons in Manchester. As their lordships had agreed to hear counsel, it was proper that witnesses should be in attendance, to be ready if called upon. He therefore moved, that the Rev. Dr. Black, Mr. Samuel Archer, Mr. W. Simmons, surgeon, &c. be ordered to attend to give evidence on Tuesday next.

Lord Kenyon did not conceive that any further evidence was necessary. The house had before them the evidence taken in the committee of the commons, and he did not suppose that any thing could occur to alter the opinion which he had already formed respecting this measure.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, he could not suppose that the house would determine not to hear evidence in despite of whatever might be stated in the case of the petitioners, for nothing could be more repugnant to justice than such a decision.

Lord Kenyon observed, that the house had made an order for hearing counsel, but he must repeat, that unless something were stated which should induce him to alter his opinion, which he was far from expecting would be the case, he should resist the examination of witnesses.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, he had read with great attention all the evidence in the report on which the noble lord placed so much reliance, and could shew that it abounded with inconsistencies and absurdities.—The motion was then agreed to.

CHIMNEY-SWEEPERS REGULATION BILL.] Lord Auckland rose, to move that this bill be read a third time this day six months. He did not at first expect that any thing could have occurred to have induced him to postpone a measure, the object of which was to put an end to a most severe labour so unnaturally imposed on children of a tender age; but the investigation which had taken place in the committee proved the necessity of a delay to which he was reluctantly bound to accede. During the investigation which had taken place, it had been asserted, that there were in this trade many well-disposed persons who treated with humanity the children they employed; but it was at the same time admitted that many, whether instigated by poverty or the desire of gain, were guilty of acts of great inhumanity, and that the unfortunate children employed as chimney-sweepers had often scarcely a home, and when they grew too large for their employment, were frequently dismissed, destitute of any thing to support them, and without any means of rendering themselves useful to society. It had been suggested, that these evils might be corrected by a modified bill; but it was his opinion, that the whole practice ought to be put an end to. Abounding as this trade did with so many and such enormous evils, he could not approve of any attempt at modification, which, while it corrected some, would leave others in full vigour. Much had lately been said in that house on the impropriety of imposing restrictions on labour; but he was sure, that the affording of protection to the unfortunate children who were the objects of this bill could not be called interfering either with a free or a fair trade. What he conceived ought to be the principle which should guide their lordships in a case of this kind was, that no persons should be permitted to impose on others, and especially on children, any labour calculated to injure their health or impair their bodily strength. This was what no individual ought to be allowed to do for his own advantage; and he never could suppose that their lordships would give their sanction to the continuance of a trade in which such a practice prevailed, especially as it appeared that it could be done away with at a very inconsiderable expense. He had been fully persuaded, that to convince their lordships that the practice could be abolished was all that was necessary to induce them to agree to the bill. With this view he had entered into the investigation; and it would be found, that though there had been much contradictory evidence, yet that, after all that had been stated by persons of the utmost experience, the preponderance was greatly in favour of the abolition of the practice. In the meantime, an address had been voted by their lordships, for the purpose of causing an experiment as to the practicability of using machinery, to be made by the surveyor-general. That experiment had already commenced on a very extensive scale, and 60 of the most difficult chimnies had been swept without any failure. The result of the experiment would afterwards be considered by a board composed of bricklayers and masons; but it was obviously impossible that this investigation could be brought to a conclusion in the present session. On that account, he could not now press the third reading of the bill; but the delay would give farther time to the public for preparations to meet the change of practice, and might smooth many difficulties which otherwise would have occurred. The bill would be introduced early in the next session, with a full confidence of success in the accomplishment of a measure which would prove not only beneficial to the individuals who were the objects of it, but to the whole community. The abolition of this practice might be said to raise at least one degree in the scale of civilization those who removed from themselves so disgraceful a stain.—He concluded by moving that the bill be read a third time this day six months.

The motion was agreed to*.

MARRIAGE OF THE DUKE OF KENT.] The Earl of Liverpool moved the order of the day for the consideration of the Prince Regent's message on the subject of the marriage of the Duke of Kent with the Princess of Leiningen.

* The practice of sweeping chimnies by means of children is attended with so much cruelty, that no inconveniences of a private nature, such as the alteration of flues, ought to stand in the way of its abolition.—Beckmann in his History of Inventions, has clearly proved, that the houses of the ancients had no chimnies; they had merely an opening in the roof, under which the fire was made. The oldest certain account of chimnies occurs in the year 1347, at Venice. While they continued to be built in so simple a manner, and of such a width as they are still observed to be in old houses, they were so easily cleaned that this service could be performed by a servant with a wisp of straw, or a little brush-wood fastened to a rope; but after the flues, in order to save room, were made narrower, or when several flues were united together, the cleaning of them became so difficult, that they required boys, or people of small size, accustomed to that employment. The first chimney-sweepers were Savoyards and Piedmontese. The Lotharingians undertook this business also, and on that account the Duke of Lotharingia was styled the Imperial Fire-Master. The first Germans who condescended to clean chimnies appear to have been miners; and their chimney sweepers still procure boys from the Hartz forest. The greater part of the chimney-sweepers (ramoneurs de cheminées) in Paris, at present, are Savoyards; and there, as in this country, we see their little children who, clad in linen frocks, will, when called upon, scramble up at the hazard of their lives, with their besoms and other instruments, through a narrow funnel often fifty feet in length, filled with soot and smoke, and in which they cannot breathe till they arrive at the top.—It will be highly honourable to England, if this cruel practice should be abolished in the next session of parliament: it will afford another instance to the nations of the continent, that she is ever anxious to be first in ameliorating the condition of mankind. Great good has been effected by the steps which the legislature has already taken. Recent accounts from America state, that the substitution of Smart's machine for climbing boys has been adopted in Pennsylvania with complete success; and Lord Dalhousie, governor of Nova Scotia, has issued orders for bringing the machine into general use in that colony.—Mr. Simpson, the superintendent of the chimney-sweepers at Halifax, having reported to his Excellency, that, after four months' continued use of the machine, he is induced to adopt it in preference to the former mode, convinced by practice of its utility, and that it is competent to perform every thing essential in the cleaning of chimnies.

On the message being read, the noble earl observed, that after what had already passed in parliament on the subject of making provision for the members of the royal family who might contract marriages with the consent of the crown, it would not be necessary for him to detain their lordships with any detailed observation on the present case. He should merely state, that it was the intention of his Majesty's ministers to propose to parliament the same arrangement as had already been sanctioned by their lordships in the case of the Duke of Cambridge.—He then moved an address of thanks to the Prince Regent for the communication, expressing their lordships' satisfaction at the intended union, and their readiness to concur in the measures necessary for making a suitable provision for the Royal duke.

The Marquis of Lansdowne said, he did not rise to oppose the motion; on the contrary, there were some circumstances, and particularly the relation in which the princess named in the message stood to an illustrious person with whom their lordships had condoled on account of a late melancholy event, which must render this alliance very satisfactory to parliament and the country. The noble earl had stated, that he intended to propose an arrangement of the same nature as that which had been sanctioned by parliament in the case of the Duke of Cambridge; but he thought it due to the illustrious duke who was the object of the message, that from what he knew of the state of his affairs, it was but justice that an increase should be made to his present income. He had suffered considerable embarrassments, but they arose from no improvidence on his part, but solely from his having been left for several years without any provision. It could not be expected of him that he should particularize the embarrassments of his royal highness, but it appeared to him proper that their existence should be known. As the increase proposed was the same as that which had already been voted by parliament to the Duke of Cambridge, it would doubtless receive the approbation of their lordships.

The address was then agreed to.

ALIENS.] Lord Holland rose to move for copies of correspondence between this and other governments on the subject of aliens and passports. He was induced to bring forward this motion partly on account of a bill for renewing the alien act being in progress in another house, and partly with the view of bringing under the consideration of parliament the conduct of the Prince Regent's government, with respect to those unfortunate and persecuted persons who were exiled from France. The papers he should move for were necessary to the right understanding of the bill now before parliament, and of the situation of the persons who would be liable to its operation. With respect to the alien act itself, when he considered it in relation to the habits of the country, to the constitution, and to state policy, he could not but seriously disapprove it. Every thing concurred to make him object to that measure; but it was, above all, necessary to consider what was the system intended to be built upon this act, and to be carried into effect by his Majesty's ministers throughout Europe. But if inquiry and deliberation were necessary before, much more were they now necessary, when the persons who brought forward the measure varied so much as to the grounds on which they recommended it to parliament. When he some time ago asked the noble earl, whether there subsisted any engagements between his Majesty's government and any foreign state on the subject of aliens, the noble earl answered in the negative. When he again asked, whether any intercourse or communication had taken place between his Majesty's government and foreign powers, relative to the considerations on which this bill had been founded, the noble earl replied, that the measure was to be proposed solely on British views; and yet it appeared that, in another place, it was not from any apprehension of danger from the residence of aliens in this country that the bill was introduced, but because it was necessary for the tranquillity of other countries. These declarations were apparently very contradictory, and it would require reasoning of rather a subtile nature to reconcile them. He supposed his Majesty's ministers meant to say, that it was necessary to the tranquillity of Europe that France should be tranquil; and that the tranquillity of Europe being necessary to the peace of this country, we must endeavour to keep France quiet; and that this object was to be accomplished by joining in the persecution of a few unfortunate men who had fallen under the displeasure of the present French government. But how did this declaration appear, coming from that statesman who had taken so much merit to himself for the adjustment of the present system in Europe, obtained at the expense of so much blood and treasure? It was a rare acknowledgment, that the fabric which he had by unheard-of sacrifices raised, was after all found to be of so frail and tottering a nature, that if a few wretched, homeless, individuals should be allowed to breathe the air of England, or find a resting-place in any part of this free country, it would infallibly be overthrown. It was also a complete acknowledgment that the introduction of this bill depended on the opinions which might be entertained by other governments with regard to their safety; that the opinions of a Fouché, a de Caze, or any French minister of police, were in future to regulate the administration of justice in Great Britain. This was the evident conclusion to be drawn from the measure. If the noble earl opposite dissented from it, did he mean to say that the ministers of the Prince Regent possessed such all-seeing faculties as to be able of their own knowledge to declare whether any foreigner who might arrive in this country was a friend of Buonaparte or the Bourbons? It was evident that they must intend to take the opinion of the French minister on the character of any individual, before they put the law in force against him; and what was this but rendering the laws of this country subservient to the government of France—nay, to the police of France, that establishment which had proved itself through the various stages of the revolution the most abandoned and the most unjust that ever disgraced even an absolute monarchy. He knew it had been urged that, if an alien act had been properly enforced in the Netherlands, the attack upon a noble commander at Paris might have been prevented; but this attack had been made since the establishment of an alien act there; and in the two years when no such act existed, no attack had been made. That the principles of the Netherlands had once been the very opposite of those now pursued, was clear from the statement of one of the great writers of this country, who knew those principles better than any other person—he meant Sir William Temple. In tracing the prosperity of that country, he had said, "that the object of its government had been to make that country the common refuge of all miserable men; that this was a principle from which no treaties could move them. Even during their dependence on Henry IV. of France, all persons banished from that country made Holland their refuge." Those refugees, too, were connected with what was called the French party in Holland, so that there was a particular objection to them. He need not point out the advantage of such a line of policy. (Hear.) So strictly had it been pursued by Holland, that when, in the time of Charles II., the Earl of Shaftesbury was forced to fly, where did he take refuge?—in Holland; he who had terminated every speech with "Delenda est Carthago." Could there be a stronger proof that it was a fundamental maxim with that government to receive all who sought its protection? But his Majesty's ministers, it seemed, had discovered a new system, and notwithstanding the dictum of William III., which stated that country to be too small to maintain a large army, and too weak to repel a small one; after acting in defiance of that policy, and in opposition to what had been laid down by De Witt; after doing what they had deprecated, and dividing the Spanish Netherlands between Holland and France, they proceeded to call on the former kingdom to depart from the principles which had made it a great state.—These were the grounds on which he thought their lordships were entitled to have the papers for which he intended to move. The progress of the alien act had certainly brought the subject to his mind, but he called for these papers exclusively of that consideration. If their lordships agreed to their production, they would find that our foreign ministers were employed in hunting out a few miserable men, and marking them for destruction; that we were using our influence with all foreign governments to check every notion of liberality. He said this with reference to what fell from a noble lord opposite during the late war. After Napoleon had committed that atrocious and unjustifiable act, the invasion of Spain, the noble lord said, that the war had assumed a feature different from what it had ever done before; that it became a war of the people; that the successes afterwards obtained over Napoleon arose from the indignation of the people of Europe, and that our best hope was in the concurrence of the people. Did the noble lord now think that it was of no importance to have the concurrence of the people in our foreign policy? How did it happen that, go where you would, after these liberators and allies had so long managed the government of Europe, England was represented on the continent as being more emphatically opposed to liberty than any other nation? Was the noble lord so thoroughly persuaded of the stability of the system which he and his colleagues had completed, that he conceived there was no possibility of war—of war, the theatre of which might be that country to which the present motion referred? Should such a war occur, would it not be important for us to have the people of that country our friends? Did he not think he was carrying his farce of interference too far, for the sake of him who had been called no other than the constable of the peace for France? It was time for parliament to know the whole of the system, and to see whether this country had the strength, the power, and the will to put it in force.—He should therefore move, that an humble address be presented to the Prince Regent for copies and correspondence of all measures relating to aliens since November 1815, and also relating to passports refused to persons going to or coming from the Netherlands since that period.

The Earl of Liverpool said, the noble lord had admitted, that the alien bill had been in some measure the occasion of his thus addressing the house; and he (Lord Liverpool) had before explicitly stated, that that measure had not been adopted in consequence of any communication with foreign powers, but because it was expedient for the safety of this country. Whenever that measure should come before the house, he should be ready to shew the expediency of it; but this was not the time for so doing. The noble lord had thought proper to connect the flight of certain persons to the Netherlands with this measure: but under the last act, only three persons had been sent out of this country, and not one of them in consequence of any communication with any other government: there was no ground shewn, therefore, that the present bill should have been asked for on that account. This, however, was not an occasion for entering into the grounds of an act passed two years ago, or of the one now proposed; but he had no hesitation in saying, that it was not safe, in the present state of the world, that facilities should not exist for sending aliens out of the country, which the common law did not afford, although it gave the right without those facilities. We must look at the state of Europe; and if there existed an alien act in other countries, driving all persons of the worst character into this country, was it fitting that this government should not have the power to send them out? He certainly thought it most fit, on British principles, that it should have this power. He should not enter into the detail that the noble lord had given of the former policy of the Netherlands; but he would assert that this government had never interfered with any other in the fair exercise of their legitimate powers. As to the objection to annexing the Netherlands to Holland, this was not the time for entering on that question; but he had no difficulty in stating (without disputing the authorities quoted, or their applicability to other times,) that, for the interest of Holland, the Netherlands, and Europe, no arrangement could have been more wise. The attachment of the people to their sovereign had not been weakened by the measure; we all knew what that attachment was before the French revolution; but, even now, there was no country where the people were more attached to their sovereign. They had the advantage of enjoying their own laws and privileges, and a free constitution, he would say, materially improved. It had unquestionably been the policy of Holland and this country to receive oppressed persons from whatever country, and much of our prosperity in commerce and manufactures was attributable to this system. He hoped that such would always be our policy. But did it follow that we were to open our doors to the worst and most desperate characters? Were we to be precluded from sending out men tainted with every species of crime?—for to that extent did the noble lord's reasoning go. We were not to open our doors to foreigners, except under condition of admitting thieves and villains of every description. The power of excluding such persons had been admitted in every system of international law, and by treaties stipulating to give up offenders, and call municipal regulations in aid of such stipulations. Whether such a system, and such treaties, were wise or not, he should not now inquire, but he adduced this as an argument to shew that the principle had been acted on. The noble lord, he conceived, had not made out a case to justify his motion, and he must therefore refuse his concurrence.

The Earl of Carnarvon supported the motion, because he wanted to know on what grounds the alien bill was to be again obtruded on the house. He could not agree that it was a necessary consequence of present circumstances, that other nations who had an alien act should send their offal here; but if they should, was this the danger that we were to apprehend—that persons of this description would inundate the country, and make an attack on our own constitution? If so, what was the consequence? Not that the present alien bill should be a temporary measure, but that it must last as long as there should be any one despotic power in Europe. He would not say that circumstances might not exist which would justify the measure now in progress; but, in order to ascertain whether they did exist or not, it was necessary that those communications should be made that were now called for.

Lord Holland, in reply, said, that the intention of his motion was merely to shew the object of the alien bill, and the effect it would have on persons in other countries. He should be ready to prove, when the time came, all the ill effects of this measure; and that honest men were exposed under it to the same inconvenience as persons of the most abandoned principles.

The question was then put, and negatived without a division.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, May 14.

Wool Trade.] A petition was received from certain Wool growers, praying the house to repeal those laws which prohibit the exportation of wool.—Ordered to lie on the table*.

Copyright Bill.] A petition was received of the Senatus Academicus of the University and King's College of Aberdeen against this bill.—Referred to the select committee on copyright acts.

Lunatic Asylums (Scotland) Bill.] A petition was received of commissioners of supply, justices of the peace, and others, of the county of Dumbarton, against this bill.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Petition of William Cobbett.] Lord Cochrane said, he held in his hand a petition from an individual who had been induced to leave this country in consequence of those flagrant acts of spies and informers, by which the legislature had been excited to suspend the constitution. This petition referred to two affidavits, sworn before the mayor of Philadelphia, whose hand-writing was attested by the British consul. One of those affidavits was signed by William Stevens, the other by Charles Pendrill; both of them persons who were implicated in the various transactions which had induced parliament, in the last session, to suspend the act of habeas corpus. These affidavits clearly shewed, that those transactions were attributable to the machinations and efforts of spies and informers, and particularly of Oliver. They described, indeed, such practices on the part of that person, that he was persuaded the house would feel it incumbent on them to institute an inquiry into the subject.—He would add, that the petition was exceedingly respectful. It stated various matters, and, among others, the conviction of the petitioner that ministers intended to establish a censorship over the press, something like that existing in France. It then prayed the house to take into their serious and impartial consideration the public documents annexed.

* It will be seen (page 1325) that Mr. Walter Burrell's motion, for a select committee to inquire into the state of the Wool trade, was negatived by a majority of 85 to 80. The following observations have since appeared in a foreign journal. "When the Grand Duke Michael visited Leeds, Mr. Gott, the most respectable of the manufacturers of that place, told him 'that he preferred wool from Odessa, not only to the finest Spanish, but even to the Saxon, which had hitherto been considered by far the best for making fine cloth.'—Upon this the Petersburgh Gazette remarks, that the removal of every kind of pressure from the proprietors of the establishments for rearing sheep, and in particular the freedom of the woollen trade, had greatly contributed to bring the wool to its present state of perfection.—Bremen Paper.

Mr. Speaker observed, that the appendix containing the affidavits, could not be received. (See page 1212, note.) It would be for the noble lord to consider how far the petition itself would be intelligible without the affidavits.

Lord Cochrane replied, that he would not say that the word "annexed" occurred in the petition, although it certainly referred to the affidavits to which he had alluded.

The petition was brought up, and read by the clerk. It purported to come from William Cobbett, of Botley, Hants, now residing at North Hampstead, in the State of New York, and was dated March 7, 1818. He stated his feelings of veneration for the numerous acts of justice and liberality performed by the honourable house, and prayed, with all humility, to approach the sanctuary of the laws. He prayed for their consideration of the effects resulting from the artifices of spies, informers, and designing men, and prostituted lawyers; and lamented the consequence of the house deferring their conscientious consideration of the important matters about which the documents would give some communication. He had met two of his countrymen in Philadelphia, who had related much of the practices of Oliver, the spy. They had drawn up their statements voluntarily, and authenticated them upon oath before the mayor of Philadelphia. These statements they delivered to the petitioner, who now presumed to submit them to the house, and to place them in their undefiled hands for proper examination. The petition made some strong remarks on the conduct and language of Mr. Cross, on the trials at Derby, and on the notorious Colonel Fletcher, who attended a meeting at Manchester. After the execution of Brandreth, he observed that it was stated in two ministerial prints, that there was an intention on the part of government to check or stop the publication and circulation of a certain description of writings. He had thought it his duty to the house and the country, to submit this petition with the documents added to it, especially as the latter were drawn up voluntarily. The persons who signed them were not at present in want of subsistence; what they required they could obtain by their industry, under the protection of a free country. The petitioner then prayed, that the house would retrace its steps, and inquire into the origin of the events which led Brandreth and his companions to the block.

Lord Cochrane moved that the petition do lie on the table.

Mr. Bathurst observed, that this petition could not be received. The object of the petitioner was not to state a complaint respecting any particular evil suffered by himself; on the contrary, he took up and dwelt on subjects which had been already considered in parliament. The whole spirit and substance of the petition were, in fact, founded on what was contained in the documents annexed to it, and to which it constantly referred. The opinion of the petitioner rested on the affidavits of two persons, who had left their country for reasons best known to themselves. One had gone away long before the suspension of the habeas corpus act. But, however, in America they were, and they went to a magistrate there, and swore to depositions which, in several respects, might affect the character of the general administration of justice here. The petition was an improper and libellous attack on the conduct of Mr. Cross, who so ably defended his clients; and on Colonel Fletcher, a most respectable magistrate in the county of Lancaster. There was no particular prayer relating to the petitioner himself. He complained generally of errors in justice on the authority of documents annexed to the petition. Without those affidavits the object of the petitioner could not be made out, as the whole of the matter could not be before the house; but those documents could not be received.

Lord Cochrane said, that he considered the petition as being very respectfully worded, and that the matter it contained was of high importance. He had, therefore, thought it his duty to present it, that the circumstances to which it adverted might be again brought under their consideration. He had, however, no objection to withdraw the petition on account of the word "annexed" being used in it as applying to the documents; but which he had not before noticed. He would do so, not from any certainty that another petition would be presented by the petitioner, but to give the earliest intimation to the two persons who had made the affidavits, that their way of proceeding had been irregular, so that they might adopt a preferable mode. For himself, he thought that if the government valued their own character at home, or in the eyes of all the world, they would embrace any opportunity of investigation for clearing away scandal.

Mr. Wynn asked, whether the petition itself would be entered on the journals?

Mr. Speaker said, it would be merely stated, that such a petition had been brought up and read, and that, with the leave of the house, it was withdrawn.

Mr. Wynn said, he was glad to hear that, as he should have objected most strongly to allow charges against individuals, of the nature of those contained in the petition, to appear on their journals, whilst the person who brought them forward was residing out of the country.

The petition was then withdrawn.

COMMISSARY COURTS (SCOTLAND).] Lord A. Hamilton moved, "that an humble address be presented to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, that he will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this house, a copy of any letter, or the substance of any communication that may have been made by the commissioners for inquiring into the duties and emoluments of the officers, clerks, and ministers of justice, of the courts of Scotland, or by any one of them, to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, relative to the inexpediency of filling up any office in the Commissary Courts: also, a copy or the substance of any similar communication that may have been made to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, from any of the commissaries, or commissary clerks, of the said courts."

Mr. Bathurst said, there were no such papers in existence, and he hoped that the noble lord would consider that a sufficient answer to his motion.

The motion was negatived.

FORGERY OF BANK NOTES.] Sir James Macintosh rose, agreeably to notice, to move that a committee be appointed to inquire into the means of more effectually preventing the forgery of notes of the Bank of England. He said, that in calling the attention of the house once more to this subject, he wished to spare both their time and their patience: to dwell on the magnitude of the evil was unnecessary. He would only recal to their recollection, that, for twelve years before the suspension of cash payments, there had been only one capital execution for forgery of bank-notes. It was the rarest of all criminal cases. In twelve years, only one person had suffered death for that crime; but, in the last seven years, not less than 101 persons had suffered. (Hear, hear, hear.) The crime which had been so rare and unfrequent, had become the most frequent and the most fatal. (Hear, hear.) There was another point of view in which this evil appeared still more striking and horrible—not less than 44 persons had been executed in London and Middlesex, for this crime, in the last seven years. (Hear, hear.) In the account of those crimes which terminated in capital punishment, forgery was at the head of the list—before murder, and still more, before the next crime which was visited with death—burglary. The expenses of prosecutions for forgery on the part of the Bank last year were 30,000*l.*; in the present year, in which prosecutions had made such gigantic strides, in the three months in which returns had been made, the expense was within a few hundreds of 20,000*l.* The average for each individual prosecuted was 265*l.* This called upon the house loudly and imperiously to do their duty. (Hear.) He feared that, without the resumption of cash payments, they could not entirely remove the evil; but, at least, it was their duty to mitigate it. The severity of punishment had produced no sensible effect. This he had frequently stated; and if he had argued so from observation and from experience, he could now fortify the statement by the authority of a learned judge, who, in passing sentence of death upon several persons for forgery, in the unfortunate county of Lancaster, lamented that the frequent capital punishments had not diminished the crime. On this occasion, the Chief Baron, whom he named only to testify his respect for him, said, that unless some other means were devised, it would be necessary to make examples still more horrible and striking. As a judge, it was his province to administer the law, and, however painful and horrible, he must perform his duty; but, by these words, "unless some other means were devised," he seemed to implore ministers and the legislature to interpose. A petition from Liverpool had been presented to the house on the 7th of this month, representing, that the number of capital punishments for forgery affected the national character abroad, impaired the humanity and generosity of our laws, and made the victims of punishment objects of commiseration. It stated, that the nation was not generally convinced that every means of preventing forgery had been used; and, as the public had a right to be satisfied that no means of effecting this most desirable object were neglected, (hear, hear,) the petitioners prayed, that inquiry should be made by the great council of the nation; and they added, what deserved the attention of gentlemen opposite and of the Bank of England, that otherwise a regard to the credit and security of mercantile transactions, as well as to public morals, would oblige them to encourage, as much as possible, the introduction and circulation of the notes of private bankers, it being found that the forgeries of private bank notes were very few in number, when compared with those of the Bank of England notes." The town of Liverpool, it would be recollected, was the second mercantile town in the empire. This petition had been unanimously agreed to at a public meeting of all parties in politics. He appealed to the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning), for whom many present at the meeting had voted, that the opinion of such a meeting on such a subject was of the highest moment. But he must further remark, that this meeting was held in the county of Lancaster, where, unfortunately, great experience had been afforded of the effects of the system; where the prejudice had been strong against private banks, and in favour of the Bank of England, ever since the unfortunate failures in 1793. Every circumstance which could give weight and authority to such an application enforced the prayer of the petitioners, when they called for inquiry by the great council of the nation. The House of Commons—he would say it with due deference—the House of Commons could not, with impunity to its character, refuse to institute an inquiry. (Hear, hear.) It appeared, by the summary of the home office, of the state of crimes, that from the year 1805 to the year 1811, the number of capital punishments was 390. From 1811 to 1818, it was 580, which was in the proportion of one to eight of the whole number of crimes. If he were to assign a cause for this change, he should not name any moral or political cause, but ascribe it to what might be called the economical condition of the people. It proceeded from the prodigious ebbs and flows in the means of sustenance, from the various wages of labour, and from the perpetual changes in the currency of the country. Such variations might make the ignorant think, that they were the sport of some malignant demon; and from this, probably, they put on a desperate and gambling character. By the complete change occasioned by sudden peace, by the deep-rooted evils of a war of unprecedented length, by the greatest of all scourges, an inconvertible paper currency, which no nation had ever yet experienced and escaped from ruin, we had come into this dreadful and alarming state. The number of lives actually taken away by the severity of the laws, was not, indeed, a full criterion of the evil. They could not fail to compare the number thus taken away with the number of ordinary deaths, and to find that it formed a very small proportion. But this was not the fair view of it. Death was not itself an evil. Death in the performance of duty was the happiest consummation of life. But a life of misery and of crime, terminated by a death of suffering and shame: a father in life struggling to support his children by the desperate expedients which distress and crime suggested, and leaving by his death an example of unutterable misery, and lasting infamy, was the greatest evil which could befal men. He would say nothing of the losses arising from the present system, although they were very great. An hon. baronet (Sir J. Graham) had stated, that one half of the bank-notes circulated in the northern counties were forged. He might here suggest to the consideration of the house, that the principal sufferers in point of pecuniary loss were to be found in the class of small tradesmen, a description of persons eminently entitled to the protection of the laws. Instances of the destruction of forged notes must be numerous; because, to many, the positive loss would appear a much smaller evil, than the imputation to which they might be subjected by retaining them in their possession. The class of people to whom he had just alluded, were, in a peculiar degree, afraid of defending themselves under such circumstances, because they felt that even suspicion might prove their ruin. Having stated thus much, he now came to consider more immediately the grounds upon which his proposition for inquiry rested. And here he must express his hope that the understanding of the house would not again be insulted by the assertion, that the affairs of the Bank of England being those of a private company, were beyond the reach and authority of parliament. No private company, whose proceedings were so deeply implicated with the interests of public justice, could maintain such a principle: but in the relation which the Bank of England bore to the government of the country, it was as ridiculous as if the same doctrine should be set up by the officers of the Mint. (Hear, hear.) He did not mean to say, that the directors of the Bank had not adopted abundant precautions for their own security; but they had entirely overlooked that of the unfortunate people of England; in consequence of which oversight, the liability of the public to be plundered and harassed remained the same as in the year 1797. Had not the public, then, a right to call upon that house to inquire in its own capacity, whether the continuance of this evil might have been prevented, or was owing to an inevitable necessity? Inquiry was essential to the acquittal of the Bank directors, and for the purpose of removing jealousy and suspicion from the public mind. In addition, it might be well worthy their attention to consider, whether some mode of punishment might not be devised, that should prevent the repetition of those scenes of carnage which shocked and afflicted every mind. He hoped it was not to impute improper conduct to the Bank directors to say, that they were not exceptions to the general character of human nature; that like other corporate bodies, they adhered firmly to an established routine of forms, and felt a great reluctance to enter on the consideration of new projects. But, it ought to be recollected, that new projects, in the present case, did not go to increase or put to hazard a certain good, but aimed exclusively at the suppression of a monstrous evil. (Hear, hear.) Since the last discussion of this subject in the house, he had seen many ingenious artists and scientific persons, and was induced, from their representations, to believe that, although the evil could not be suppressed whilst the circulation of small notes continued, it might be considerably mitigated. In the United States of America, already an example of national happiness, and likely soon to become one of wise legislation also, he had been informed that a paper currency existed to the amount of 20,000,000*l.* sterling. America might, therefore, be fairly stated to be the second country in the world with respect to a paper circulation, as she undoubtedly was in the character of a shipping and commercial commonwealth. Her paper currency was, however, convertible into money, forgery was not a capital offence, and the crime was of rare occurrence. The circumstances of America might be unfavourable to the commission of the offence; but it was nevertheless remarkable that the banks in that country, not having the assistance of the gibbet to depend on, had employed the utmost ingenuity in the fabrication of their notes. He was informed on the other hand by a very ingenious artist, that any boy who had been six months with an engraver, might imitate, so well as to make the difference imperceptible, the notes of the Bank of England. He did not mean to say that the Bank itself could be deceived, (they took good care to provide against that,) but the poor and helpless part of the community, on whose behalf he now implored the interference of the house. He had reason to believe that a lower degree of art could not exist than was displayed in the preparation of the Bank of England notes, and that the principle on which the Bank acted was like some of the compendious adages received from grandmothers, that, "if you cannot entirely remove an evil, it is useless to attempt any reduction of it." Undoubtedly, it would be found impossible so to manufacture a note, as to set at defiance all the efforts of a skilful imitator; but the smallest abatement of that guilt and bloodshed which at present constituted so alarming an evil in society, appeared to him in the highest degree worthy of the attention of the legislature. The increased number of such offences must prove the fruitful cause of other crimes, and tend to multiply in horrible progression the effects of a contagious depravity. It was worthy of consideration, that this particular temptation extended its toils amongst those who were not subject to the motives which led to the perpetration of other offences. It spread its snares for the feeble, for old men, for women, for children, for persons of education. It was equally tempting to all; and, therefore, he would ask the house, whether, after they had proceeded to the extent to which they had gone in the consideration of this subject, they would now declare all they had done to be useless, refuse to put the seal to their past resolutions, and transfer the duty of investigation to the care of others? In the belief that this was not the course which they could think it right or becoming to pursue, he should conclude by moving "that a committee be appointed to inquire into the means of more effectually preventing the forgery of notes of the Bank of England, and to report their opinion thereupon to the house." (Hear, hear.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he perfectly concurred with the hon. and learned gentleman, as to the propriety and necessity of some inquiry upon this subject. It appeared to him, however, that it would be more expedient, with a view to the production of a complete report, and the discovery of an adequate remedy, to address the crown for the appointment of a commission which should be charged with this inquiry. The hon. and learned gentleman had stated, that the crime of forgery was comparatively unknown before the restriction of cash payments by the Bank. This, he conceived, was rather an exaggerated statement. In the middle of the last century the number of executions for forgery equalled that of the present day. In the years 1749, 1750, 1751, 1752, the number of persons executed for forgery in London and Middlesex, was 19; and, during the last four years, the number for the same places was only 18. He was obliged, in making this comparison, to speak of forgeries generally. In the three years ending 1813, the executions for forgery throughout the kingdom, amounted to 112. In the last three years, they amounted to 90, exhibiting a diminution of 22. But other crimes had increased in the same period very considerably. The whole number of offences of all kinds, for the former three years, was 17,087, for the latter, 19,841. These comparative results were, he thought, sufficient to prove the inefficacy of the hon. and learned gentleman's grand panacea, namely, the resumption of cash payments. It appeared that the offence of coining had increased in a much greater proportion than the forgery of bank-notes, the number of convictions for the three years ending 1813, being 392, and for the last three years, 624. The fact was, that it kept pace with the increase of other crimes, and could not be prevented by a reduction of our paper currency. Forgery was a crime which had always existed in a commercial and enlightened country, where education was generally diffused, and the means of committing the offence were always at hand. In the earlier annals of the country, the crimes committed against society required strength and violence; fraud and craft were the qualities which distinguished a modern criminal. This, however, only rendered it the more imperiously necessary for the house to pay attention to every means of discouraging and preventing the growth of the evil. With this impression, he should move, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, that he will be graciously pleased to issue a commission under the great seal, for the appointment of commissioners to consider of the best means of preventing the forgery of promissory notes, issued by the Bank of England and other bankers, and other negotiable securities."

Sir C. Morgan declared his preference of the mode of inquiry proposed by the hon. and learned gentleman. He did not think the right hon. gentleman was aware of the alarm which existed in the country on this subject, or of the degree to which the expectations of the public, that the house would take some proceeding with regard to it, had been raised.

Mr. Bennet congratulated the country on the triumph which his hon. and learned friend had a few days since achieved over the right hon. gentleman and the Bank directors. (See page 1505.) He begged at the same time to state, that within the last three months, as many prosecutions had been commenced for the forgery of bank-notes as the right hon. gentleman had enumerated during the period to which he had alluded. In 1811, the number of persons indicted was 43; in 1812 it was 67; in 1813 it was 97; in 1814 it was 63; in 1815 it was 71; in 1816 it was 123; in 1817 it was 162; and for the last three months amounted to no less than 112. (Hear, hear, hear.) In former times conviction was followed by execution; but the Bank had lately assumed to itself a dispensing power, by omitting the capital part of the charge, and bringing individuals to plead guilty to the smaller offence. During a period of three years, 200 persons had been induced to plead guilty to having forged notes in their possession, all of whom would have been executed at the period when the right hon. gentleman commenced his comparison. The number of executions was, therefore, a fallacious criterion of the prevalence of the crime, which, he had no doubt, would be more effectually repressed by laws which would not terrify the injured from becoming prosecutors, and be more congenial to the humane spirit of a civilized age.—The hon. gentleman then commented with much severity on the conduct of the Bank in the cases of several individuals convicted of, or under prosecution for, this offence. The ordinary of Newgate had told the committee, of which he was a member, that when the sacrament was about to be administered to those who were in confinement, the persons who had been convicted of forgery on the Bank felt so indignant against their prosecutors, that he did not think them in that state of peace towards mankind that would justify him in administering it to them. At the time of execution, the utmost compassion was felt by the spectators for the wretched sufferers, and the greatest indignation against the law which had doomed them to suffer; but, above all, an indignation against the selection which had been made of their particular cases.

Mr. S. Thornton said, that with respect to the selection of which the hon. gentleman had complained, it was always made on a due consideration of all the circumstances of the case, and from a wish not to stretch the law to its utmost limits. The Bank had uniformly endeavoured to exercise the utmost lenity. And, with regard to the prosecution of particular cases, he could assure the hon. gentleman and the house, that the solicitor of the Bank was not allowed to exercise his own discretion, but always acted under the directions and on the responsibility of his employers. If any means could be devised to prevent the crime of forgery, or to render it more difficult, the directors of the Bank would feel the most cordial satisfaction.

Mr. Huskisson said, that a committee of the house of commons did not seem to him to be the fittest mode of carrying on such an inquiry as the hon. and learned mover, in his very able, eloquent, and ingenious speech, had been induced to propose. If there were any suspicion that the Bank of England had negligently, for he would not say criminally, suffered prosecutions to take place, then the house might institute those inquisitorial functions which belonged to that branch of the legislature: but, at this period of the session, he thought that such an inquiry would be nugatory. He did not know what course the committee could pursue but to ascertain the extent of the evil, of which there existed no doubt, and to recommend to the crown to institute a commission to ascertain by artists, or others, the best mode of checking the crime of forgery. It was not, therefore, because he was not sensible of all the inconveniences which the hon. and learned gentleman had so eloquently described, that he should support the motion of his right hon. friend. He thought it necessary, indeed, that some measures should be immediately adopted: for although the Bank, and those who issued their notes, could ascertain whether they were good or not, it was not in the power of the holder of a note to say whether it was genuine or not, nor could he compel another to receive it in payment, if he conceived it not to be genuine. This was not the case with the coin of the realm. (Hear, hear.) He was surprised, however, to hear the observations of the hon. member who spoke last but one. The result of his speech appeared to be, to bring into odium and disrepute, not only the laws themselves, but the judges who administered those laws. He (Mr. H.) wished that the house should take some steps to check the growth, and arrest the progress of the crime of forgery; but he could not admit, that any improper selection had been made of particular cases.

Sir S. Romilly said, it was a great inducement to him to vote for the motion of his hon. and learned friend, because he did not know that there existed any disposition on the part of the right hon. gentleman opposite to institute such an inquiry. His hon. friend, the member for Shrewsbury, had not attacked the character of the judges, nor the mode in which they administered the laws: he had merely observed, that great discontent was excited in the minds of the people from a selection of cases for execution. He (Sir S. R.) also thought that it was a sort of discretion that was most mischievous: it created that feeling in the public which made it impossible to consider the crime of forgery in the way that it was formerly considered. He did not mean to say that it was to be considered as a light offence; but it was a prevailing opinion, that it was an offence for which men ought not to suffer death. So strong was this feeling, that men frequently suffered great losses rather than press the execution of the laws to that extent. He thought that the system now acted upon led to all those mischievous consequences which his hon. friend had pointed out. In every case of selection the people criticised the distinction, and thought that great injustice had been committed. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Huskisson, in explanation, said, he had not asserted that forgery was a crime which deserved the punishment of death. His opinion rather leaned the other way, that persons convicted of forgery ought not to suffer death.

General Gascoyne observed, that the necessity of inquiry was admitted on both sides, and the only question was, which would be the better mode, by a committee of the house or a commission? To him it appeared, that a committee would be the better mode, as it had been found in almost every instance of inquiry. The hon. and learned mover was too much interested in the subject to suffer any delay to occur.

Mr. Manning said, he could assure the house, that the Bank would be happy to concur in such measures as might be deemed most practicable for preventing the forgery of their notes; but it would be perfectly idle to adopt any project that might be submitted to them from day to day, and which might be copied by their engraver in three or four days. He had witnessed their patient attention to the subject, and he would add, that they would spare no expense whatever to adopt such a plan as might be found most effectual for checking the evil. The reason why they detained the notes, after the word "forged" had been stamped upon them, was, that in cases in which they had gone out again, that word had been erased by a chymical process. At the same time, the Bank always gave an undertaking to produce the notes in any part of England that might be required, for the purposes of justice*. With respect to a selection of cases, the solicitor of the Bank had no authority of that kind; he acted under the direction of his employers: and as to the directors, they judged of every case with the utmost solicitude. They were governed in their proceedings, not by a regard for their own interest and safety, but for the protection of the public: the expenses were paid out of the funds of the corporation, and for the express purpose of saving harmless those who had been imposed upon by forged notes, and who were unable to bear the expenses. It was not the practice of the Bank to interfere after judgment: but in the case of the woman who lately suffered death, he believed it would be found that it was totally impossible from the whole course of her life, for the executive government to have selected a more proper object for punishment.

Sir A. Piggott observed, that the whole of the evil of forgery had been ascribed to the restriction on cash payments, but he thought, most unjustly. It was true that there had been an increase of the offence since 1797, but the increase had been gradual from that period up to 1817, and could not be attributed to the restriction alone. There had been an increase of other crimes as well as that of forgery. In proof of this he might direct the attention of the house to the state of the gaols of Warwick, Lancaster, and York. This multiplication of offences had been owing to the pressure of the times, which equally prompted men to forgery as to other offences. He admitted the greatness of the evils which resulted from the facilities of forging bank-notes; and he was sure that no body of men lamented its existence more, or looked with greater anxiety to the discovery of a remedy, than the Bank directors. If parliament, by the appointment of a committee of inquiry, or if the crown, by any means that lay within its power, should find out a plan by which forgeries could be either diminished or entirely checked, they would confer not only a great obligation on the country, but a favour on the Bank that would be gratefully received by that corporation, who now not only incurred a heavy expense in prosecution to protect the public, but were, on account of their very anxiety to do their duty, held up as persons who delighted in bringing men to trial and punishment. Nay, in the eagerness of crimination, they were exposed to charges the most inconsistent and destructive of each other, being accused at one time of prosecuting with too much severity, and at another time of interfering too much to procure a mitigation of punishment. He was sorry to hear it said, that it was left to the solicitor of the Bank, however respectable that individual might be, to determine on the objects of capital prosecution. No such discretion was intrusted to him. He received his instructions from the direction, like any other law agent in a similar situation with regard to individuals; and it was his duty to follow those instructions, laying the prosecution which he was directed to institute before the proper court. The directors themselves examined the circumstances of each particular case, and proceeded according to the views which such an investigation suggested. When in doubt or difficulty, they asked the opinion of counsel, though in such cases they did not apply to their regular counsel*, and were guided by the legal advice they received. It did not appear fair, therefore, to make charges of this kind against the directors. Did any hon. member wish that no prosecutions for forgery should be instituted? Then let him come forward and move for a repeal of the law, instead of allowing the law to remain as it was, and making the execution of it a ground of accusation against men who did their utmost to execute it with wisdom and leniency. The directors were not only blamed for carrying the law into execution in some cases, but for not executing it in others. Was it, then, meant to be asserted, that every offence that might be prosecuted capitally, ought to be so prosecuted? The motto of the Bank would then indeed be, "hang, hang, hang." (See page 1499.) If all

* Since the case of Brookes v. Warwick, which was tried before Lord Ellenborough at the sittings for Middlesex, June 22, 1818, the Bank have returned the forged note to the holder, after having stamped the word "forged" upon it.

* Sir Arthur Piggott.

offenders were not to be prosecuted capitally, and if in cases where a milder punishment was prayed, the Bank was to be blamed, then let the house declare what conduct the directors were to pursue; let the proper line be marked out for them; let no discretion be allowed; let them be told, when a capital prosecution was to be instituted, and when the offender was to enjoy impunity, or to suffer a mitigated penalty. Those who directed charges against the conduct of the Bank, while they pretended to monopolize all humanity and justice, and accused the directors of delighting only in prosecution and punishment, shewed that they did not possess the qualities which they arrogated, and which they refused to others. Many projects had been already examined by the directors, and others would be attended to; but when it was considered that many experiments which had been tried had ended in failure, he thought it was not asking too much from the opponents of the Bank to allow two things—first, that the directors had not been idle or negligent; and, secondly, that a remedy was not so easy a thing as some people seemed to think.

Mr. W. Smith said, he did not think that strict justice had been done on either side in this debate. His hon. friends near him did not wish to monopolize all the humanity of the house, as they had been charged with a desire of doing; nor did the Bank and the opponents of the motion appear so averse to a remedy for an acknowledged evil as had been insinuated. All must acknowledge that the prevention of forgeries was a difficult undertaking, though most would confess that every thing had not been attempted which might have been done. The Bank appeared to him to have acted wrong, in withholding from the public that criterion by which they themselves were enabled to determine a forgery. The Bank inspectors and clerks had marks by which they distinguished between a forged note and a true one, but they kept those marks from the public, and thus deprived them of all means of detecting imposition. In America, a laborious, and, he believed, a successful attempt had been made to prevent the forgery of paper dollars. In Scotland, too, there had been no forgeries, though the circulation of that country was small notes as well as in this. This must be attributed to the nature of the notes themselves. For the last 20 years no new attempt had been made to prevent forgeries of Bank of England notes. The house now with one accord had agreed to take some method to inquire into the subject; and the only question was, whether the method proposed in the motion or in the amendment was the best. He was of opinion that a committee could best sift the subject, and would bring sufficient skill, diligence, and impartiality to the examination of any proposed remedy.

Mr. Canning said, that he should vote for the amendment of his right hon. friend. He did not mean to deny that the committee, if carried would not bring sufficient skill and diligence to the consideration of the subject; but, from the lateness of the session, its investigations could not lead to such a practical conclusion as a commission, which would suffer no interruption by the termination of the business of parliament. He was persuaded that a remedy to a certain extent might be found, but it would consist in the skill with which the plate was formed, and the greater difficulty of its imitation, from the delicacy of its execution. A coarse piece of art might be imitated with little ability; but a picture of Raphael, or the poems of Virgil, could not be imitated with any prospect of imposing on the most unskilful. He did not wish to diminish the evil which all acknowledged with regard to forgeries, but he would not hesitate to say that, on this night, and more particularly in the debates of a former night, there had been great exaggerations. There had been a lamentable increase of all crimes, and of forgeries in proportion. He felt that he had a right to complain of the manner in which the character of the Bank directors had been treated in the debate, and likewise of the suspicion which had been attempted to be excited against the conduct of the advisers of the crown in counselling the exercise of the prerogative of mercy. The character of the Bank directors had been ably defended by an hon. and learned gentleman, and it was unnecessary for him to say a word more on that subject; but he could not allow the opportunity to pass without entering his protest against the manner in which the exercise of the royal clemency had been treated. To call that a selection of persons for punishment which was really a selection for mercy, was unjust to those who had conscientiously discharged their duty; and to advance reproaches such as had been insinuated, would render the prerogative of pardon, which was one of the most amiable powers of the sovereign a cause of anxiety and a curse, instead of a glory and a pleasure. (See the note, page 1191.)

Sir J. Macintosh rose to reply. He regretted that his hon. and learned friend for whom he professed the highest respect, had made this a question not of measures but of character. It was upon the violent transition from a state when scarcely any forgeries were committed, to a state when they had become almost innumerable, that he founded his motion. Instead of having been guilty of any exaggeration, as charged by the right hon. gentleman who spoke last, he was ready to prove by documents every assertion he had advanced. The chief objection urged against a committee was, that its operations would not be sufficiently secret; but it was no great compliment to parliament to say, that twenty-one members could not be found in it who would not betray what was intrusted to them, more especially, when it was a matter of such high importance. It was next argued, that the inquiry would occupy time; but that was not a well-founded objection, because, where was the difficulty of permitting the house to sit a fortnight, or even a month longer, for the purpose of satisfying the public mind upon this subject? If a royal commission were appointed, no report could be made before January or February, and in the mean time the whole evil would be continued. It had been said, "And wretches hang that jurymen may dine;" but it was now for the first time urged, that human beings ought to be executed, in order that gentlemen might a little sooner reach their country houses. He could not agree that men of science would be the best judges upon a question of this kind. They might be the best witnesses, but it was for men of sense and education to decide, uninfluenced by the power of the crown, and fearless of displeasing ministers. A commission would not in any respect remove the jealousy and distrust existing in the public mind; on the contrary, it would be immediately concluded that there was a collusion between the directors and ministers, and that the mere tools of the latter had been appointed for the purpose of gratifying the former. It was the duty of the house to be firm upon this subject; it was its duty to oppose itself as a proud barrier for the defence of the people against the directors of the Bank and ministers, unless it wished to confirm the ill opinion entertained of it by many out of doors.

The question was then put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question."

The house then divided.

Ayes, 62—Noes, 106.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then moved, "That the words, 'an humble address be presented to his royal highness the Prince Regent, that he will be graciously pleased to issue a commission under the great seal for the appointment of commissioners to consider of the best means of preventing the forgery of promissory notes issued by the Bank of England and other bankers, and other negotiable securities', be added instead thereof."

Lord Compton proposed an amendment, to leave out from the words "Bank of England", to the end of the question.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that he wished the investigation to be general, and not directed merely against the notes of the Bank of England.

Mr. J. Smith said, he was in favour of the commission, but he saw no pretence for empowering the commissioners to enter into the houses of bankers in the country, upon whom no forgeries had been committed.

Lord Castlereagh said, that if the measure were confined to the Bank of England, it would seem like holding them up invidiously as the only banking company whose notes were liable to forgery.

Mr. Tierney observed, that the whole of the debate had arisen on the evil arising from the forgery of Bank of England notes, and of those notes only. It was not difficult, however, to guess the reason why the words, "and other bankers" were now introduced. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was always extremely anxious not to give the slightest offence to the Bank of England. (Hear, hear.) He was therefore afraid, that the directors might complain that their old friend had deserted them, or, to use a vulgar phrase, had thrown them over the bridge, by appointing even a commission to inquire into their private concerns. To soften their displeasure, he wished to make it appear, that he thought others as bad as themselves, and, therefore he now came forward with this motion. But if such powers were given, the inquiry would do more harm than good. The right hon. gentleman might as well abandon his proposition at once, and have recourse to his old expedient, and say, it was a mistake. (A laugh.)

Mr. Lyttelton said, there were some cases in which it was advisable to move an adjournment of the house; and in order that further consideration might be given to so important a subject, he should make a motion to that effect. The hon. gentleman then moved, "that the house do now adjourn."

Mr. Speaker was about to put the question of adjournment, when

Mr. Lyttelton begged leave to withdraw it, until the house should have expressed their sense of his noble friend's amendment to the motion of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Protheroe said, there was no complaint relative to the notes of country bankers. He had voted for the commission, but he objected to its extension in the manner proposed.

Mr. Gipps asked, whether, if the commission should be appointed according to the motion of the right hon. gentleman, country bankers would be compelled to have their notes engraved in the same expensive manner as those of the Bank of England?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that nothing compulsory was contemplated by the measure.

Mr. W. Smith said, that as the whole of the discussion had turned upon the notes of the Bank of England, he should oppose the motion of the right hon. gentleman.

The house then divided on that motion.

Ayes, 87—Noes, 75.

The motion being thus carried, Mr. Lyttelton rose and moved, "that the house do now adjourn."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that rather than have the business of the house interrupted, he would withdraw his motion, and confine the commission to the Bank of England.

Mr. Speaker said, that the house had already agreed to the motion, and, therefore, the only way of getting rid of the difficulty would be, to negative the entire question, and to propose a new one.

After a few words from Mr. Wynn, this recommendation was adopted.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then proposed, after the word "That," to add the words "an humble address be presented to his royal highness the Prince Regent, that he will be graciously pleased to issue a commission under the great seal, for the appointment of commissioners to inquire into the best means of preventing forgery of promissory notes issued by the Bank of England, payable to bearer on demand."

Mr. Tierney said, he could have no objection to this proposition, if the majority had no objection to it. (Hear, hear.) What pleased him most was, the unhappy situation of the Bank directors; for, according to the doctrine of the noble lord, they would, by this motion of the right hon. gentleman, be invidiously held up as the only persons against whom it was necessary to take precautions. (A laugh.)

Lord Castlereagh said, that this remark was unreasonable and vexatious. The fact was simply this: his right hon. friend had consented to withdraw his proposition, to which no very great importance was attached, rather than have the public business which stood for that evening impeded.

Mr. W. Smith considered it much better to retract an error than to persist in it, and thought, that the right hon. gentleman had shewn abundant good sense and good temper on this occasion. He hoped that the majority who voted with the right hon. gentleman had also had the good fortune to convince themselves of the unimportance of the proposition in support of which they divided; and, if so, he begged leave to congratulate them on their facility. (Hear, hear.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he was very ready to acknowledge that he had been in an error. He was sure that those members who did him the honour to vote with him for the address, would feel that the error was in having contested a point, which, after all, was not worth contending for.

The main question, as amended, was then agreed to *.

TREATMENT OF COUNT LAS CASAS.] Mr. J. P. Grant said, that in consequence of the arrangement that business should proceed, he felt obliged to bring forward his motion on the treatment of Count Las Casas. That person had been taken from St. Helena under the authority conferred on the governor, and conveyed to the Cape of Good Hope. He had been thence sent up the country by the authority of the governor, and detained for many months against his inclination. With the circumstances of his coming from St. Helena he had nothing to do; that was not a subject of his inquiry, though he believed there was some suspicion respecting the transmission of letters from the island. Whatever was the ground of his being sent out, it was certain that no improper correspondence was traced to him. He had been detained amongst the savages in the interior of the country at the Cape, and was trans-shipped from thence to England, in a vessel which he had been told was scarcely sea-worthy. He was brought to the mouth of the Thames within the operation of the alien act. When he arrived in the Thames, that very night a despatch was sent from the alien-office, an officer was sent on board to him, and his papers were taken from him, by what authority he knew not. He was then sent to Ostend, where he was taken by two officers, who treated him as a prisoner. He was next delivered to the Prussians, and by them treated as a prisoner, and conveyed to Frankfort, where, he believed, he was still detained under the surveillance of the police.—The hon. and learned gentleman concluded, by moving an address to his royal highness the Prince Regent, praying that he would be pleased to give directions that there should be laid before the house "copies of all correspondence with his Majesty's principal secretary of state for the home department, relative to the transportation of the Count Las Casas from the Cape of Good Hope to Great Britain, and thence to the continent of Europe, together with copies of all orders which have been given relative thereto, by the said secretary of state."

Lord Castlereagh considered the motion as calculated to throw great odium on government, which, it would be found, they did not deserve. The fact was, that Count Las Casas had been detected in endeavouring to establish a correspondence between the prisoner in St. Helena and certain persons in Europe. He had not been delivered to the government at Ostend. He was conveyed in the common packet-boat, and there was no communication in order that he might be detained when he was there landed. With regard to his papers, when they were taken, his own seal had been put upon them, and they had been sent after him to Ostend. It had been expected that they would reach him there, but though they did not, they were afterwards received by him; and a letter had been transmitted from him in return, that he had received them just as they were when he had put his seal on them.

Mr. Tierney contended, that it was very extraordinary that two persons should by accident be waiting to receive Las Casas at Ostend. The fact was, a strong presumption of concert between this government and that of the Netherlands. Could the noble lord deny that a communication had been made to the ministers of that country, to prepare them to seize the Count as soon as he arrived? For the credit of the Alien bill, he hoped the noble lord would consent to the production of these papers.

* A commission has been since issued under the great seal, directed to the following persons. Sir Joseph Banks, Sir William Congreve, William Courtenay, Esq. M. P., Davies Gilbert, Esq. M. P., Jeremiah Harman, Esq. Governor of the Bank, William Hyde Wollaston, M. D., and Charles Hatchett, Esq. Their first sitting took place on Tuesday, July the 21st.

Mr. Goulburn said, the noble lord had distinctly denied that any communication whatever had taken place relative to Count Las Casas. In no country was so much liberality shewn to aliens as in this. If the account of the arrest came from the count, he should doubt the accuracy of it. That person was in the habit of stating facts in a manner to bear two meanings. His account of his treatment at the Cape was an instance of this. He had been there in the governor's country house. Madame Las Casas had been consulted at Paris as to the place where she would meet her husband; she replied, "In London; but if that were refused, any other port was indifferent to her;" and Ostend was selected as the nearest place out of France. Considering the offence of the count, he had been treated very mildly.

Mr. F. Douglas, adverting to the sudden arrest of the count at Ostend, pressed to know, whether any communication direct or indirect was made to the ministers of any foreign government in this country, of the port to which the count was to be conveyed.

Lord Castlereagh denied any such communication.

Mr. J. P. Grant replied, that if this were so, there could be no ground for refusing the papers. He should be glad to find that the fact had been so; but hoped that a clause would be introduced in the alien bill, to enable aliens, whom the government wished to send out of this country, to fix the place of their destination, if they could procure shipping within a reasonable time. (Hear, hear.)

The question was then put, and negatived.

GRAND JURY PRESENTMENTS BILL.] This bill was read a second time.

MARRIAGE OF THE DUKE OF KENT.] On the motion of Lord Castlereagh, the consideration of the Prince Regent's message was deferred till to-morrow.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, May 15.

STEAM BOATS BILL.] This bill was brought up from the commons, and read a first time.

BUILDING OF CHURCHES BILL.] The Earl of Liverpool said, that in moving the second reading of this bill, he felt he was proposing the most important measure he had ever submitted to the consideration of that house. It had been his intention to bring forward a measure of this nature long ago, but various circumstances in the situation of the country had caused delay; and it was, besides, his most anxious desire that the subject should not be proposed without the most thorough deliberation. It was necessary not only to look at the measure as a whole, but to consider how far it might be practicable in all its details, in order that no crude and ill-digested plan might be brought forward. A measure which was the result of his own investigations, and of the deliberations of those whom he thought it his duty to consult, had come up from the other house, and was now to be decided on by their lordships. He should briefly explain the grounds on which the measure had been proposed, referring to the returns on the table of the house in support of his statement. In considering the important subject of the deficiency of churches, the first thing that suggested itself to many persons' minds was, that the evil was of so great a magnitude that no complete remedy could be applied. But if this were true to the extent to which it had been stated, or true in any considerable degree, still it would be possible to do a great deal of good, and there could be no reason for not attempting all the good which could possibly be done. He was, however, happy to say that the measure now before their lordships, if it did not come up to the wishes of every man, would at least substantially effect what had been so long desired. It would, in its results, have the most beneficial effects on the religion, morality, and general instruction of the country. He had said, that the evil appeared to many so great as to be past all remedy: but those who thought so had taken an erroneous view of the question; they had, like a most respectable individual (The rev. Isaac Yates—see page 1075.) who published a work some time ago on the subject, considered the proportion between the whole population and the churches, and estimated the number of that whole which the churches would not contain. A very slight considerasion was sufficient to shew the fallacy of this calculation. In considering what accommodation would be necessary, it was proper to deduct, in the first place, all those who were in a state of infancy; indeed, the deduction might perhaps be extended, at an average, to all children under seven or eight years of age; next should be deducted, all persons who were too old and infirm to attend public worship. These two classes would be found to form a very considerable proportion of the population, and in the estimate of the latter ought to be included all those detained at home by sickness or accidents. A third qualification of the estimate of the whole population, compared with the churches, consisted in the necessity of persons being left at home to take care of the houses. In no parish whatever did he believe it possible that the houses could be left without at least one individual in charge of each. If, therefore, a sufficient number of churches to contain the whole population were built, a part could not attend divine service. There was still a fourth qualification, founded on considerations connected with dissent; but, as the object of the measure was to remove dissent, he did not wish to give more weight to this ground of deduction than might be thought fairly due to it. In all populous parishes, however, it was certain that some allowance must be made for dissenters. The result of the calculations founded on the considerations he had stated, was, that provision ought to be made for the accommodation, in churches, of one in every three, or one in every four. From the best consideration that he was capable of giving to the subject, it appeared to him that a provision, in the proportion of one to every three, would not be more than sufficient. It was thought, however, by many, that in parishes of a population of 4,000 and upwards, the proportion of one to four would be all that was requisite. These facts and views considerably qualified the evil, which he was far from wishing to undervalue. If their lordships looked at the returns on the table relative to the state of the manufacturing towns, they would find in them the most urgent motives for taking this subject into their earnest consideration. To supply accommodation for the metropolis, it was proposed to build additional churches in different parishes—in Mary-le-bone 5; in Pancras 4; in St. Leonard's Shoreditch 4; in St. Matthew's, Bethnal-green 4; in Lambeth 3: other parishes, which he need not enumerate, would have corresponding additions. In the country, the supply would be in a similar proportion to the present deficiency. Manchester, it was thought, would require an addition of 7 churches; Sheffield 4; Stockport 3; Birmingham 3 or 4, and so on. The measure brought from the commons which was to authorize this provision embraced three specific objects. The first was a grant of 1,000,000*l.* towards the expense of building churches; its second object was, to authorize subscriptions in aid of the grant; and the third, to appoint commissioners for carrying the act into execution. The sum proposed to be voted by parliament, he was convinced, would, with due care and attention, do a great deal towards the accomplishment of the object of the bill. It was estimated that it would afford the means of building about 100 churches, without any aid from subscriptions. But that the addition to be derived from the latter source would be very considerable he could not doubt, when he recollected what had been done by Liverpool, where no less than 6 churches had been built by subscription. That town, which was very inconsiderable at the commencement of the present reign, now possessed a population of 100,000, and had 14 churches. With the addition of two more, sufficient accommodation would be afforded for its population. Having this example of Liverpool before his eyes, he could not doubt but that much would be done by private subscription to aid the liberal vote of parliament, and that public spirited individuals would eagerly come forward in every quarter of the country to promote so desirable an object. From the nature of the provisions of the bill, and the judicious exercise of the authority it vested in the commissioners, it might not unreasonably be expected that, with the aid of the subscriptions, from 150 to 200 churches would be built. He was sure that he expressed the feelings in which every person who heard him participated, when he said that it was a duty paramount to every other to support religion, and, in particular, that established by law; which, without disparagement to any other, he believed to be the most pure. With this feeling, it would be unnecessary for him to point out many considerations, which, in a political point of view, would alone be calculated to induce their lordships to approve of this measure. The considerations to which he alluded were principally to be found in the vast increase of the population of the country within these 20 years. That increase had taken place chiefly in great manufacturing towns; and, with all the advantages the country had derived from the extraordinary extension of its manufactures, it was impossible for their lordships to conceal from themselves this fact—that great masses of human beings could not be brought together in the manner in which they were situated in these towns, without being exposed to vicious habits, and to corrupting influences, dangerous to the public security as well as to private morality. In the manufacturing districts a great want was felt of churches, which their lordships were most imperiously called upon to supply. The disadvantages with which the church had in other respects to contend in those districts of increasing population was another circumstance which deserved the serious consideration of their lordships. He should be sorry to say any thing that might be construed into a disregard to the toleration laws; but it was impossible to look fairly at this measure without considering what was the situation of those persons who dissented from the establishment. Their lordships must be aware that dissenters had in their power to build places of worship in any number, to any extent, and without any limitation. It was evident, then, that the establishment laboured under a disadvantage in this respect; for in building places of worship for the church of England, reference must be had to the rights of property and to the discipline of the church. Perhaps he might be of opinion that these restrictions were carried too far; but they existed, and could not be overlooked by their lordships in considering this measure; for if the dissenters possessed such decided advantages, it was the duty of their lordships to afford the established church the means of balancing them. The measures lately adopted for the benefit of the poor ought also to be taken into consideration. When the systems of education to which he alluded were first introduced, some persons had entertained doubts of their adequacy and propriety. Those doubts had, however, been removed. For his part, he had always been of opinion, that the benefits of instruction ought to be extended to all classes of his Majesty's subjects, and he had viewed with satisfaction the subscriptions entered into and measures adopted for that object: but then their lordships must perceive in this an additional inducement to direct the education which was thus diffused into a proper course. It was their duty to take care that those who received the benefits of education should not be obliged to resort to dissenting places of worship by finding the doors of the church shut against them. By building additional churches, the establishment and the dissenters would be placed on a fair and equal footing. Their lordships were acquainted with the nature of the measure which was adopted in the reign of Queen Anne. It was then the opinion of parliament, that 50 additional churches should be built for the metropolis. At that time the population of the kingdom was not above one half of its present amount, and that of the metropolis stood in the same proportion. The recollection of that proposition was important, as it shewed what feelings had actuated parliament on this subject a century ago; and he was sure that corresponding feelings would be evinced by their lordships on the present occasion. It was proposed that commissioners should be appointed for carrying the act into effect; but under its provision they would interfere as little as possible with rights and property, either public or private. The bill, however, described no positive manner in which it should be carried into effect. Its operation would vary according to circumstances. Some parishes it might be found proper to divide; in others, the provision for additional services would in many cases accomplish the object so much desired, where no church was to be built. He could not anticipate any objection to the vote of 1,000,000*l*. for so important a purpose. It was certainly a satisfaction to him, that at a time when a spirit of economy had been manifested in the strongest manner, and a call had been made for reductions carried to an extent which, in some instances, he confessed he could not approve, no individual had yet opposed this grant. It was in his opinion highly creditable to those who, in another place, had considered it their duty, after a long war, to diminish as much as possible the public burthens, that they were, notwithstanding, willing to concur in an expense called for by the best interests of religion and morality, and, therefore, conducive to the true prosperity of the country.

Lord Holland thought it necessary to state the principle on which he acceded to the second reading of this bill. As far as it had been stated that a necessity existed for more churches, he agreed. As far as it had been contended that the state ought to lend its assistance in the accomplishment of such a measure, he agreed. But he should be dealing disingenuously with the house, he should be guilty of omission in the discharge of a duty which, however unpalatable, he considered a necessary one, if he did not state, that to this grant, as to a bill without any modification, he did not agree; nor could he agree to many things that had been laid down by the noble earl. It was not necessary for him to follow that noble earl through all the topics which he had then discussed, or to insist on the importance of this measure; for, in the present state of the country, to say that a measure which went to dispose of a million of money, was a measure of importance, he thought was little other than a truism. But when the noble earl by a flourish of rhetoric, called it the most important that could engage the attention of the house, he certainly did wonder that a minister, who had restrained the prerogative of the heir to the crown, who had called on the country to grant sums unprecedented in amount, who had suspended the liberties of the people—he did wonder that a minister who had been engaged in such transactions, should esteem the building of a few churches a measure of such paramount importance. He agreed, however, that it was a measure of importance. But he thought that a church so rich in endowment as the church of England, ought to contribute to its own support and increase. The noble earl had said, that one district of the kingdom, Liverpool, (and he had highly panegyrized that town for the part it had acted,) had accomplished the objects that were now deemed so desirable, without any assistance from parliament. Satisfactory as it must be to the people of Liverpool to receive these panegyrics from the noble earl, it could not be very satisfactory to them to say, "Now, gentlemen, having built churches for yourselves, and at your own expense, we must take more from you to build churches for others;" that was in effect what this measure would do, as all would in reality contribute to its completion. He did not mean to follow the noble earl, for it was unnecessary to contend with truisms. It was certainly impossible that all the population of the country could attend divine service, if there were accommodation for only one-fourth of it. It was true that, after all, dissent would exist; undoubtedly it would, and he thought that this was no evil, and he hoped he should never see it extinguished; for it was impossible that difference of opinion should not exist, and the expression of it could not be repressed but by the unjustifiable hand of power. The noble lord had insisted much on the advantages that the dissenters enjoyed, and the restrictions that were imposed on building church of England places of worship. He (Lord Holland) thought those restrictions too many, and he had that morning taken considerable pains to learn the nature and extent of them: but so confused and unintelligible were the statutes on this subject, that he feared, after all, he was not lawyer enough to explain the nature of them to their lordships. He believed, however, that under the conventicle act of the 22d of Charles the Second, (an act which was a disgrace to the legislature of that and of the present day, and which almost superseded the whole effect of the toleration act), under that conventicle act, persons conforming to the liturgy and doctrines of the church of England, even the parson of a parish himself, were precluded, under severe penalties, from reading service any where in a parish but in the parish church*. But, whatever those restrictions might be, he thought that under the present circumstances of the country the church ought to contribute to its own necessities; when he said contribute, he did not mean voluntary contributions, for those made under the name of voluntary contributions were often the most forced, the most oppressive, and the most cruel of any: (hear, hear, hear,) but he meant that, in this instance at least, she should follow the example of a church which, however corrupt, and he thought it the most corrupt of any, had acted wisely and justly in this matter—he meant the church of Rome. By that church, even in countries where she was most powerful, and insolent he might say, it was made a habit and custom to suspend dignities that were not very essential to the cure of souls, in order to make a fund for the rebuilding and repairing of churches; he did not mean that they touched the emoluments of any living dignitary, but suspended the profits of the benefice between the death of one incumbent and the appointment of another. In Spain there was not a cathedral, where four or five canons or prebendaries were not suspended from time to time to provide for the exigencies of the church; and he did not see why deans and prebendaries should not be suspended with the same view in England. The noble earl had insisted that the church should be put on an equal footing with the dissenters, and a pretty manner the present was of putting her on an equal footing. It was no other than saying, "You, gentlemen, who pay for yourselves, who pay for your own chapels and your own clergy, in addition to paying tithes to ours, shall also contribute to the erection of those churches in which you have no interest whatever." He (Lord Holland) did not say that they ought not to contribute, but he thought it most invidious in the noble earl to affirm, under all these circumstances, that they enjoyed advantages beyond the established church. He agreed, however, that the situation of the country called for a bill of this nature, and thought the noble earl correct in making an apology for its tardy appearance; the more so, as a noble friend of his (he might name him as he was not present), Earl Grosvenor, had proposed a measure of the same kind five years ago. But he was not then listened to; nor was it then admitted or contended by the noble earl opposite, that this was the most important of all possible measures that could come before the house. The merit of originating this measure was with Earl Grosvenor, and with him only; the merit of the noble earl only went to the amount of the sum granted by this bill, and not to the principle of the measure.

The Earl of Harrowby said, that, with respect to the extent of this measure, it was certainly, not too much for the people to expect, that one fourth of their numbers should be able to attend divine worship. As to the source, it was not expected that parliament alone should defray the whole expense, but that it should be made up partly by parliament, partly by rates, and partly by subscriptions; and to this he could see no objections. But the noble lord had insisted, that the revenues of the church ought to supply the charges of a measure of this nature. Surely the noble lord did not think that this measure was intended for the advantage of the church, considered with a view to its clergy. Undoubtedly it was not, but for the advantage of religion in general and the community at large; and there was no more reason for calling on the revenues of the church than on those of any class of society. With respect to the merit that was due to the first proposer of this measure, and the claim made for that merit in another quarter, he thought that every parliament, since that disgraceful business in Queen Anne's time—(he called it disgraceful, not on account of the sum voted, but because 11 only of the 50 churches ordered were ever built)—that every parliament had to reproach itself with its neglect on this subject; and the consequence was, that dissenters of every species had the advantage of the established church, by being enabled to open places of worship. If, then, the advantages now proposed were not afforded the church, the general education of children that was taking place would have no other effect than that of turning them into dissenters.—To return, however, to the question of merit on this subject, he must beg leave to state, that in the midst of the momentous events of the late war, a dear and lamented friend of his—a friend with whom his fortune and fate had been much connected,—turned his attention seriously to this subject; a subject of which the noble lord seemed to him to underrate the importance. Other measures might be of great importance at the time, or for any transient period: this was a measure that was not limited in its effects to the present moment, or to passing interests, but concerned all ages and the interests of immortality. All this had been under the consideration of his dear and lamented friend, who was desirous, before he proposed any thing, to collect information as to the wants and deficiencies of the church; and to aid him in that view, he (Lord Harrowby) had, in 1810, procured an address for a return of the number of churches and parishioners in the united kingdom.

* Marvell calls this act "the price of money," adding, "the king told some eminent citizens, who applied to him against it, That they must address themselves to the houses; that he must not disoblige his friends; and if it had been in the power of the lords, he had gone without money."

But this act, as far as relates to dissenters, was repealed by the 52 Geo. III. c. 155. By the last act, however, no congregation or assembly for religious worship of Protestants (at which there shall be present more than 20 persons besides the immediate family and servants of the person in whose house or upon whose premises such meeting, congregation, or assembly shall be had) shall be permitted or allowed, unless and until the place of such meeting shall be certified and registered at the general or quarter sessions of the peace.

The Archbishop of Canterbury congratulated the country, that a contest should have arisen on both sides of the house as to which should claim the merits of this measure. He had in his possession a letter from the distinguished individual (Mr. Perceval) to whom the noble earl had alluded, saying, that in five days he should have in his hands all the details which would enable him to take some active step; but, before those five days had elapsed, he was assassinated. As for the project of a noble lord on the other side for suspending prebendaries and canonries, that noble lord knew very little, if he thought that the measure could be effected by any such means; they would, indeed, be slow and inefficient, even if resorted to; for the noble earl who had first spoken had said, that the present grant, large as it was, with additional supplies from other quarters, would scarcely suffice. He thought one mode that had been suggested to supply the deficiency of churches would be attended with considerable difficulty—he meant that of multiplying the number of services, In that case, the services would approach so near to each other, that he feared confusion would be created, and the plan be found impossible. These, however, were things for future consideration; and he congratulated the country, that the measure had met with no opposition in point of principle in either house.

The Marquis of Lansdowne thought the measure most indispensable. While the state preserved an established religion, it was their duty to hold out to all the means of performing the duties of that religion. With respect to the mode in which it was proposed to defray the expense of this measure, he did not vote for it because there was any thing in the circumstances of the country that rendered it easy to defray that expense now, but because he should have supported it at any time whatever: he thought, however, such an additional burthen should not be created, except for an object of paramount importance. He did not understand that the measure was to enable the commissioners to extend its objects to Scotland, though it was very necessary there, as there were many extensive parishes without a church. The same was the case in Ireland. But, considering the amount of the protestant population in Ireland, perhaps the measure was not necessary for that country; and if so, he thought the burthen ought to be borne by that richer country which the expenditure was designed to benefit: he therefore felt a difficulty in calling on the presbyterian church of Scotland, or the people of Ireland, to contribute to this measure; he was interested for Ireland personally, though not for Scotland; but he thought it his duty to state these difficulties, and to hope that the house would legislate on principles of equity.

The Earl of Liverpool replied, that the same attention was due to the established church of Scotland as to that of this country, as this measure was proposed, not for the church of England alone, but the general cause of religion: Scotland had a fair claim to her proportion of assistance from the general revenue of the country. He believed that the same necessity existed there, and that the executive would make a similar proposition for that country. As to the hardship of drawing contributions from Ireland, it must be remembered that Ireland and Great Britain were united, and their exchequers consolidated; and he did not see how that country could be relieved without admitting the principle, that the charge ought in all places to be entirely local. In Scotland indeed, the case was different, as the union was not so intimate in all respects. It might be hard that places should contribute which did not stand in need of the operation of the measure, but this would be the case with many counties of England.

The bill was then read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, May 15.

WELCH JUDICATURE.] Mr. Jones brought in his bill "to alter and correct the practice of the several courts of great sessions in Wales, and to amend the laws relating to the same."—It was read a first time.

MARRIAGE ACT.] Dr. Phillimore brought in his bill "to amend certain provisions of the act of the 26 Geo. II., for the better preventing of clandestine marriages."—Read a first time.

STEAM-BOATS BILL.] On the motion of Mr. Harvey, this bill was read a third time, and passed.

SAVING-BANKS (SCOTLAND) BILL.] Sir G. Clerk observed that this bill had excited a good deal of interest in Scotland; but that the second reading stood for an advanced period of the session. (the 25th instant.) He, therefore, wished to know from the hon. member who had brought it in, whether he had any objection to discharge the order, and to let the bill stand over till the next session.

Mr. W. Douglas assented to the hon. baronet's suggestion, and moved that the bill be read a second time on that day three months; which was agreed to.

WAR IN INDIA.] Mr. Howorth rose to move for certain papers relative to the recent transactions in the East Indies. He said, the sole object which he had in view was, to obtain information. In 1783, the late Lord Melville moved certain resolutions on the affairs of India, which were sanctioned by parliament; among which resolutions one stated, that to pursue schemes of conquest, and extension of dominion in India was repugnant to the wish, to the honour and policy of the British nation, and that it should not be lawful either to declare war, or to commence hostilities, without the express command of the Directors or Secret Committe, by the authority of the Board of Control. In 1793, that resolution was embodied in a bill, which was now an act of parliament. It must appear to be deserving of inquiry how it had happened, that the governments of India, in succession, had ever since found themselves under the necessity of violating the spirit of this act. With respect to the frequency of wars, one might look to the north, south, east, and west of India for confirmation of the fact. Let any member look attentively at the map of India, and compare our possessions when that act was passed with what they were at present, and he would see how the system had increased. The alteration of circumstances was surprising. The war at present raging was called a Pindarrie war, a term not much understood in this country. On the decline and fall of the Mahommedan empire, a number of chieftains, under various appellations, set up for themselves, and robbed their neighbours and rivals as much as they could. A number of these were called Pindarries, which was synonimous with plunderers; and with these people the northern parts of India still abounded. Their system was, to meet in large numbers at the conclusion of the rainy season; they then branched out in various directions, to carry on their predatory operations, committing every species of plunder and devastation. When seriously attacked, they dispersed, but afterwards they reunited, to renew their inroads and aggressions. He was desirous of knowing why, on a Pindarrie war as it was called, so great an army was collected in the centre of India, to attack people of this description. The Marquis of Hastings had declared his intention to be, to put down these Pindarries. But they were the only enemy we had not fallen in with and beaten, though we had overcome the Peishwa of the Mahrattas, and the Rajah of Berar, and had conquered every power which we professed to attack. The governor-general of India was now in the field with a vast army, amounting to nearly 100,000 men, and was also at a distance of 1000 miles from the capital of Bengal. Probably, he had now gained possession of the capitals of Holkar and Scindiah; but it appeared that the war was most extensive, and that the Mahrattas were all in arms. Surely it was right that the house should inquire into the causes which had led to such a war. He therefore moved, "that there be laid before this house, 1st, Copies or extracts of all advices received from the government of India, relative to the origin and progress of the discussions which terminated in hostilities with the Peishwa. 2d, Copies or extracts of all advices received from the government of India, relative to the origin and progress of the discussions which terminated in hostilities with the Rajah of Berar. 3d, Copies or extracts of all advices received from the several governments of India, respecting the aggressions of the Pindarries. 4th, Copies of all treaties concluded between the British government in India and the native powers since the year 1804."

Mr. Canning said, that as to the first question, relative to the Peishwa, he was disposed to concur in the motion of the hon. member; but he was not yet in possession of official information as to the causes of hostilities with the Rajah of Berar. As to the war with the Peishwa, he flattered himself that he could prove, that the British government, instead of having acted harshly towards him, had in reality placed too confident a reliance on his good faith. With regard to the motion respecting the Pindarries, he believed that the question was not very well understood in this country. It was not then the time for him to go into any details upon it; but whenever the house should think fit to make it a subject of discussion, he should be ready to enter into particulars. He must, however, observe, that the Pindarries had for the last two years been making incursions on the territories of the British East India Company, carrying with them fire and sword, and committing every species of atrocity and desolation. When the facts were before the house, they must see the propriety of attempting to extirpate so fatal a pest, not only to the neighbouring nations of the natives, but to the subjects of the British empire in India. As to the fourth motion, he had not the slightest objection to it. There was no man more ready than himself to agree, that a pacific and forbearing policy was best suited to our interests and our character in India. But, unfortunately, however much we might bear and forbear, the circumstances of that country had occasioned peculiar causes leading to hostilities, which no prudence could anticipate, no moderation could prevent. The state of our power in India had arrived to such a height, and attained such a position, that, without going into an inquiry, as to how it rose to its present extent and elevation, it became necessary to give it a full protection. But when he said this, he did not mean to say that unnecessary or ambitious wars should be entered upon, but only such as were necessary for general security.

The first motion was then agreed to; and, Mr. Howorth having, with the leave of the house, withdrawn the second, the third and fourth were severally put and carried.

MARRIAGE OF THE DUKE OF KENT.] The house having resolved itself into a committee on the Prince Regent's message,

Lord Castlereagh rose and said, that it would not be necessary for him to trouble them at any length, as all the topics relative to the subject had been so recently discussed. The present question was certainly, in a considerable degree, in the view of the house on former votes. At that time he was not authorized to communicate the intended marriage of the Duke of Kent, but he had felt it his duty to open to them, that a treaty of marriage would ere long be concluded. It might, he thought, be collected from the general character of the late discussions, that when a branch of the royal family entered into a matrimonial alliance, approved by the crown and sanctioned by parliament, the house was disposed to vote such a decent and proper additional income as ought to be granted to a member of the royal family under such circumstances, and not to expect that he could meet his expenses with the same means when married as when single. He thought it might also be collected, that there was no disposition on the part of the house to take into consideration, in their estimate of the proper grant to be made on such an occasion, the casual income which such branch of the royal family might derive from any military situation, whether conferred upon him at home for his past services, or abroad as a mark of honorary distinction. On these principles the house had voted an addition of 6000*l.* a-year to the Duke of Cambridge, with a similar dower to the princess to whom he was betrothed, in the event of her surviving him. He proposed now, in the case of the Duke of Kent, to follow the precedent strictly, both as to the income and the dower. He did not mean to propose any outfit, as he understood that, under all circumstances, his royal highness did not wish for it. He had only one or two further observations to make relative to this marriage. He apprehended that there could exist only one feeling as to its suitableness, as the connexion with Saxony was not new, and part of the family was so decidedly recommended to the good wishes of the country. (Hear.) In justice to the illustrious princess with whom his royal highness was about to ally himself, he might state, as a very favourable feature in her character, that although, when the treaty of marriage was in progress, she felt it her duty not to relinquish the personal guardianship of her children, by her former marriage, she did not extend that disposition to the pecuniary advantages of her widowhood; but that her marriage would deprive her of an income of 3000*l.* a-year on that ground, and of other pecuniary advantages arising from her guardianship, amounting, in the whole, to about 5000*l.* a-year; so that the provision of a dower for her was but an act of bare justice. It was due also to his royal highness to state, that he was desirous that 2000*l.* a-year of the proposed income should be settled on his royal consort by way of pin money. His royal highness had for some years been under the pressure of considerable incumbrances, to provide for the discharge of which he had assigned a large proportion of his revenue. It was not to be expected, therefore, that, immediately after his marriage, he would live altogether in that splendid style which he would otherwise do. Those incumbrances had been incurred at an early period of his life, and when he had been employed abroad. Until his royal highness was 32 years of age, he received only 5000*l.* a-year from his royal father, and about 5000*l.* from his situation as commander-in-chief of the British possessions in North America.—Under these circumstances he should move, "That his Majesty be enabled to grant a yearly sum of money out of the consolidated fund of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, not exceeding in the whole the sum of 6000*l.* to make a suitable provision for his royal highness the Duke of Kent upon his marriage."

Mr. Curwen said, that however painful it might be to himself, he felt it his duty to oppose the grant. He knew of no admitted principle by which he could be pledged to make a provision for every branch of the royal family, when a marriage was about to take place. One royal duke had declined the 6000*l.* a-year, and there were reports, that he would marry notwithstanding. He did not agree with the opinion that emoluments enjoyed from military or other situations by members of the royal family were not to be taken into consideration. The proposed grant could not be necessary, when it appeared that the Duke of Kent had 25,000*l.* a-year; particularly when he considered the burthened state of the country. He thought 25,000*l.* a-year sufficient. But were there no sources from which his royal highness might be relieved from certain difficulties? Had not the illustrious duke parents? Why could not her Majesty out of a privy purse of 50,000*l.* a-year, relieve her son on the point of marriage from his embarrassments? In that case, an application to parliament, to impose fresh burthens on the people would be unnecessary. He was glad that parliament had at length awaked to a sense of its duty, and had told the royal family, that, if they chose to contract debts, and did not discharge them, parliament could not conscientiously assist them. (Hear, hear.) What he had said might certainly not be personally agreeable, but he felt it his duty to say it; and to oppose the grant in toto; though he entertained in common with others, a high respect for the character of the illustrious duke.

Sir R. Heron said, he felt a great respect for the character of the exalted individual in question; but, in the present overburthened state of the country, if it were deemed necessary to make any addition to his royal highness's income, it ought to be made from some of those enormous establishments which had of late years been much increased for purposes of parade and patronage, and in which diminutions might easily be effected. For himself, he should have opposed the grant to the Duke of Cambridge on similar principles; and particularly on account of the great emoluments he derived from Hanover. If it were urged that those emoluments were temporary, it would be time enough when they should cease to come to the house for an additional burthen on the people of this country. To the proposal for the dower to the princess he had no objection.

Mr. Brougham observed, that if the merits of the Duke of Kent were the subject of consideration, and if the vote depended on personal character, the question might be easily disposed of. No man in an exalted rank had set a brighter example of public virtue, or used more actively and beneficially, his endeavours in behalf of institutions for the protection, the education, and the relief of the poor. But it appeared to him, that those views must be entirely laid aside in considering the present question. A marriage contract had been entered into, with the desirable view of continuing the succession to the throne in the house of Brunswick, with the full consent of the crown—a marriage generally allowed to deserve the sanction of parliament. It was also understood, that the pecuniary affairs of the Duke of Kent were so situated, as to render it necessary to apply for parliamentary aid, in order to enable his royal highness to enter suitably upon this permitted and expected alliance. With respect to the personal character of those illustrious individuals, the royal dukes, the house knew nothing of their merits or demerits; it was enough to know, that they were part of that family in whom it was desirable to secure the succession to the throne. The questions were, was the match calculated to obtain that object? Had it received the approbation of the crown? Did it deserve the sanction of parliament? If these points were established, as they were in the present case, and in the cases of the Dukes of Clarence and Cambridge, then came the last question—is the assistance of parliament necessary to enable the match to be concluded? To this question an affirmative was given in the case of the Duke of Clarence, on which account he voted for an allowance of 6000*l.* a-year to his royal highness; a negative was given to it in the case of the Duke of Cambridge, on which account he voted against an allowance to his royal highness. This was the only true constitutional ground on which the noble lord's proposition ought to be acceded to, and not the respect which every man must feel for the character of the Duke of Kent. With respect to the incumbrances of his royal highness, he understood that they had arisen entirely from the delay in providing a separate income for him. He had received only 5000*l.* a-year till he was 32, whereas his royal brothers received 12,000*l.* a year at the age of 24. The offices he had held abroad were not mere sinecures. He had been exposed to unhealthy climates, and, he believed also, to the chances of war. He had been employed in the West Indies, at Gibraltar, in Nova Scotia, and in Canada for 12 or 14 years, having no income adequate to his expenses. He had sustained great losses in his baggage, which, in the case of an ordinary officer, would have found their way into the army extraordinaries; but his royal highness had received nothing on this account, and he did not now ask for any thing relative to it. By the arrangements for liquidating his embarrassments, he had appropriated 17,000*l.* or 19,000*l.* a-year out of his 25,000*l.* (17,000*l.* a-year was mentioned across the table.) Well, then, here was a deduction of 17,000*l.* a-year, which must continue for some years to come.—On these grounds he should vote for the additional allowance; and, in adopting that line of conduct, he desired to observe, that as he was not influenced by any other feeling than that of propriety, so he would not be deterred by popular clamour from acceding to what he felt to be right.

Mr. Methuen said, he must protest against the grant, though he did it with every feeling of respect towards his Royal Highness. He could not, however, in the present circumstances of the country, agree to the motion.

Lord Althorp agreed with his hon. and learned friend in many of the opinions he had expressed, and perfectly agreed with his conduct when similar grants had been under discussion. He agreed with him that it was perfectly desirable that the succession should be kept up in the house of Brunswick, and for that purpose he was willing that every reasonable provision should be made. It had been stated, that the marriage of the Duke of Clarence could not take place, if the 10,000*l.* a-year should be refused, the noble lord not thinking 6000*l.* a sufficient sum. It was now rumoured, however, that the marriage was to take place. For his part, it did not appear to him that the marriage of all the branches of the Royal Family could be considered as any great public advantage. It might be desirable that some of them should marry, but it was not desirable that the country should be called on to enable all of them to marry. (Hear, hear.) It seemed to be implied, on his side of the house, that the marriage of the Duke of Kent depended on the vote of that night. The noble lord, however, had never even hinted that, supposing the grant should not be carried, the marriage could not take place. On that ground, there was a line of distinction to be drawn between the case of the Duke of Kent and that of the Duke of Clarence. He agreed with his hon. and learned friend on the subject of the royal duke's general benevolence; but felt himself called upon, in duty to the country, to vote against the motion of the noble lord.

Mr. Brougham wished to say a few words, in consequence of what had fallen from his noble friend respecting the marriage of the Duke of Clarence. All of them knew that the noble lord opposite had assigned as the ground on which he called on the house to consent to a vote of 10,000*l.* a-year to the Duke of Clarence, that, unless they voted that sum, it was impossible his Royal Highness could marry. But notwithstanding that threat—he did not mean the word in an improper sense—after that argument, he might say, his Royal Highness, even with 6000*l.* a-year, felt it quite possible to proceed in the marriage.

Lord Castlereagh said, he had proposed 10,000*l.* as the sum which appeared to his Majesty's government most proper, after every investigation they could give to the affairs of his Royal Highness. Considering that he should live in England, and live as a duke was entitled to live, who was a member of the Royal Family, they had thought it was impossible to advise a marriage on a smaller allowance. They did not mean to express any opinion on what his Royal Highness's own feelings or sense of honour might dictate with regard to the marriage; but he would appeal to the house, if that marriage still took place*, whether it would be grateful to their feelings that the sum necessary to enable his Royal Highness to support himself in a married state, should be derived from any source than the bounty of parliament.

Mr. Protheroe said, that having opposed the grants to the other branches of the Royal Family, on the ground of the distressed state of the country, he could not vote in favour of the present motion.

Mr. J. Smith considered that the statements of his hon. and learned friend had been correct. There were some circumstances in addition, however, which ought to be known to the house. He believed that his Royal Highness had received some small sum of money, on account of losses he had sustained. The house, however, were not perhaps aware of the exact state of his affairs. For many years his Royal Highness had not had a larger income than the eldest sons of many gentlemen in that house. He had incurred a large debt, a considerable portion of which had been discharged from the appropriation of part of the droits of the Admiralty. When it was considered that he had not had the parliamentary grant till he was 32 years of age, there did appear a sort of want of liberality in the house towards him. It was scarcely necessary to mention what was generally known—the great benevolence, and the useful and generous conduct of his Royal Highness, of which no man could be ignorant. He had watched the progress of his Royal Highness; he had known what he had done for numerous charities, and his constant exertions to advance the interests of many institutions. Those things would be enough to influence him in his vote. But he thought it hard that it should be stated as a reason why he had not had the parliamentary grant till he was 32 years of age, that he had been in foreign service, exposing himself to the yellow fever, and to all the hardships of the West Indian climate. So far from agreeing with that idea, he thought that ought to be a reason why his allowance should be larger. His Royal Highness had set apart 17,000*l.* for the payment of his debts, and three years, he believed, would discharge them all. A mistake had been made with regard to the present amount of his income; for, though 7000*l.* remained, 1000*l.* and more had been long paid to certain widows of soldiers and officers, who had been his companions in arms in former days, and he had no doubt that sum would be continued to be paid by his Royal Highness. He voted for the motion of the noble lord upon principle alone, and he had seldom given his vote with greater satisfaction.

Sir C. Monck wished to shew the consistency of the vote which he intended to give. When the grant had been proposed to the Duke of Clarence as a member of the Royal Family, he was ready to accede to any grant of money that might secure to his Royal Highness a proper establishment. He had given his vote to the 10,000*l.*, thinking it not too large under all circumstances. But he could not agree with the noble lord, when he proceeded, he thought, in the most improper course which a minister of the crown could adopt; when he proposed to take that course which was calculated to record the motive for which that 10,000*l.* had been reduced. When he selected from the other end of the Royal Family, if he might so speak, a man who stood so high in the public opinion as the Duke of Kent, he thought the noble lord went far to display an opinion that had been entertained on the proposal of that former grant. While the marriage of his Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence was in course, he thought it was not proper that any other member of the Royal Family should come to the house and ask for an additional allowance for the same purpose. That should not, he conceived, be done, till all hopes of increase had ceased from the marriage then pending.

The committee then divided.

Ayes, 205—Noes, 51.

LIST OF THE MINORITY.

Althorp, Vis.	Folkestone, Vis.
Bennet, Hon. H. G.	Fergusson, Sir R. C.
Brand, Hon. T.	Guise, Sir W.
Byng, G.	Heron, Sir R.
Burrell, Hon. P. D.	Hornby, E.
Calvert, C.	Hurst, R.
Calvert, N.	Latouche, R.
Calcraft, J.	Lambton, J. G.
Campbell, Hon. J.	Lefevre, C. S.
Carhampton, Earl of	Lloyd, Sir E.
Carter, J.	Lyttelton, Hon. W.
Cranbourne, Vis.	Maddocks, W. A.
Coke, T.	Martin, John
Dowdeswell, E.	Monck, Sir C.
Dundas, C.	Moore, P.
Elliot, Rt. Hon. W.	Methuen, P.
Fane, J.	Newman, R. W.

* His Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence was married at Kew palace, on the 11th of July, 1818, to her Serene Highness the Princess Adelaide of Saxe Meiningen.

North, Dudley	Sharp, R.
Ord, William	Shelley, Sir J.
Osborne, Lord F.	Stanley, Vis.
Portman, E. B.	Tierney, Rt. Hon. G.
Protheroe, E.	Waldegrave, Hon. W.
Philips, George	Webb, E.
Pym, F.	Wynn, C. W.
Ridley, Sir M. W.
Sebright, Sir J.	TELLER.
Sefton, Earl of	Curwen, J. C.

Lord Castlereagh then moved, " that the sum of 6000*l.* per annum be settled upon her Serene Highness Mary Louisa Victoria, Princess of Leiningen, when she shall become Duchess of Kent, in case her Highness should survive his Royal Highness the Duke of Kent, to be issuing and payable out of the consolidated fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

This motion was agreed to, nemine dissentiente.

ALIEN BILL.] Lord Castlereagh moved the second reading of this bill.

Mr. Lambton said, it was with no small surprise that he had heard from the noble lord the other night, that he intended to introduce an alien bill in a period of profound peace. Such a measure appeared to him to be little better than a gross insult offered to the character of that house. The noble lord had ventured to introduce what he called a mitigated and milder measure; but it was a measure which violated, at one blow, those ancient laws which protected the liberties and constitution of this realm—a measure in direct contravention of Magna Carta*, and having a tendency to assimilate England to the arbitrary and tyrannical governments which had before been held up to our scorn and detestation. Up to 1793, it was the policy of this country to encourage and protect those foreigners who visited her shores. That was the spirit which pervaded all the acts and institutions of our ancestors. Had the same spirit which commenced with the continental tyranny, introduced under the auspices of the noble lord, then prevailed in this country, would England have received those persecuted foreigners, who were banished under the edict of Nantes? Should we have derived the wealth and the industry which those people brought to the country in which they found an asylum? Even James II. received the persecuted Protestants of France; he had thought it right to protect them, at the same time that he was authorizing the greatest cruelties connected with religion, and when he was dispensing with the test act in favour of his Catholic officers. He had mentioned those facts merely to shew that in all times had foreigners enjoyed liberty and security in this country; they had enjoyed those blessings even when the country was subject to all the danger which threatened it from a pretender to the throne. (Hear, hear.) In 1793 the alien bill was first introduced, and it was stated in the preamble, that it had been constructed in consequence of the great and unusual recourse of foreigners to this country, and the danger likely to ensue from that, by the introduction of French revolutionary principles. The same pretences did not now exist. The bill of 1793 was a war measure; and if it could not be shewn that any danger was to be apprehended from the machinations of foreigners, no precedent could be drawn from the adoption of that measure. We were now at peace and amity with all the world; all revolutionary principles had been annihilated by the sad experience of the last 25 years, and Europe had subsided into tranquillity and repose. The noble lord had allowed that—he himself had stated it. Social order had been established. In every corner of Europe had legitimacy raised its head. In furtherance of that, the noble lord had assisted to plan and execute the partition of whole countries; he had handed over states to other governments, whose rule had always been the object of their detestation; and, in the nicety of his calculations, he had even divided his human merchandize into souls and half souls. Nothing had been left undone to ensure the safety of legitimacy. By the noble lord's own shewing, therefore, it would be found that every possibility of danger from foreign machination and interference was at an end. For what purpose, then, was an alien bill now introduced? It could not be for the protection of this country. No: it was for the purpose of assisting tyrants, and upholding continental despotism; (hear, hear,

* By Magna Carta, c. 30, it is provided, that all merchants (unless publicly prohibited before-hand) shall have safe-conduct to depart from, to come into, to tarry in, and to go through England, for the exercise of merchandise, without any unreasonable imposts, except in time of war: and if a war breaks out between us and their country, they shall be attached (if in England) without harm of body or goods, till the king or his chief justiciary be informed how our merchants are treated in the land with which we are at war; and, if ours be secure in that land, they shall be secure in ours.—MONTESQUIEU remarks on this law, with a degree of admiration, " that the English have made the protection of foreign merchants one of the articles of their national liberty." Spirit of Laws, 20, 13. And, in another place, (20, 6,)—" that the English know better than any other people upon earth, how to value at the same time these three great advantages, religion, liberty, and commerce."—It is remarkable that this provision of Magna Carta stands the very next to that famous clause which declares, that " no man shall be taken or imprisoned, or be exiled, but by lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land." Now, no man can be exiled, or banished, except by authority of parliament, or in case of abjuration for felony by the common law; and lord Coke, in his comment on the above provision respecting foreign merchants, declares, that " the prohibition intended by this act, must be by the common or publique councell of the realme, that is, by act of parliament." (2. Instit. 57.)

hear.)—for the purpose of annihilating that small portion of the world which was once the asylum of the destitute, the refuge of the oppressed. It had been the boast of Englishmen, that when once the foot of a slave touched British ground, he was free. However slavery and tyranny might degrade and oppress individuals in other countries, they were safe from the moment they reached the shores of England.

> " That sacred isle!
> Cut off from the continent, that world of slaves:
> That temple built by heaven's peculiar care,
> In a recess from the contagious world,
> And dedicated long to Liberty.
> That health, that strength, that bloom of civil life."

Such was this country in 1745, when the poet wrote, but the scene was now changed. The noble lord had denied that the renewal of the alien bill was connected with the policy of foreign states. If the noble lord asserted that, he called on him and the government to pledge themselves that it would not be put in execution against one class of persons—against those unfortunate men who had been outlawed by the king of France. When the valour of our arms had placed the Bourbons a second time on the throne, little more than a fortnight had elapsed before an edict was issued in direct opposition to the principles before recognized, by which the persons to whom he alluded were banished, in a measure proscribed and placed under what was called surveillance; proceedings that violated and trampled on the charter which the monarch had sworn to observe. Whether such proceedings had been instituted under the idea of any conspiracy that had been supposed to exist, he was unable to say. The French government, however, finding that they could not establish any fact on which even to ground a suspicion, pretended, that to persist in bringing those persons to trial would endanger the public tranquillity, and demanded a proscription, a sentence of banishment, of outlawry against them, without trial, and without any investigation whatever. Even those men who supported the monarchical power with all their might, who looked upon any act tending to injure it, or to bring it into contempt, as little less than sacrilege, even those ultra-royalists hesitated when such a proposition was laid before them. They at length granted a power of acting towards those men as the king might think expedient, and the very next day he banished them all. Three years had elapsed, and not one of them had been allowed to return. But this was not enough—all nations were leagued against them—they were treated like felons—and if any one of them happened to complain, he was answered by the treaty of Paris—the holy alliance—and was hurried off to the town allotted to him in Austria, Prussia, or elsewhere, to be watched by spies. Such, then, being the system, was it consistent with the honour or the integrity of this country to contribute to support it? He implored the house before they armed the government with such powers, to pause and consider whether they were not intended to be exercised only against those who had incurred the vengeance of foreign states. The character of England would be deeply injured by this measure. It was known abroad that all the laws of this country emanated from parliament, of which the house of commons was an essential part, and professedly the representatives of the people. Would that house, then, sanction a measure so subversive of the laws of honour and of justice, and so acceptable to despots as he believed in his conscience the present bill to be? He trusted that they did not repent of having shewn their independence on a recent occasion, and that they would now feel it their duty, in a case of much greater importance, to protect the honour and liberties of their country.—He should therefore move, " that the bill be read a second time this day six months."

Mr. Protheroe said, he saw nothing dangerous in this bill. (Hear, hear, from the Chancellor of the Exchequer.) From the returns laid on the table, it appeared, that the powers vested in ministers under this law, had been exercised with the greatest moderation. He should therefore vote in support of the motion.

A pause having ensued, and a division being called for,

Mr. Lyttelton rose and said, that it appeared to be the wish of gentlemen on the other side that this question should not be much discussed. He was surprised that they had nothing to say in defence of their measures, especially as what his hon. friend had stated against this bill deserved their utmost attention. He felt much reluctance in rising to offer any thing on a subject of the greatest magnitude and importance, considering that it was regarded in that house with such indifference. (Hear.) But he felt it his duty to state a case which had come to his knowledge, and which shewed the consequences of this measure on the unhappy victims. He had in 1816 stated the case of M. Befort. That man had been sent out of the country in 1813, although he had been established here, and had property to the value of 40,000*l.* He returned in 1814, and though he had stated, through the proper channel, the necessity of making some arrangements respecting his affairs, he was again sent away in less than 24 hours. He had kept a shop in town, and sold what was supposed to be an effectual cure for the gout, under the name of Eau medicinale. If this gout curer, this seller of drug-water, conspired against the peace and stability of England (a laugh) the noble lord and the secretary for the home department might be justified; but they ought to shew, that he could be reasonably suspected of any such conspiracy. If not, the house would consider that they exposed individuals of peaceable habits and considerable property to be thus sent away from the country of their choice, and the property acquired by their industry, without any means of making their case known, but only through individuals like himself. When M. Befort came to this country in 1810, he was patronized by many gentlemen of distinction, particularly by Mr. Crawford, and by Mr. Reeves, of the Alien Office. When he was sent away on the 6th of August, 1813, he went to Portsmouth, accompanied by a person whom he would not name, but whom he could mention to any gentleman if required to do so. That person examined him in Portsmouth, strictly and personally, and in a very indecent manner. He examined, at the same time, a large trunk he had, although it had been made up in his presence. A portfolio was seized. He left the key of this depository of a suspicious musical instrument with captain Wodriffe, an officer of character, he believed. After he had left the country, then, for the first time was discovered in the bottom of this portfolio, which had been previously examined, in the presence of captain Wodriffe, a correspondence of a very extraordinary and certainly of a very alarming character —it was a correspondence between the Pope, the Irish Catholics, and the father of the order of La Trappe. (A laugh.) The very names at once impressed the noble lord, the home secretary, with terror and alarm. (Much laughter.) This was the kind of forgery, of all others, most likely to effect the object desired. The mention of such a correspondence was enough, and M. Befort was said to be the gentleman through whom it was conducted. But if any foreigner had really been engaged in such a correspondence, he should say, that he was amenable to the laws of the country, that his life was forfeited, or, at least, that he could be visited with adequate punishment. But the unfortunate foreigner whom he had mentioned had been sent out of the country for no such cause. The person who accompanied him, as he said before, had a design upon his property, and actually appropriated 400*l.* or 500*l.*, found in his portfolio, to himself. He must, however, mention a striking inaccuracy connected with this case— an inaccuracy, or at least a discordance, with a formal document, which might, in the opinion of that house, disprove all he had said. The return made to the house, which he held in his hand, represented, that no person had been sent out of the country in 1814. (Hear, hear.) If this were incorrect, then the whole account might be incorrect, and they had no return of the number of aliens who had suffered under the operation of this measure. (Hear, hear, hear.) If the act were to be carried into execution in a clandestine and private manner, if persons were to be sent out of the country, God knows how or when, what a horrible engine was put into the hands of ministers! But if the three persons mentioned in the return were, indeed, the only instances that could be given in justification of the bill, he could not avoid putting it to the magnanimity of the house, whether, for the sake of such instances they thought it worth while, in opposition to ancient practice, in opposition to those principles which had distinguished our ancestors, and rendered our country the favoured land, where persons and property were secure from persecution, violence, and outrage—he put it to the magnanimity of the house, whether it became them, for the sake of three individuals, to offer violence to the usage of our ancestors and the principles of the constitution, and in a manner which left to foreigners no redress whatever for any outrage or wrong. (Hear.) If such principles were, indeed, to be sanctioned in England, we were subject to a mere simple despotism. Those who conducted our administration were gentlemen, he admitted, and honourable men; but they had never manifested any feeling of sympathy with the sufferings of their fellow-men under oppression and tyranny. (Hear, hear.) They had aided and promoted despotism all over Europe. (Hear, hear.) They had never failed to support the powerful against the weak and injured. (Hear.) Gentlemen did not, perhaps, feel it to be a very serious and alarming evil, because it was only a system of injustice and cruelty to the weak and helpless; but to him it appeared, for that very reason, eminently entitled to attention, and calculated to excite the justest indignation. (Hear, hear, hear.) A case like the present was peculiarly galling to the feelings of an Englishman in a foreign country —and at present many were the Englishmen scattered over Europe—when he could not hold up his head, and whatever might be his personal character or conduct, boast that England was distinguished for the vigour of her trade, the magnanimity of her politics, and, above all, the liberality and generosity of her institutions. This consideration touched him very nearly, and if others regarded it with indifference, he must say, that the character of Englishmen was gone. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. H. Clive (under secretary of state for the home department) said, he believed that the cause of omitting the case alluded to by the hon. gentleman in the return was, that the return went back only to 1814, and that the person in question having been sent out of the country in 1813, it was not thought proper to mention his being sent away a second time in 1814. He knew nothing of the case, but he would inquire into the cause of its being omitted. It should be recollected, however, that we were at war in 1813, and that greater severity was, therefore, necessary. As to the present bill, he must observe, that France abounded with persons who lived only by warfare, and if they were allowed to settle in this country, their whole object would be to excite war. This country had surely a right to protect itself from such an evil.

The cry of "question" became now loud and general, and the gallery was ordered to be cleared, when

Lord Folkestone rose and said, that he could not but express his astonishment that no arguments should be advanced by ministers, or by the law officers of the crown, in defence of a measure so contrary to the ancient laws of the country, and so hostile to the boast of Englishmen. (Hear, hear.) He should be unworthy of his descent, and of his fortune, if, descended as he was from ancestors who had taken refuge in this country, in order to exercise their faith with impunity, he did not protest in the strongest terms against refusing an asylum to persecuted foreigners and shutting the door of hospitality upon them. *(Hear, hear.) It had been the policy of England, from the time of Edward III. down to the year 1816, to encourage foreigners to settle in this country, and this policy had greatly benefitted the commerce, the manufactures, and the literature of the country. But this policy was not confined to those advantages; it established a character and name in the world for England, as a place of refuge for those who were suffering under the tyranny of their own government. She had thus acquired a station which neither her territory nor her population could sustain, but which was sustained by her name and character among all who were attached to religious and civil liberty. This pride, this glory of the island, "that sacred isle" as it had been truly called, was now to be taken away. That temple "dedicated long to Liberty" was now to be demolished. That great bulwark of security, a fair and open trial by law, was to be superseded by this measure, and a door was to be opened to all the machinations of secret spies and informers. (Hear, hear.) After what they had heard at the end of the last session, and at the beginning of this session, of those respectable, and, as it now appeared, much esteemed characters, they could not have a doubt as to the mode in which this bill would be carried into effect. His hon. friend had stated the case of M. Befort. It strikingly shewed how this measure encouraged secret information and private malice, while it put the unhappy victims beyond the possibility of defending themselves. An hon. member had said, in the face of this, that there had been no abuse. How did he know that there was no abuse? Each of the three cases in the return might be a case of great abuse. In many other cases, measures of coercion might have been so successfully applied as to prevent the necessity of making a return. Surely this law was not necessary, in order to guard against the danger to be apprehended from three individuals. The noble lord opposite had asserted, that the bill was not intended for other countries, but for internal tranquillity. He had said, that foreigners would, in this country, excite war against France, France would embroil Europe, and we must take part in the general war. But, if this were true, why should not the measure be perpetual? or why should not a law be passed, declaring it high treason to attempt to excite war against France? Another argument had been used, the more dangerous as it was very plausible, that it was better to have recourse to prevention than to punishment. This might be true in morals, and, to a certain extent, in politics. In the case of forgery, for instance, it was right to remove the temptation to commit the crime; but when the supposed evil was to arise from feelings of human nature, which laws could not adequately control, then the principle, which was good in equity, became inapplicable to the laws of a free state. Men should not be intrusted with unlimited power. They might say that they would not abuse it—they might even conscientiously believe that they would not abuse it—but they could not really know what they might be induced to do. The security of a free people did not consist in their belief, however firm, that the executive power would not attempt to invade their rights, but in the consciousness that any such attempt would be wholly ineffectual. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. C. Grant, jun. said, that the prerogative of the crown extended to the prohibition and the removal of foreigners. The gentlemen opposite had declared, that the treaty of Paris, and the holy alliance, had sown the seeds of disorder in Europe. But, did they really believe that no danger was to be apprehended from the restless disturbers of Europe? Had they not heard of their attempts at assassination? When he recollected the convulsions of the last 25 years, the causes of those convulsions, the overthrow of principles, the avowed contempt of every thing sacred, the military grandeur associated with those events, he could not conceive how it could be denied that there was danger. Europe never contained so many instruments of mischief, so many conspirators by profession. The measure was not directed against foreigners generally, but against those turbulent and restless spirits which still sought to torment the peace of Europe; those spirits which had at one time worshipped the goddess of Reason, and at another the idol Buonaparte. Surely, we might guard ourselves against the admission of such characters without incurring the reproach of inhospitality. If we adopted a less cautious policy, how could we feel secure that the country might not become the rallying point of foreign traitors and apostates, assembling under the wings of our free constitution—that constitution which, when they openly attacked, had baffled, and defeated, and blasted all their machinations, to plan a new conspiracy for renewing the convulsions of the world? Did the house believe that no feeling of revenge entered into the composition of those men, and that there were no materials upon which in this country they could work? Incendiaries must be at all times dangerous; but in the present state of the popular mind, and after those recent indications respecting it, which proved that there were many who would give a foreign enemy a welcome, that danger became imminent and alarming. He did not believe that this measure would excite umbrage amongst foreigners, when its nature and purpose should be understood. Were he to name a period when the hospitality of this country had been most conspicuously evinced towards them, it would be the 25 years during which we had had an alien bill. (Hear, hear, hear.) They came amongst us relying on the purity of their motives, and, therefore, assured of a kind reception. He saw no reason for believing that they would not still entertain the same confidence; and, therefore, considering the bill to be both constitutional and indispensable to the safety of the country, he felt himself bound to give it his support, and to vote for the second reading.

* Lawrence des Bouveries, a native of Sainghin, near Lisle, in Flanders, fled to England on account of his religion, and settled at Canterbury, in 1568. His son Edward was father of sir Edward des Bouveries, knight, born in 1621, who became an eminent Turkey merchant, received the honour of knighthood from James II. and died in 1694. His eldest son sir William des Bouveries, was created a baronet, 1714, by queen Anne. He was succeeded by his eldest son, Edward, who died unmarried, when the title devolved to his brother Jacob. In 1747, sir Jacob Bouverie was created a peer by the titles of baron of Longford and viscount Folkestone. His eldest son William-Pleydell-Bouverie was created earl of Radnor, in 1765, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Jacob, the present earl, father of lord Folkestone, in 1776.

The motto of the family is—Patria cara, carior libertas.

Mr. F. Douglas rose, and spoke as follows:—Sir, I feel the disadvantages under which I labour, in rising immediately after the eloquent speech of my honourable friend. I cannot pretend to his eloquence, though he will excuse me if, in this instance, as on some former occasions, I am of opinion that he has wasted it on a subject quite foreign from that which is, in fact, before the house. He has with powerful ability descanted on the morals and atrocities of the French revolutionists, and on the mischievous intentions with which the survivors of them are disposed to overrun Europe. Now the question before the house is not as to the mischievous intentions of those persons, be they who they may, but as to the dangers with which this country may be threatened from them. I think my hon. and learned friend acted most judiciously in opposing the introduction of this measure, because I could not contemplate any alteration in its subsequent stages that could justify it to the country. But useless and dangerous as I think this measure in itself, it is much more dangerous when connected with the system of policy now avowed by the noble lord, and when supported by the arguments with which the noble lord accompanied its proposition to the house. I was anxious to see the bill printed, in order to ascertain whether the noble lord would venture to record in the preamble any of the reasons which he thought might have so much weight upon the decisions of the house; but it now appears that the preamble, or rather the preamble maker, assigns no reason. — The accountant-general of the administration, the person to whom the difficult task is assigned of finding reasons for his Majesty's ministers, is actually at a loss to put any one reason on record to justify the measure he has drawn up. He thinks it safer to invite us to pass this important bill, without any recorded reason on the face of it to justify the enactment. (Hear, hear.) Are gentlemen aware of the powers they are about to confer by this bill?—Are they aware that it enables a minister to send any alien who may be domiciliated among us, out of the kingdom—to tear him at a moment's notice from his family and connexions, without the appearance of a prosecutor, or the imputation of a crime? (Hear.) It is true that there is a reservation in the bill—an appeal is granted to the alien, when the power is unjustly exercised against him. (Hear, from the treasury benches.) But what is that appeal?—It is an appeal from the minister, who may abuse the act, to his colleagues, who conferred on him the power of abusing it—an appeal from the injustice of Lord Sidmouth to the impartial decision of Lord Castlereagh! (Hear, hear.) This is adding mockery to injustice. (Hear.) And it is upon such grounds as those stated by the noble lord, that we are called upon to place 20,000 individuals, many of them connected with us by every tie of relationship and common pursuit, out of the protection of those laws to which they are compelled, equally with ourselves, to pay obedience. It is upon such grounds as those, that we are permanently to introduce the anomaly of a tyrannical power into the code of our free laws; laws, every enactment of which breathes a spirit of care for the rights of the individual, and of resistance to the encroachments of power. I have used the word "permanently" advisedly; because I am justified in stating that this measure will never be relinquished, if I can prove that no state of things can be contemplated in which such a law could be less necessary than at the present moment. This law is calculated to meet an external danger—a danger not merely to our foreign policy, for with this object it must be co-existent with our government itself, since no change can take place or be included in any part of the continent, that may not be somehow or other connected with the external policy of England—but it is against a danger external in its origin, but internal in its effect. It was originally a war measure. I have heard a great deal of the distinction between the peace alien and the war alien bill: but I cannot comprehend the subtilty of some gentlemen's reasoning. I see in both one and the same great ruling principle, which leaves the person and property of the alien in the hands and at the summary disposal of the minister, and establishes an arbitrary power within the realm of Great Britain. My hon. friend who spoke last, in the fulness of his candour, says, that the circumstances of the present time, and of the time when the bill was first introduced, are certainly not similar in all their parts.—But are there any two of them alike?—The war of 1793, when this bill was first introduced, was a war unparalleled in the history of the world—it was a war of principles, not of men—it was a deadly contest for the universal establishment of opinions, which, at the time, found able and numerous abettors in every state in Europe. At such a moment, the external danger was mighty, and the internal co-operation not unimportant. Strong evils require strong measures, and they were then applied. But has the noble lord opposite the face to say, that there is at present any thing in the external dangers of the continent which is likely to act on the internal system of Great Britain? My hon. friend has expatiated on the lingering spirit of jacobinism. If, by jacobinism, he means the discontent felt by certain individuals at the existing order of things in their respective countries, and their practices where they have the power to change it, then, indeed, can we never hope to be without this law; but if, by jacobinism, he means what still remains of Buonaparte's followers, this danger must indeed be visionary here, when it is so little felt in France, the great hot-bed of its activity, that many of the prime agents and colleagues in office of Buonaparté himself, have a ministerial share in the administration of the Bourbon government. (Hear, hear, hear.) Then, as to the danger to be apprehended from Frenchmen in the Netherlands. (Hear, from the Treasury benches.) Is there really any danger to be apprehended from the machinations of the miserable outcasts and libellers that have found refuge in that part of Europe? Has England for twenty-five years shed her best blood, and defeated the combined efforts of whole nations opposed to her, merely to sit down at the first moment of a general peace, and avow her apprehension at a handful of miscreants in a corner of Europe? (Hear.) In the Netherlands, it is said, was hatched the plan (and none, I admit, could be more horrible) to assassinate the Duke of Wellington. (Hear.) What proof is there that the plot was hatched there? Is it not more likely that it was arranged in the bosom of France herself? (Hear.) I was surprised to hear the noble lord talk of the Netherlands in a strain of regret that these Frenchmen should have found refuge there. As an Englishman he ought rather to have boasted, that though a small power, and under the shade of France, she clung to that good old policy which once distinguished Great Britain, but from which she is now unhappily forced by the cabals of foreign conclaves, acting on the weakness of those ministers that ought to have made a firmer stand for the honour and character of their country. (Hear.) My hon. friend, to my great surprise, says, that there is unhappily a disposition in this country to unite with these foreign conspirators. It is impossible that any notion can be more unfounded than this. Our situation, our constitution, our character, our very language itself, renders the people of England less exposed than any other people of Europe, to the arts of foreign seduction. This fact does not depend on mere observation of the notorious dissimilarity of character, but it is fortified by the most incontestible proof. When last year all the elements of internal commotion were at work in parts of this country, did there occur the slightest appearance of any disturbance being set on foot, participated in, or in any way recommended by, the influence or chance of foreign aid or foreign advantages? There was not the slightest proof that any attempt had been made by the emissaries of any government but our own, to excite the public to commotion. (Loud cries of "hear.") The noble lord thinks it hard that he should be obliged to refuse the consent of England alone to the united decisions of the congress. But were that noble lord not only the representative of England, but were he properly imbued with those maxims which have constituted the glory of England in former times, and must form her security for the future, he would have thought that England, and he himself as her minister, could never assume so noble a character in the eyes of Europe, as when he should answer such a proposition by simply stating that the constitution of his country would not allow it; that it might be inconvenient; but it was an inconvenience which our ancestors foresaw, when they wisely judged it better to submit to any disadvantages in our foreign policy, than to endanger for a moment the security of our internal rights. When I speak of our ancestors, I allude to great names and venerated authorities, who never expected to be represented by a minister who would drag this country, almost against the arrangement of Providence itself, into the vortex of continental politics, or force our sturdy and uncompromising constitution to bend and truckle to all the fluctuations of the European system. (Hear.) The noble lord has moved too close with foreign potentates: his connexion with them, and their conjoint and glorious triumphs in the last year of the war, have dazzled him; he is too anxious to participate in their splendour, and to enjoy their applause, to imbibe that proper jealousy, or have that steady self-possession of his own true station and his country's policy, which a British representative ought to have when seated at a foreign congress. (Hear, hear.) I know there are those who have little sympathy with these sentiments; but if they forget the policy by which Spain fell and Holland rose—Holland formed out of the bosom of the deep as a refuge for persecuted industry—if they forget these historical lessons, let them, at least, recollect who are the twenty thousand persons whose interests are to be affected by this measure. A vast number of them are wealthy, and most useful to us—there is not a charitable subscription in which we do not see their names vie with those of the first natives in the land, as if to repay, by the bounty of their contributions, the protection they have received from this country. I will ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose funds are so largely replenished, and whose financial system so much depends on the sums paid by these aliens, how he should like their disappearance from the country? My hon. friend says, that they were fixed here by the advantages which England presents for commercial speculation. But what first ensured to her these advantages—what first drew to these shores all the mercantile relations of Europe? Not the merits of climate, in these we are inferior to almost all the nations of the continent; not our manners, they are proverbially repulsive; no: it was the confidence of finding laws which equally protect the citizen and the stranger. Let the noble lord take care, lest, by a single act of a weak and deluded minister, he should banish these advantages to a more hospitable and more judicious state, and, by any indiscreet exercise of the powers of this bill, strike a general alarm into the minds of so large a number of individuals, exercising their industry for the benefit of the empire. (Hear.) It was said last year, when we enacted coercive laws, that they could only be felt by the disaffected. This was a dangerous mode of reasoning—it shewed a fatal departure from the stern sentiments of our ancestors, who felt a proper, nay, a fanatical feeling for the name of liberty—the very sight or appearance of tyranny was detestable to them—and the same sentiment should still be cherished by every true Englishman. (Hear, hear.) When we let in this principle of tyranny to operate on foreigners, there is but one step more to bring the same coercion home to ourselves. (Hear.) It is said that no abuses have been discovered during the operation of the alien bill. The greatest evil is, that we have no way of discovering the abuse, for, the moment the sufferer is taken, it is in vain for him to complain, if, indeed, he has any rational inducement to do so, to the sort of tribunal open to him—he is at once hurried out of the country. (Hear, hear.) The noble lord has more than once told us, that in proposing this measure, he is guided by an imperative sense of public duty. Public duty to whom? Not to the constitution of England, but to the congress of Vienna! (Hear, hear, hear.) He has also said a great deal as to the security which the character of Lord Sidmouth presents against the bill. I have the utmost personal respect for Lord Sidmouth; but he must not be offended with me for saying, that it is as a man, not as a minister. In the former sense he has my confidence, but in the latter he has not. Our constitution is not one of confidence—it is jealous—it reins in power, to fence round personal rights—it protects the weak from the strong—the people from the minister. As to the prerogative of the crown to send out aliens; this is asserted by Blackstone and other authorities; but I hardly expected to have heard it quoted after the triumphant refutation of this doctrine on a former night, by my hon. and learned friend near me (Sir S. Romilly). But admitting, for the sake of argument, that this power is vested in the crown, what becomes of the necessity for this bill? If the former exists, the latter is useless. Why, then, make so desperate a stand to introduce an unpopular measure, when the crown has already the means of preventing the evil? The king has doubtless the prerogative of making war; but has not parliament the controling power of affording the supply, and of ensuring the discipline of the army? It is impossible that the power of sending away foreigners can subsist in the crown; it is against the genius of the constitution. Again I implore the house to pause before they adopt this bill. The repetition of such measures has a fatal moral tendency. What is once granted for a temporary purpose, soon becomes permanent, when the passions of men are concerned in its perpetuity. The hand once accustomed to grasp the strong hold of power, clings to it with a firm and decided attachment that constantly increases. I have to apologise for having so long trespassed on the house, and shall only repeat my decided hostility to the bill. (Hear, hear, hear.)

The question was then put, "that the bill be now read a second time."—The house divided.

Ayes, 97—Noes, 35.

On the motion, that the bill be committed on Tuesday,

Mr. Bennett put a question to Lord Castlereagh, for the purpose of knowing in what stage ministers meant to discuss the bill.

Mr. Bathurst rose to order, and contended, that a member had no right, by putting a question, to revive a conversation on a subject after the regular proceeding on the particular stage had closed.

Mr. Bennett—"The question is, 'that this bill be committed on Tuesday next;' there is, therefore, a subject before the house on which I have a right to speak, and of this the right hon. gentleman ought to have been aware, if his ear had been as quick to hear the question as his tongue was to call me to order. I have a right to proceed, if I please, in the shape of interrogatory; and I now ask when, if at all, it is the intention of ministers to debate this question? Not one syllable on this important subject has yet fallen from any member of his Majesty's government—nothing has been said by either of the law officers of the crown. We have not heard one word in justification of the measure; and I ask the noble lord, when ministers mean to break silence on the subject? Has he entered into an engagement with the kings of the continent, or the holy alliance, to say nothing on a question which involves the spirit of the constitution of this land, and the personal liberty of the subjects of the continent, whose sovereigns have associated, leagued, armed, and combined to carry into effect in England measures which they have adopted in their own conclave? I will not, by entering into the merits of the question, add one to the number of speeches which have been already left unanswered. All I shall ask is, when their high mightinesses, the ministers opposite—(Laughter)—will deign to say what reasons they have to oppose to the cogent arguments that have been urged against this bill?"—(Hear.)

Lord Castlereagh said, he would reply to the question proposed to him by putting another. When did the gentlemen opposite mean to open a case against the bill? The moment they did, in a tangible shape, he begged to assure them, their speeches should not go unanswered.

Mr. Lyttelton observed, that he had stated a specific case, in which no answer had been given.

Mr. Bathurst said, that if brought forward in a distinct shape, application could be made for the necessary information on the subject. He cautioned gentlemen against being quite credulous on one side, and incredulous on the other.

Mr. Lyttelton said, he was not incredulous—he was ready to hear any answer that the right hon. gentleman might favour him with.

Mr. Bathurst said, he had before stated that his hon. friend behind him, from his recent entrance into office, had not had the means of understanding the nature of the case alluded to by the hon. gentleman.

The bill was then ordered to be committed on Tuesday.

SAVING-BANKS BILL.] The house went into a committee on this bill. The report was brought up, and the bill ordered to be read a third time on Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, May 18.

COTTON FACTORIES BILL.] The Duke of Portland and the Earl of Lauderdale presented several petitions against this bill.

The Marquis of Buckingham presented a petition in favour of it.

They were all referred to the committee on the bill.

PARISH VESTRIES BILL.] This bill was read a second time, on an understanding that the principle might be discussed in a future stage.

POOR LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.] This bill was read a second time, on a similar understanding.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, May 18.

COPYRIGHT BILL.] Mr. W. Dundas presented a petition from the Senatus Academicus of the university of St. Andrew's, against this bill.—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

SCOTCH BURGHS BILL.] Lord A. Hamilton presented petitions against this bill, from the Guildry Incorporation of Dundee, and the burgesses and inhabitants of Inverkeithing.—Ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.] Lord A. Hamilton presented a petition from Thomas Ferguson, who had been found guilty of a breach of privilege, and was, in consequence, now confined in Newgate. The noble lord said, that in bringing forward this case, he had been actuated by no personal feeling of hostility to the individual, but merely by a wish to discharge his duty to the county which he had the honour to represent.

The petition was brought up and read. It stated the petitioner's deep contrition at having given such offence to the house, and prayed, that after what he had already undergone, the house would be pleased to order his discharge from imprisonment.—Ordered to lie on the table.

PURCHASE OF GAME BILL.] Mr. G. Bankes moved the second reading of this bill.

Mr. Curwen said, he thought that the game laws, as they at present existed, operated against their professed object. It was not possible, under these laws, to preserve game by any other means than those which threw upon gentlemen a certain degree of odium. When he looked at their general spirit and provisions, he could not see any proper principle of justice throughout them. The present bill, he conceived, could not reach its object. It could not be made to attach sufficiently on the higher classes so as to prevent them from becoming the purchasers of game; yet it might tend to swell the catalogue of offenders of a lower description, of whom 1200 had been confined under the present laws in the course of last year. He therefore moved, that the bill be read a second time on this day six months.

Colonel Wood observed, that he had always thought it the best plan to legalize the sale of game, and not to throw impediments in the way of that, by partial alterations. He conceived that the best mode was to make game, at once, private property. Let it be considered who were, at present, legally entitled to the use of this luxury. None but persons who had 100*l.* per annum in landed property. A man might have this from a brickfield, or any valuable bit of land; but if another man had 100,000*l.* in the funds, he was not thereby entitled to a single head of game. The laws on this subject were at present exceedingly inconsistent, and he hoped that the house would let the matter stand over till the next session, when a committee might be appointed to consider the whole question, and see what was necessary to be expunged or enacted.

Sir S. Romilly thought, that the hon. member who spoke last, as he had brought in a bill to legalize the sale of game, ought to support the present measure, which appeared to be a great improvement of the existing system. The house had refused to make the sale of game legal: how, then, could they hesitate to punish the buying of game! In this case, as in the case of stolen goods, if there were no purchasers, there would be no sellers. At present it was highly penal on low persons to supply the demands of the opulent, who wanted and would purchase the luxury of game. The higher classes acted in this way without compunction, as to the dangers in which they involved their inferiors. Men were allured to become poachers, which led them to bad connexions, and when imprisoned for their offences, they associated with the most infamous characters, by which they became thieves of a more criminal description. But, he need not confine himself to the case of poachers; he might advert to the situation of poulterers who were compelled by gentlemen to procure them game, or deprived of their custom, if they did not. Under the system of the game laws, it was not considered any violation of honour or morality to buy the game; and as to the procurers and sellers, their punishment was felt not as a disgrace, but excited sympathy among the people at large. Among the higher orders the laws were violated with little compunction, to obtain the desired luxury, though the utmost rigour in imposing penalties was exercised against the lower.

Colonel Wood said, he wanted to get rid of the system altogether, and not to prop it up by inferior measures.

Mr. Lamb thought the subject of considerable importance, both as it related to the amusements which induced gentlemen to live in the country, and as it concerned the morals and improvement of the most important class of the community. There certainly was great inconsistency in making it penal to sell, and not to buy: but this only shewed the difficulty and absurdity of the whole system, which rendered a full consideration of it desirable, and he trusted that the hon. member for Hertfordshire would bring the whole subject forward. There was a great evil under the system in the tempting and compelling of tradesmen by their customers to a daily habitual violation of the laws. The tradesmen, in their turn, were compelled to tempt the peasantry, on whom the penalties were not light matters. The violation of law produced by the system were proofs of its absurdity.

Mr. N. Calvert spoke in support of the bill. He thought the result would be directly the reverse of what was anticipated.

Mr. G. Bankes, in reply, observed, that he did not wish to stand up as the advocate of the game laws, but while those laws were suffered to exist, any glaring anomaly ought to be removed.

The house then divided on the question, that the bill be now read a second time.

Ayes, 116—Noes, 21.

The bill was read accordingly.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR BILL.] Mr. Brougham, in moving the order of the day for going into a committee on this bill, said, he must entreat the attention of the house for a few moments to the general object of the measure. In consequence of the discussion which had already taken place, a vast mass of additional information had been sent to the committee. It seemed as if a new light had burst upon the country, and abuses were discovered where none had been suspected to exist. The committee had received multitudes of letters; some from persons who were named trustees of charities; some from persons who had had a right to claim under charities, without knowing of their right; some from persons who resided in the neighbourhood of property belonging to charities, and who had not been previously aware that any abuse existed in their neighbourhood. During the last 10 days, the committee had been occupied in classifying the returns; and, in the course of that labour, they had discovered instances of abuse much more flagrant than any he had hitherto stated to the house. In general, the reverend persons to whom the inquiries had been directed, had answered them with a zeal and alacrity which entitled them to the highest praise; but, but from some places, no returns had been made, though the committee were aware that great abuses existed in them. He hoped that this hint would reach those persons who had neglected their duty, and that they would, in less than ten days, make the necessary returns. If not, if they did not disclose the facts known to them upon this subject—whether good nature, or negligence, or unwillingness to get into quarrels, or, what approached very nearly to corruption, base servility to a patron, induced them to withhold returns, they might be assured that the abuses he alluded to would not escape detection; for the committee were already in possession of evidence of those abuses, and the consequence would be that the eyes of the committee, instead of being fixed exclusively on the abuses themselves, would be directed to the reverend persons who concealed them. He should now only mention one or two instances which had been lately discovered, and he would appeal to some members of the committee who were then present, whether such glaring instances of malversation had transpired before. In Hertfordshire there was a free grammar school, to which were attached some scholarships of 14*l.* a-year in the university of Cambridge; but, in the last 30 years, only one scholar had been sent thither. In Essex, in the year 1584, 200 acres of land were devised for the establishment of a school, but no school was now kept. In Devonshire, there was a fund of 170*l.* a-year for the support of a school; only three scholars were taught, while, according to the system of Bell and Lancaster, 150 might be educated for that sum. (Hear, hear.) In Dorsetshire, there was a house and garden for a school-master, and an estate of 200*l.* or 300*l.* a-year to maintain a school, but no school was kept. In Devon, there was an estate worth 1000*l.* a-year, and which was now let for 650*l.*; but the worshipful corporation allowed 4*l.* only for the purposes of the trust. (Hear.) In another place, the heirs of a noble person, who were trustees, had turned over the business of the trust to the steward, the steward to an inferior agent, the agent to a person of whom they had heard a good deal on another question—he meant the game-keeper. Scholars ought to have been sent to Cambridge from this institution; but none had been sent for more than 100 years. In Leicestershire, an estate worth 100*l.* a-year was now actually offered for sale; the trustees had paid 20*l.* a-year for the purposes of the trust, and pocketed the remainder. In Nottinghamshire, very ample funds were stated by the reverend reporter to have been "sold or alienated in a shameful way." A respectable solicitor had given information respecting the same estates, and it was believed that they had been let at a peppercorn rent for 999 years. In Worcestershire, there was one of King Edward's schools, where the principal master received 150*l.* a-year, with a house and garden, the second master 90*l.* with a house and garden also. The rents of the estates would educate 3 or 4000 scholars, but, at present, not a single boy was taught. (Hear, hear.) There were many more cases, but he would not weary the house with them. They were only repetitions of the same gross abuses. In consequence of the instances which had been brought to light, he was persuaded that the house would pass the present bill, and he was most anxious that it should not be crippled by any further restrictions. If any restrictions, restraints, or exceptions, were attached to it elsewhere, let others have the glory of them; that house would, in tenderness to the objects of their interposition, intrust the commissioners with the same inquisitorial powers which they themselves possessed. He implored the right hon. gentlemen opposite, to consider that every thing would depend on the personal characters of those appointed. (Hear.) He hoped there would be no jobbing in the selection. Some of the commissioners were to receive no salary. The appointment conferred no patronage. Of some of the persons who he had heard would be named, he could say nothing but what was respectful. But as nothing was to be received by the appointment but labour, he begged leave to address himself to ministers, and to express his own willingness to undertake the part of a commissioner. (Hear.) The committee had taken the point into consideration, and thought it fair that he should offer himself, from the share he had already had in this business, and the interest he felt for the complete success of the measure. If he had the good fortune to be named, he should most willingly take an active part, but only on the terms he had mentioned. If the house should think that members of parliament ought to be excluded, although among those he had heard mentioned was one of the most respectable members of that house, yet he should still hope to have the refusal. He felt most deeply and from the bottom of his heart anxious for the success of this inquiry; and he was therefore willing, for the sake of the security which his personal exertions would give, to make a temporary retreat from other business. He felt this a very delicate subject; but he could not, in duty to the investigation he had originated, refrain from saying what he had said. (Much cheering.) He again expressed his hope that the measure would find no interested opponents elsewhere. In that house there were none of the wrong doers whose conduct it would be one object of the commission to bring into view; and, in the other house, he looked confidently for the strenuous support of the heads of the Christian religion in this country. The Gospel was emphatically styled the Gospel of the poor. Surely, then, the heads of our great establishment for teaching the Gospel would not fail to exert all their power in providing that the poor should not be robbed. (Hear.)

The bill then went through the committee.

BANK RESTRICTION BILL.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved that the report of this bill be taken into further consideration.

Mr. F. Lewis regretted that the subject had not been referred to a committee up stairs. Nothing, however, was now left to the house but to amend the bill as best they might. The right hon. gentleman on a former night, had mentioned four causes for the continuance of the restrictions: 1. The expense of the army of occupation—2. The bad harvest—3. The expenditure of English travellers abroad—and 4. The loans to France. The three first circumstances were altogether inapplicable, for the expense of the army was paid by France; the bad harvest might again occur, and might be made a perpetual reason for restriction; and as to the expenditure of travellers, it had been foreseen two years ago. The loans to France were thus the only ground on which the measure rested; but he considered those loans as mere bugbears, and the alarm to which they had given rise as wholly without foundation. The fact was, that the rise in the price of gold and the fall of the exchange, was solely to be attributed to the enormous issue of Bank paper, and nothing could serve to remedy the evil but our return to a sound state of currency. The system upon which the Bank now acted must inevitably lead to the continuance of the restriction, from time to time; for the maintenance of their issues, at their present amount, would never allow the act to expire. He could not help looking forward to a great increase of circulating paper; and the county banks, by their renewed issues, would greatly assist in depreciating it. In alluding to those banks, he wished to be understood as fully sensible of the advantage which the public had derived from them in supplying a cheap medium of circulation, and in spreading it over every part of the country. Their number too, by contracting their own proceedings, had lessened the profits of the trade, and materially diminished the risk of individuals. What evil there was in them might be traced to the law which permitted them to issue small notes, and limited the number of partners in every firm, for the purpose of supporting the charter of the Bank of England. With regard to the benefits derived during the war from the Bank of England by the country, he thought they were greatly overrated. Let the house consider the burthen under which we were now labouring, in peace; let them reflect on the evils and miseries which the fluctuations in the value of the currency had occasioned; let them contemplate those high prices which had rendered the expenditure of the war so disproportionate and enormous. They must all be aware that the difficulty of returning to cash payments must be faced somehow, and at some period. When was it probable that a better opportunity would occur than at the present moment? The price of stocks would not, he thought, be affected by the resumption of cash payments. One argument frequently urged by the Bank directors was, that all inquiry into this subject was an improper interference with their affairs; but the bill now before the house was itself a most fatal and lamentable interference with them. It was to this interference he wished to put an end; and if cash payments were resumed, he, for one, would never again require the production of any of their accounts. The restriction gave them a power over the distribution of all the property in the kingdom. They might, if they should think proper, discount bills payable in three years, as well as bills payable at two months, and thus throw into circulation a quantity of paper that never would return to them. Whilst they possessed a discretion of this kind, the house must necessarily interfere in their concerns, or abandon altogether the most important interests of the country. The sort of interference which he would recommend should be gentle, gradual, but conclusive, by fixing a period at which they should resume their cash payments, but at such a distance as to enable them to be fully prepared for it by a previous reduction of their issues. The reduction of their small notes appeared to him to be much more desirable than that of notes of a higher denomination, both because the former would be supplied by a metallic currency, and because they were the principal cause of the vast and deplorable increase in the crime of forgery. He did not conceive that any refinement in the art of engraving them could form an effectual guard against it. There was one other consideration of a general nature which appeared to him to deserve attention, and it was, the opinion which the continuance of this system must inculcate in Europe with regard to our financial resources. If we were not regarded as a ruined nation, other countries would consider us as entangled in difficulties from which we knew not how to extricate ourselves. It was most desirable to make use of the opportunity of peace for freeing ourselves from this inconvenience. There was a courage of peace as well as a courage of war, and he did not believe that at any period could the difficulty be encountered with less risk than at present. For these reasons, he should move an amendment to leave out all the words in the preamble of the bill from "whereas," in order to add the words, "It is expedient that the provisions of the said act should be farther continued, in order to afford the directors of the Bank the opportunity of making such gradual reduction of the amount of their notes in circulation as may be necessary, in order to enable them, with safety to the Bank and to the public, to resume cash payments, at the earliest period, and that another time should be fixed at which the said restrictions should cease."

Mr. Canning opposed the amendment. He said, that the preamble, by declaring that "unforeseen circumstances" had rendered it expedient to continue the restriction, contained the only motive which, at present, could induce him to support the bill. He retained all his former opinions on this subject; and he still looked forward anxiously to the time when the restriction might cease, consistently with the public interest. The country could never be considered as having completely righted itself, until the currency was restored to its natural and regular course. (Hear, hear.) Circumstances had occurred to prevent the resumption—circumstances which it was no shame to the sagacity of any man not to have anticipated. It was said, that such might again take place; but, in his mind, it was impossible to think that circumstances equally unforeseen, equally unexpected, equally extraneous, should again rise. Many circumstances had occurred, certainly; but none without the French loans would have fairly justified the measure.

Mr. J. P. Grant observed, that if the government were confident in the opinion which the right hon. gentleman had given, namely, that the French loans furnished the sole reason for the continuance of the restriction, that reason ought to be expressed in the preamble of the bill. So convinced was he of the necessity of bringing this matter to a decisive issue with the Bank, and of fixing a definite period for replacing the metallic currency of the country on the footing upon which it formerly stood, that he now gave notice of his intention, in a future stage of the bill, to move that the restriction should not continue beyond six weeks after the next meeting of parliament.

Mr. C. Grant, jun. supported the preamble as it stood. He did not wish the restriction to be permanent, but he thought that, under existing circumstances, it would be wise to continue it for one year.

Mr. Hudson Gurney rose, and spoke as follows:—"I am aware, sir, that, in offering myself to your attention in a discussion like this—after the speeches of so many gentlemen of the highest name and authority—I am accusable of no small temerity; but having given to the subject the most sedulous consideration I have been able to bring to it; and having been in a position for somewhat more than twenty years, which necessarily brought under my view the details of the system on which the currency of the country has been carried on during that period, I am anxious to be allowed to trespass for a few minutes on the patience of the house. Sir, I think it must be granted, that the preamble of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is at least innocent. The amendment of the honourable gentleman, I conceive to have a tendency to be hurtful, and I shall vote against that amendment. Sir, I will state boldly, without fear of contradiction, that this is not a question concerning the interests of the Bank; but one concerning solely, and involving most deeply, the interests of the community. Gentlemen have gone into many, and into intricate, details;—into these I shall not follow them.—The main bearing of the whole matter, I do firmly believe, lies palpable on the surface. It is very commonly rumoured, that the Bank possess in their coffers, either fourteen millions or sixteen millions in gold. The government owes them twelve millions; and, this paid, the Bank can pay off every note they have issued;—and where is their necessity ever to issue another? But, in such case, where are the community? The Bank can, out of the accumulation of its capital, furnish forth its treasure.—Is it the same with the country? I confess I consider it fortunate, that the Bank did not resume its cash payments in 1816; and I am even inclined to consider it fortunate, that it does not resume them now; as I lean most strongly to the opinion, that, before the Bank can ever pay in specie, with safety to the state, the government must rectify what appears to me to have been no small error; namely, the adoption of the principles of Mr. Locke—under circumstances to which they did not apply—in the late coinage. Sir, gentlemen have talked much, and have, as I think, talked wildly, of the power of the Bank of England, and even of the power of the private bankers, of enlarging their issues to any extent—of the consequent depreciation of the paper currency as valued against gold—and in this their interested career, of the urgent necessity of curbing them. Sir, the Bank of England has never brought such powers into action, and the private bankers have never possessed them. The pound of account of 1818, is not the pound of account of the days of Mr. Locke; but it is not the Bank of England which has altered it. But to the pound of account of the times existing, you must adjust your coinage. It is upon that pound all outstanding contract was calculated: or, on reverting to payments in specie after so long a cessation, your embarrassment will be, I fear, unbounded. If, on either side, the scale of justice must incline, the creditor can receive, as he has received, gradually, somewhat less than has been his due. The debtor cannot suddenly be made to pay him more, because he has it not. Sir, the work of Mr. Locke was written in the year 1695, when the national debt was under twenty millions. Consequently, the bearing of it on the currency was only the amount of its interest, say under a million. It hardly yet entered into the computation as holding any great influence on the rise of prices. Let us now look at the financial history of the country during the last twenty-four years. In 1796, Paine wrote his Decline and Fall of the English System of Finance. He wrote as an enemy; but his inductions are, many of them, indisputable—if you concede to him the grand fallacy on which they all rest; namely, that the pound of account is of unvarying value,—and that the pound payable to the national creditor in 1796 was to remain, as to its efficacy, the pound for ever. Since the days of Mr. Locke, the debt had changed from a debt, properly so called, to the understanding of a perpetual annuity. Paine states its amount in nominal capital to be approaching to 400 millions, and argues, that the extent of its yearly interest could not much longer be borne, as marching in an accelerating ratio of constant increase—the funds at that time standing at 59. In 1797, this feeling began to prevail universally—the funds fell to 48. Mr. Pitt put it to the patriotism of the country, and vainly attempted his loyalty loan. All who had demands for gold, rushed for gold to hoard it. The Bank stopped under the shelter of an order from the privy council; and the golden pound hitherto in use departed from the circulation of England—the Bank notes issued being then under eleven millions. In 1798, the funds remained at 48 and 49. The circulation of the Bank was twelve millions; but the country, through the private bankers, had been supplied in most counties with an issue of one pound notes, which replaced the guineas that had disappeared. In Norfolk, with great difficulty, we did keep up a certain circulation of gold, mixed with the one pound notes of the Bank of England. In this year, Mr. Pitt carried his bill for the war assessed taxes, stretchable to the supposed tenth of the income of the payer. In 1799, finding the old system could go no farther, Mr. Pitt brought in his income tax. The funds rose to 67. Credit began to re-establish itself. I have heard, that at this time Paine himself acknowledged to Barlow, that the bankruptcy he had prophesied was averted from England: and the Bank issues began their sensible rise, going now thirteen millions and a half. It was in this year that Mr. Weston wrote those strange letters, so singularly quoted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, recommending to Mr. Pitt the adoption of Law's system, exaggerated in the ratio of the comparative amounts of the debts of this country in 1799, and of France under the regent Orleans. Mr. Weston wanted at once to break down fifty millions of the principal of the debt, and to put it in a form to pass as money,—utterly forgetting that a circulating medium must circulate; that is, that it must come back upon its issuer to be paid at its par again, and that speedily; or it must necessarily, as Law's did, most speedily sink. However, with the increase of the debt there was the increase of its interest to pay, which could only be met by increased taxation—increased taxation could only be supplied by increase in the prices of all things; and through the means of these increased prices, a larger amount of representation was rendered necessary; and this necessary amount the Bank did in effect (inasmuch as depended on them), soberly, wisely, and temperately supply. From that day to this, we have found that the amount of Bank notes in circulation has gradually risen in a certain proportion to the increase of the interest paid to the creditor of the state. In these notes his dividends are receivable; but having always been kept by the Bank under the amount of that interest, they have been, of necessity, received back by the government at their par much within the last year, for the taxes imposed to meet this payment of interest, so due to the creditor. It is perfectly obvious, that a paper thus circumstanced can never lose its currency within the community, though it pass for nothing out of it. All things will become dearer, gold not excepted; but the system can go on unimpeded; and, in fact, the government have been in no difficulty in raising loans for the public service since its adoption. During the vast and disproportionate efforts the country was making in the prosecution of the war, all went on smoothly, till, in 1813, farther taxation appearing next to impossible, the Chancellor of the Exchequer attacked the sinking fund—the last great financial expedient up to the conclusion of the contest. Sir, at this period the national debt had mounted to more than 800 millions—the interest upon it to upwards of 30 millions; and we find the Bank issues in 1815 were twenty-seven millions. Now, I own, sir, I am led to suspect that we must always have a paper representation, more or less in the nature of a legal tender, bearing some relative proportion to the interest of the debt;—that as our commodities will insure us a credit for their absolute value in gold and silver on the market of the world, so we may be able to satisfy our domestic reckonings mixed up with, and swelled in their numerical amounts, by the addition of the taxation to the prices of every thing. Next, as to the question of prices—it is quite idle to suppose that a million or two more or less in the circulation of the Bank;—that a few notes more or less issued providently, or improvidently, by the country bankers—(for if issued improvidently, they would only come back on them the faster) should have effected any very material alteration. No banker ever did, or can, issue any paper, but as change for something of a higher value previously lodged with him. No banker can keep out a note an hour which is not wanted for the immediate transfer of the goods on sale in the district around him. If he lends his notes, he probably loses his money; but the notes must come back—if more are issued than are wanted—for immediate repayment. It is to the increase of our debt that we have alone to look, as the cause of the increase of our prices,—to the millions on millions of the engagements of the treasury,—and not to the millions of the promises of the Bank. I now come to the year 1816,—and to that year's experience, I do presume to intreat the attention of the house. In 1813 and 1814 the harvests had been abundant throughout all Europe. The war had ceased, leaving England, I may say, glutted with merchandise,—with abundance of all things. But something in the nature of an epidemic insanity seized the whole nation. The activity of our commerce itself, had been bent and directed to the purposes of war. And, after twenty-four years of warfare—all the bills unpaid—every one seemed to think that they had nothing to do but to dismantle—to sit still and enjoy themselves. But what followed? Managed as best it might be, there must have been a great revulsion; but all seemed to be set on making that revulsion as great as possible. Every establishment, carried to its perfection at whatever expense, was instantly to be got rid of. Our people being out of employ, the army and navy were, as instantly, to be discharged, to increase the number of the destitute. The property tax, which, however unequal in some parts of its operation, had been the main support of our finances, was wrenched out of the hands of government;—and the property which had so iniquitously attempted to relieve itself by casting its burthen on those who possessed nothing, sunk in the hands of its owners some 50 per cent. in its value. Prices, indeed, became low: but who was benefited by their fall? Did the landed proprietor receive his rents? Could the farmer cultivate his tenancy, and exist by the occupation? Did the manufacturer gain relief from the goods uncalled for and rotting in his warehouses? And, above all, what was the situation of the poor?—With no natural failure in the country, the poor were every where starving. There was an universal set-fast,—in the higher orders a greater embarrassment; and in the lower, a more intense misery, than had been known in England for centuries. Now, sir, our exchanges were at par, we had suddenly been brought back to our old golden prices. We tried them but we could not live. It has been thrown out, that the monied interests were warped by their own gains to advocate the continuance of the Bank restriction; but I beg the great landed proprietors in this house to revert to that calamitous period, and they will see that the only class who remained uninjured, were the monied capitalists. I must now come back to the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had lost the property tax. It was perfectly obvious in the then state of things, that the taxes on articles of consumption must fall off greatly. New impositions were out of the question; and he did, perhaps, the only thing he could do. He did not circulate fifty millions of the old debt: but he made the capital of the new debt—the winding up of the war expenditure—stand for money. He threw fifty millions of exchequer bills on the money market; and in a year, in which it is clear there could be no increase of real riches—on the contrary, by the end of perhaps the only year, in which the actual consumption of the country had been greater than its actual produce, he had succeeded in making money a drug—and money, in the beginning of 1816, not having been to be borrowed at any interest—by January 1817, he had brought down the rate of interest to four per cent. Stocks rose in price—all things rose in price. But in what were they measured? Certainly not in a standard altered by the Bank issues, for they had kept steady; or, indeed, were rather reduced—but by the undisguised and undisguisable issues of the capital of the debt. Sir, from that time the industry of the country has gradually been bringing it round again. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has lately been funding some of his exchequer bills. It may be hoped that he may not see it necessary to keep up this forced and unnatural state of things, but allow them to subside, after these violent fluctuations, into their fair channel: for then, and then only, shall we be able to ascertain what the pound of account of England really is, as measured against gold. But do what you will, one thing is certain—your pound of account is not the pound of account of the days of William the Third; and, under a debt of 840 millions, you can no more force back your prices to the prices of former times, without ruin to all parties, than you can make the shadow go back upon the dial. There appears to me to be still one more reason why it would be more convenient to suspend the resumption of specie payments for another year; namely, that it is not only the finances of this country which have been in a state of great fluctuation and uncertainty during the war, but the monetary system of almost all the countries of Europe; and until they, as well as we, have become more settled in the transactions of peace, it would seem to me to be almost impossible to ascertain and adjust our standard. To recapitulate. It shews the wonderful powers of this country, that, under a debt so enormous, the difference is not greater than it is. Yet I still cannot but conceive it to be demonstrable.—First, that the pound of account of 1818 is not the golden pound of 1695; and that previously to the Bank of England being again opened for the payment of specie, after a cessation of so many years, it will be necessary to re-adjust the coinage to the value of the pound contemplated in the mass of outstanding contract. Secondly, that any variation in the value of the pound of account from the golden pound circulated previously to 1797, was not primarily occasioned by the Bank's or bankers' issues: but by the issues and debts of government; and, consequently, that, supposing neither of the latter to go on increasing, there is no reason to presume that any further depreciation will take place, by postponing the opening the Bank for specie payments to another year. Thirdly, and lastly, that the species of paper which most markedly and directly bears, by its great amount, on the prices of all things, is the issue of the paper of government,—which represents nothing, but the exigencies and deficiencies of the state,—which is not taken up in the receipts of the year's taxation,—but which falls dead on the market;—and with a view to bring the price of gold as near to the level of the pound of account in England as may be, it will be necessary to abridge, as much as shall be possible, the floating debt. Sir, I have to apologise to the house for the length of statement into which I have insensibly been drawn, and shall conclude by merely repeating, that for the reasons I have before adduced, I shall vote for retaining the preamble of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and against the amendment of the hon. gentleman."

Mr. Bankes said, he most sincerely wished that the house had acceded to a motion that was made some weeks ago, to inquire into this matter (hear, hear); and he trusted that the right hon. gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) would consent to an investigation early in the next session, when the subject might be gravely and seriously considered. If a committee had been appointed, he should have asked the right hon. gentleman on what grounds he conceived that the Bank would be enabled, at the end of one year, to resume its payments. Was this likely to be the last year during which the suspension would be continued? For his own part, he thought, that from time to time there would be some cause, either foreseen or unforeseen, to prevent the resumption of payments in specie. (Hear.) It would be a great point to come back to a sound state of currency, and the country had a right to demand it. (Hear.)

The question being put, "That the words of the Amendment made by the Committee, proposed to be left out, stand part of the question." The house divided.

Ayes, 88—Noes, 21.

Mr. J. P. Grant then moved, that instead of the words "5th day of July, 1819," these words be inserted, "six weeks after the meeting of the next session of parliament."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that so important a question as that of resuming cash payments could not be decided at so early a period as six weeks after the meeting of parliament.

Mr. Tierney said, that if the right hon. gentleman meant to carry on a sort of juggle with the Bank, he did not act so fairly and manfully as the hon. member under the gallery (Mr. Gurney) did, when he said openly, that he held the payment of paper in specie, as an abominable heresy. (A laugh.) He should therefore move, to leave out "the 5th of July," in order to substitute "the 25th day of March."

Mr. J. P. Grant said, he should withdraw his amendment to make room for that of his right hon. friend.

Mr. C. Grant, jun. opposed the amendment. He observed, that the operation of the foreign loans on our market could not be expected to cease by the 25th of March.

The question being put, "That the words of the Amendment made by the Committee, proposed to be left out, stand part thereof." The house divided.

Ayes, 88—Noes, 27.

LOTTERY.] The house having resolved itself into a committee of ways and means, the Chancellor of the Exchequer moved a resolution for raising the sum of 250,000*l.* by way of lottery.

Mr. Lyttelton opposed the motion. The system of lotteries, he observed, went to increase the patronage of the crown, to train up a race of informers, and to subvert the morals of the people. Perhaps those who were so earnest in building the new churches, thought by so doing to atone for the mischief they thus created. But it was utterly inconsistent to be anxious about the education of the people, and the improvement of morality on one side, if all that was done were defeated by the lottery on the other. The right hon. gentleman seemed to be raising batteries against his own measures, but it would be more candid and simple to abandon them at once.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not consider himself called upon to give additional reasons in favour of a measure in proposing which he had only followed all his predecessors. The hon. gentleman had advanced no new argument, and as there would always be a certain quantity of gambling, lotteries were not more mischievous than unauthorized play.

Sir M. W. Ridley remarked, that nothing could be more inconsistent than the conduct of the right hon. gentleman on this subject. On one day, he encouraged saving banks, and, on another, allured the people to venture their earnings in a lottery. (Hear, hear.)

Sir J. Newport related an anecdote of one of the sheriffs of Dublin, who was a lottery-office keeper, and had been lately convicted in the penalty of 50*l.* for illegal insurances. Six other actions were still pending over him, and, he understood that, this man had been convicted of a similar offence in the preceding year, but, notwithstanding, he had been again licensed.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that if an office-keeper in London had been guilty of such an offence, his license would not have been renewed.

Sir J. Newport observed, that the right hon. gentleman was chancellor of the exchequer for Ireland as well as for England. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Wilberforce, in answer to the argument that unauthorized gambling would exist, if the lottery did not, said, that the latter was a national crime, encouraging immorality at large, and not exciting reprobation like a private vice. There was no ground for defending this, which would not go also to defend any other crime, and he hoped to see the end of a system so injurious and destructive of industry.

Mr. B. Howard contended that the system suspended the law of the land. There were statutes which declared all lotteries public nuisances, and subversive of the common good.

Mr. W. Smith said, that to erect saving-banks with one hand and lotteries with the other, was a political solecism; it was urging the honest man to spend his little savings in mischievous and ruinous adventure.

The committee divided.

For the resolution 75
Against it 33

CORONERS ELECTION BILL.] This bill was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, May 19.

REGENCY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.] The Lord Chancellor presented a bill to alter and amend the act of the 51 Geo. III. relative to the custody of his Majesty's person during the Regency. One object of the bill was, to vest in the Queen the power of appointing additional members of the council, to assist her Majesty in the execution of the high trust reposed in her with regard to the care of the king's person; the other object was, to provide for the meeting of parliament, within a certain time, in the possible case of a cessation on the part of her majesty, to have the care of the king.

Earl Grey said, that, until he entered the house, he had not been aware of the intention of the noble and learned lord to introduce this measure. He was not prepared to give a decided opinion upon it, and, therefore, he should reserve himself for further deliberation.

The Lord Chancellor said, that on the question of the second reading, he proposed to enter at large into the consideration of the measure.

The bill was then read a first time.

LIBEL LAW.] Lord Erskine said that, for reasons which he had already explained, he now proposed to introduce a bill for declaring the law with respect to the power of justices of the peace, to apprehend and hold to bail, or commit for libel, before indictment found. The preamble of the bill stated, that whereas doubts on the law had arisen, and the bill went on to declare, that the magistrates had no such power. He moved, that it be now read a first time.

The Lord Chancellor said, that in putting the question on the first reading of this bill, he wished it not to be understood that he entertained any doubt whatever as to the law upon the subject.

The bill was then read a first time.

COTTON FACTORIES BILL.] The house went into a committee on this bill, when Mr. Warren was heard as counsel for the petitioners against the bill. The question was then put, that Mr. Harrison should also be heard.

Lord Kenyon expressed his opinion that neither counsel nor evidence should be farther heard. He conceived, that the evidence taken before the committee of the House of Commons was quite sufficient.

The Earl of Lauderdale stated, that the noble lord had determined, before he came to the house, not to hear counsel, and read a letter from his lordship to that effect. The noble earl then argued, from the impolicy of the measure, and the mischievous effects it would have on trade, that the petitioners ought to be heard. He proved that the evidence already before the house was contradictory and inconsistent, if not false in the highest degree, and thence urged the necessity of admitting evidence on oath.

Earl Manvers was in favour of hearing both counsel and evidence in support of the petitioners against the bill.

The Bishop of Chester opposed the hearing of counsel, on the ground that the simple question was, whether parliament would protect those who could not protect themselves, and whether children should be permitted to work more than 12 hours. He had seen the misery of the factories himself, and was astonished to hear the employment called " free trade."

The Lord Chancellor, after observing that the law of the land already sanctioned a degree of interference between employers and their workmen, as in the instance of master and apprentice, and that parents might be compelled on application to a magistrate to treat their children properly, contended, that it was but fair to admit farther evidence, and to hear the arguments of counsel. The evidence taken before the committee of the commons was most contradictory, and he did not think it would be safe to legislate upon it.

The Earl of Liverpool admitted, that the evidence then before their lordships was contradictory, but he contended, that where opinion was mixed up with matter of fact, as in the case of the chimney-sweepers, it was always so. He therefore thought it would be inexpedient to enter into an investigation that might lead to endless discussion. He considered that their lordships had already sufficient evidence before them to come to a decision, which did not turn on any matter of fact that had been disputed. He doubted the inference which the noble earl (Lauderdale) had drawn respecting the mischievous effect of this measure on trade; he thought it would have no such effect; but if it should, that was a question for consideration on other grounds. Trade could not be improved by overworking man or child.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, that if labour were regulated at all, reference should be had to the personal strength of each individual, and no general rule could be relied on. The employer was the person most likely to be acquainted with the different degrees of strength possessed by his workmen, and most likely to avoid overrating them, with a view to his own advantage. The inconsistency of the evidence already produced shewed the necessity of hearing the petitioners.

The Marquis of Lansdowne agreed that a great evil existed in the excessive labour of children, and that it would be proper to introduce some measure on the subject: but he was the more convinced that the petitioners' counsel and evidence ought to be heard, and that the house should not legislate in the dark. He did not, however, feel any apprehension on the ground of the mischief which it was alleged the measure would produce on trade, though it might alter the course of the manufacture: and this rendered it the more necessary to hear evidence on the subject.

The question was put and carried. It was then agreed that further evidence should be heard in a committee up-stairs to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, May 19.

COPYRIGHT BILL.] Mr. Finlay presented a petition of the Senatus Academicus of the university of Glasgow, against this bill.—Ordered to lie on the table.

BANK RESTRICTION BILL.] On the order of the day for the third reading of this bill, Mr. Finlay said, he was afraid from what he saw, that it was not the intention of government ever to place our currency on its former footing. It was absurd to think that the Bank would next year, or in any future year, be more able or willing to return to cash payments than they were at present. The resumption might be attended with some inconvenience; but the house ought to meet the evil in a manly and fair manner at once, and not allow themselves to be abused any longer with the farce which had been played off upon them.

Mr. Hammersley said, that the directors had always been desirous of returning to cash payments; but, at this time, agents from all the foreign houses were in the metropolis, and if the restriction were not continued, a great part of the loans would be supplied from the issues of gold from the Bank.

Mr. Tierney wished to know whether any and what steps had been taken to pay the nine millions due by the public to the Bank. On the re-payment of that sum, all pretences for excessive issues of their notes would be at an end. It was only the wants of government during the war that gave rise to the restriction, and justified the issues of the directors.

Mr. Lushington said, that arrangements were certainly in progress as to the payment of this money, but the precise period of payment was not yet fixed.

Mr. Tierney remarked, that provision had been made in the early part of the session for payment of six millions, but he wanted to know how the three millions were to be paid. No provision had been made for that sum, and he did not suppose it would be taken from funds voted for other purposes.

Mr. Thornton said, that the sums in question would be paid off in the course of the present year. The right hon. gentleman had said a good deal about the responsibility of the directors, if they did not diminish their issue of bank-notes, and prepare for the resumption of cash payments. That responsibility he was quite prepared to share with his colleagues in the Bank direction. The true and considerate preparation for cash payments was a matter of too much delicacy to discuss in the house, and particularly at this period. He must, therefore, decline to give any pledge as to what might be the future issue of bank-notes, or the course to be pursued to facilitate the measure desired by all parts of the house. The directors, he was persuaded, would do their duty, and trust to the good sense of parliament for a fair construction of their conduct.

Mr. Tierney was happy to hear that the Bank would soon be placed in a situation in which their issues would be limited to the wants of the country.

Lord Folkestone agreed with the hon. member for Glasgow, that the difficulty of resuming cash payments would increase every year. For his own part, from what he had heard on this subject, he could never expect to see the restriction removed.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.] Lord A. Hamilton said, the house having decided that it was not their intention to visit Thomas Fergusson with the punishment of loss of office, he submitted, that there was no necessity for detaining him any longer in prison. He should therefore move "that he be brought up to the bar of the house to-morrow, for the purpose of being discharged.

Mr. Wynn said, that as the house had not taken the same view that he had of the enormity of the prisoner's offence, he would not oppose the motion. The offence, enormous as it was, had been aggravated by many falsehoods, and the character of the offender seemed to be so blasted as to make it utterly disgraceful to continue him as a servant of the government. He should have preferred that he should not be discharged till Monday next, when he would have been three weeks in prison. That he had acknowledged his offence, was only a reason why he should not be punished for obstinacy; it was no reason why any lenity should be shewn to the original offence.

The motion was agreed to. On the question that Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant,

Mr. Wynn said, that on a former occasion he had expressed that it was not his intention to found any legislative measure upon this case; but now, on further consideration, he thought that it might be proper to extend the enactment which prohibited all officers of excise, of the customs, and of the post-office, from interfering in elections, to the officers of the assessed taxes. They had not been included in the act of Queen Ann, because at that time there had been no assessed taxes. He merely threw this out for the consideration of the house.

REWARDS ON CONVICTION BILL.] This bill was read a third time and passed.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Two petitions were presented of inhabitants of Nottingham; also a petition of burgesses and inhabitants of the town of Paisley; also, six petitions of inhabitants of the town of Falkirk; also, nineteen petitions of inhabitants of Manchester; also, three petitions of inhabitants of Glasgow; also, two petitions of inhabitants of Dundee; also, nine petitions of inhabitants of Pollockshaws; also two petitions of inhabitants of Royton; also, three petitions of inhabitants of Newcastle-upon-Tyne; also five petitions of inhabitants of Sheffield; also, a petition of inhabitants of Huddersfield; also, of Liverpool; also, of Oldham; also, of Rochdale.—They all prayed for annual parliaments and universal suffrage, and were ordered to lie on the table.

REPEAL OF THE SEPTENNIAL ACT.] Sir Robert Heron rose, pursuant to notice, to move "that leave be given to bring in a bill to repeal the act 1 Geo. I. c. 38, intitled 'an act for enlarging the time of continuance of parliaments appointed by an act made in the 6th year of the reign of king William and Queen Mary, intituled, an act for the frequent meeting and calling of parliaments."—The hon. baronet said, that although this precise question had not for a long time been before the house, yet the general question of parliamentary reform had been so deliberately and so ably discussed, that it would not be necessary for him to occupy much of their time. His own health, too, would prevent him from saying much. A very general impression had for a long period prevailed among the people of England, that a renovation of that house was necessary, in order to make it in practice, what it was in theory, the commons house of parliament. (Hear.) When it had been observed, that the house adhered very generally to the minister, whatever measures he might please to propose, it became a very important object with the people to remove such an evil by reform, and this object had been supported by most respectable and able men. After the peace of 1783, a strenuous effort was made: but the cause was soon forsaken by one of its ablest supporters, who afterwards became its bitterest enemy. Not long after a war arose, which threw the nations of Europe centuries back in the career of improvement and reform. The people had then, to use a favourite phrase of the noble lord opposite, "turned their backs on themselves." Rights were taken from them which they had never abused, under the pretence of plots, which, if they existed at all, had been greatly exaggerated. The machinery of plots was, indeed, still kept among the stores of the treasury; but he trusted that the bottom of the green-bag would now be found so much damaged, that it would never produce an explosion again. On the several occasions on which reform had been strongly urged, proof of its necessity was offered to be produced at the bar, but the house had never shewn any desire to enter into the case. The Grenville act had proclaimed to the country, that the members of that house were so corrupt, that they were not to be trusted with the trial of their own elections. Oaths were accordingly prescribed in order to prevent corruption, if possible, in those who, without an oath, were bound by every consideration of duty, conscience, and character, to decide honestly. Mr. Rigby, Mr. Dyson, and Lord North, persons who had themselves been most conversant with corruption, had admitted the necessity of reform. The Grenville act had effected some improvements in the trial of contested elections; but the enormous expense of petitions almost amounted to a denial of justice. That act, indeed, was an avowal of a defective practice—it was a strong argument for reform, because it would not be necessary if other abuses were corrected. When any thing in the shape of reform was proposed on his side of the house, it was met by gentlemen on the other with various objections. The most frequent objection was, that the time was not proper. When we were in prosperity, it was said that reform was unnecessary; when we were in distress, it was said to be dangerous. Another objection was, that the reformers could not agree, and that they had views beyond a reform. This objection was never applied to other measures The imposers of taxes often disagreed and very widely; and yet taxes were imposed. Nothing could be more different than the reports on the poor-laws, and the bills founded on them. The former recommended a radical change; the latter, he feared, would produce no useful effect whatever. But the want of agreement was at least a proof of sincerity among the reformers. Annual parliaments, triennial parliaments, universal suffrage, ballot, any measure would answer the same end, if they only wanted a covered way for attacking the fortress of the constitution. A third objection was, that the constitution was perfect, and required no reform. A constitution, it was said, more perfect than ever, issued from the constitution shops, from Plato down to the Abbé Siéyes, had arisen from accidents, and had worked itself into a fully poised and equally balanced system. But the most successful objection to every kind of reform was the French revolution—he meant the consequences of that revolution. If gentlemen would only consider the causes of those events, they would find that they were quite inapplicable to any question of reform in this country. The first cause was, the total unfitness of the French nation at that time for any thing like public liberty. The second was, that a weak and vacillating king inclined towards every thing benevolent, but kept his purpose in nothing. The third was, the unbounded extravagance of the French court, which no minister could supply, and yet, without yielding to the wishes of the court, no minister could long hold his place. The last, but not the least cause was, the conduct and character of the late Duke of Orleans, who had been properly styled, the monster Egalité. But still, all the attacks of himself and his partizans upon the king's government would have been ineffectual, had the monarch attended to the wishes and entreaties of his people. In 1797, M. Neckar published a book on the French revolution, in which he delivered his opinion, that "if the king of France had acceded in time, the revolution would not have taken place; but the French court refused making popular reforms until it was too late*." It was obvious, then, that all arguments to be drawn from the French

* The wretched state to which the people of France had been reduced for a long time prior to the revolution, is exhibited in a tract published by John Hampden, esq. in 1692, and cited in the note to Kennett's Hist. of Charles II. p. 397.. Mr. Hampden says, "That discoursing about 10 years before, at Paris, with the famous historian Mezeray, about the difference of the government of France and England, Mezeray broke out into these expressions with transport, O fortunatos nimium, sua si bona nôrint, Angligenæ! We had once in France the same happiness, and the same privileges, which you have—our laws were made by representatives of our own choosing—our money was not taken from us but by our own consent—our kings were subject to the rules of law and reason.—But now, alas! we are miserable, and all is lost! I think nothing too dear to maintain these precious advantages; and if ever there be occasion, venture your life, your estate, and all you have, rather than submit to the miserable condition to which you see us reduced."—The following anecdote told by the Duke de St. Simon, and which, he said, he had from M. de Marechal, surgeon to Louis XIV. confirms the truth of Mezeray's observations: "In the year 1710, when large sums were wanting for carrying on the war, and the people of France were extremely oppressed by the burthens they already laboured under, the ministers proposed a new tax, revolution were more in favour of reform than against it. The principles of that revolution ought to be separated from the acts which followed: the principles themselves might be justifiable, but the acts were cruel and atrocious, and no one regarded them with more horror than he did. Let gentlemen look to the character of the people of England, let them trace their history through all their former revolutions, and they would never find them inclined to anarchy. They were always afraid of going too far. They generally stopt short too soon. In the time of Charles I. there was a civil war, and of course some bloodshed followed, but no atrocities were committed. Charles was indeed beheaded; but such was the general feeling in his favour, that it was almost certain his life had been spared could either party have trusted him. Let them look to the revolution of 1688 which had placed the present family on the throne. Was it not conducted with peculiar mildness? Had a single drop of blood been shed? James was allowed to withdraw in safety, and none of his adherents would have suffered, if they had not obstinately persevered in attempts to restore him. In truth, it was hardly proper to call it a revolution: it did not introduce any innovation; it was the restoration of the ancient fundamental constitution of the kingdom. The bill of rights was, as Blackstone had said, "only declaratory of the old constitutional law.—The gentlemen on the other side were accustomed to speak of the danger of changes, but they had no objection to such changes as would increase their own power. They only opposed those which might restore something to the people. (Hear, hear.) All human institutions were impaired by time, and, in order to renovate them, frequent recurrence must be had to their original principles. If no changes were necessary, why did they meet in that house for six months in every year? The fact was, that the greatest obstacle to reform was corruption. The first act of the late empress Catharine, after the conquest of Poland, was to declare that its parliament should never be reformed. When the Poles applied for reform, she saw the danger of granting what was so reasonable and proper; she saw that her power would be impaired by it, and she considered it a declaration of war. The proposition of reform which he had now to submit, was, to shorten the duration of parliaments, a reform that might be made without any danger, and which would produce the most salutary effects. It was unnecessary to go into the complicated question, whether parliaments had been originally annual or not. Annual they certainly appeared to have been, whether by special law or otherwise. But he did not wish to dwell on that point, as he was persuaded that such parliaments were not suited to the present state of the country. In the tyrannical reign of Henry VIII. the duration of parliament became undefined. Mary, who wished to be popular, reduced it to a limited period; but, after her death, it was again undefined. One parliament in the reign of Elizabeth sat for seven years, ten months, and ten days. A parliament in the reign of James I. sat for seven years, ten months, and twenty one days. A parliament in the reign of Charles I. sat for twelve years, five months, and seventeen days. And a parliament in the reign of Charles II. sat for sixteen years, eight months, and sixteen days. At the Revolution, a favourable opportunity arose for correcting this abuse. But the legislature did not proceed rashly on the subject. Among the matters contained in the Report of the Committee that was appointed to bring in general heads of such things as were "absolutely necessary, for the better securing our religion, laws, and liberties," it was mentioned, "That parliament ought to sit frequently; and that the too long continuance of the same parliament be prevented." The first part of this sentence was introduced into the Declaration and Bill of Rights; and it would have been better, perhaps, if the great men of that day had been more full and explicit, by retaining the other branch of the sen-under the name of A Royal Tenth, and presented the plan for raising it to the king. Accustomed as Louis was to the imposition of the most enormous taxes, he could not help being shocked at this; his uneasiness even appeared in his countenance. His domestics observed it, and Marechal, from whom I had this anecdote, ventured to mention to the king, "That he had observed a degree of melancholy hang about him for these several days, and that he had fears for his Majesty's health." Louis acknowledged to him, that he was in great uneasiness, and expressed himself in a general way, on the present posture of affairs. Having within eight or ten days recovered his ordinary tranquillity, he sent for Marechal, and taking him aside, said, "Now that I feel myself at ease, I must tell you the cause of my anxiety, and by what means I have got rid of it." He then informed Marechal, that the urgent necessity of his affairs having compelled him to impose new taxes, his compassion for his subjects, and his unwillingness to make free with every person's property, had greatly distressed him on the occasion. At last, added the king, I opened my mind to Father Le Tellier, (who was at this time the Confessor) Le Tellier desired some days to think of the matter. He has now brought me a consultation of the subtlest doctors of the Sorbonne, who all agree, "That the whole property of my subjects is mine personally; and that when I take it from them, I take nothing but what is my own." This decision has restored the ease of mind I had lost."

The Editor is indebted for these quotations to the 3d vol. of Hatsell, pp. 91—2, the last edition, with the notes and observations of Lord Colchester. It is there added—"Since the former publication of this volume (viz. in 1784), a great alteration has taken place in the French constitution, particularly upon the subject of granting supplies and imposing taxes; and now (in the year 1817) a still greater alteration subsists from what has been the acknowledged constitution of France for several centu-tence. However, in the year 1694, while the spirit of the Revolution was yet warm, an act was passed, 6 W. and M. c. 2, which declared, that "frequent and new parliaments tend very much to the happy union and good agreement between king and people;" and enacted, that no parliament should last longer than three years*. (Hear, hear.) That act continued in force during the space of 21 years, namely, till the year 1715, and it was well known how it came to be repealed. A civil war then broke forth, which had been rather checked than destroyed. The fire was left burning under the ashes. In this state, the government were afraid to trust the people with the election of members of parliament. The Septennial act was then passed—an act, in his opinion, as indiscreet as it was unjust. It recited, however, the real cause of the repeal, namely, that "at this juncture, a restless and popish faction are designing and endeavouring to renew rebellion within this kingdom, and an invasion from abroad†. It was unnecessary, he thought, to quote Mr. Locke or any other writer of eminence to prove, that this act was one of the most unwarrantable exertions of authority that ever were made since the first existence of parliaments. The house of commons at that time, as it was forcibly expressed by an hon. member who opposed the bill, "turned the dagger into the bowels of the constitution." It had been said, that the previous triennial act had lengthened the duration of parliament; certain it was that the septennial act lengthened it beyond any legislative precedent, and beyond every principle of justice. One of the arguments which were then urged against the triennial parliament was, that the first year was always taken up with contested elections. This objection was now removed by the Grenville act. Another argument was, the inconvenience of frequent expensive elections: but this objection might be very easily obviated. If an act of legislation shortened the duration of parliament, why should not another act prevent expenses? Direct bribery was now prohibited. Why then should not every member be obliged to take an oath that he had given no compensation for labour or expense at elections? A bill could certainly be introduced by which expenses would be as much as possible prevented; and indeed, a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Tierney) had formerly brought in a bill to prevent candi-

* This bill was drawn up by Mr. Harley. It was presented to the commons on the 22d November, and was passed on the 13th December. It was then sent up to the lords, who on the 18th gave it their concurrence, without any amendments. Bishop Burnet says, that this bill was, by express bargain, the price of the Supply: and he appears to be correct, for in every stage of its progress the Tunnage-Bill waited upon it, if it did not bear it company. On the 22d December, when both bills were ready for the royal assent, the king went to the house of peers, and having first bestowed that grace on the Tunnage-Bill, suffered its companion, the Triennial-Bill, also to become a law.—See Ralph.

† On the 20th July, 1715, the King had informed parliament, that "he had certain advices of preparations being made by the Pretender for an invasion, which were seconded at home by a restless party in his favour." On the 9th of Jan. 1716, his Majesty stated, that he had reason to believe the Pretender was then landed in Scotland, and that a rebellion had actually broken out. On the same day, the Earls of Derwentwater, Nithsdale, Carnwath, and Winton; Viscount Kenmure, and the Lords Widdrington and Nairn, were impeached of high treason. They were all found guilty, and several of them afterwards beheaded. On the 21st Jan. the King informed parliament, "that the accounts he had since received put it beyond all doubt, that the Pretender was heading the rebellion in Scotland; that he had assumed the style and title of King of these Realms; and that his adherents did likewise confidently affirm, that assurances were given them of support from abroad." On the 17th Feb. his Majesty stated, "that his forces had obliged the Pretender to fly out of Scotland;" but he trusted, "that parliament would take such measures as might deprive our enemies at home of the power, since that alone could deprive them of the inclination, again to attempt the disturbance of his government." In consequence, in something less than two months afterwards, namely, on the 10th April 1716, the Septennial Bill was introduced, and by the 26th it passed both houses, but not without warm debates, and strong opposition, particularly in the commons.

Such were the grounds upon which this change in the law was effected; but, as the following passage from Tindal throws a little more light on the subject, the Editor begs leave to cite it.—"The rebellion was now quelled, and the strength of the rebels entirely broken, but the disaffection of the people was not yet conquered. The parliament was the bulwark of the crown; the vigour and unanimity of the king's friends, and their superiority in the house, was the support of the whole affair. But the parliament being only of three years' continuance, by virtue of the Triennial Act, made in the 6th year of King William and Queen Mary; all the hopes of the other party seemed to be centered in this, that the parliament would expire; and that they should be able, by their influence in the country, to chuse a majority of their party at the next election; or raise such a ferment at that juncture, as might make way for a successful invasion from abroad. This the persons at the helm observed with concern; and therefore resolved to baffle these hopes of the enemies of the government, by prolonging the sitting of the PRESENT parliament. It is said, it was first proposed only to suspend the Triennial Act for once, whereby this parliament would have continued three years beyond the time, at which it was to determine; but it was afterwards thought, that a bill for enlarging the time of continuance of parliaments in general, would be less liable to exceptions. The next thing that fell under consideration was, whether this intended bill should be set on foot in the house of lords, or in the house of commons? The first was judged the more proper for several reasons, particularly, because the court being more sure of a majority in the house of commons, if the bill miscarried with the lords, the odium of this project, which carried a face of unpopularity, would not rest upon the commons, nor consequently prejudice future elections."

dates from conveying electors at their expense, but it was unfortunately lost*. But then it was said, that if the duration of parliament were to be limited to three years, the power of the people would be increased in a greater degree than the power of the crown. That the power of the crown had increased, none, he believed, would deny; and he would willingly admit that the power of the people had also increased. But how had the power of the latter been augmented? It had arisen from the progress of education, a cause from which he could not apprehend the least possible danger. The people, no doubt, were more enlightened and better educated than in former times, and, in a corresponding degree, they were better subjects and men. (Hear, hear, hear.) It had been found so in the countries where education was most general—in Switzerland and in Scotland. But was it from popular principles that the only danger was apprehended? If they refused reform, might not a powerful oligarchy control the throne, and render the sovereign a mere pageant? He was not afraid of this; but as little was he afraid of the people becoming too powerful. When just chastisement was inflicted, as in a late instance for improper interference in elections, while greater offences were not even checked, and were openly avowed, it was obvious that some alteration should be introduced. At present, it was ignorance and inexperience only, which did not practise corruption in the usual parliamentary mode, that called down their vengeance. But the greatest offence that had been ever committed in elections was the septennial act. By that act the house of commons had robbed the people of their right, and it now became them to restore what they had taken away. If there had been a temporary necessity for prolonging the duration of parliament, the act ought to have been temporary. A permanent act ought not to have been passed for a temporary object. But they had wanted to strengthen the power of the crown, and they availed themselves of the alarm of the people to accomplish what they could not otherwise have done. During the last two sessions he had seen strong instances of the benefit to be expected from short parliaments. It had often been his lot to be sent into the lobby when the house divided. There he had often seen, particularly during this session, faces that were quite new to him. He had been so astonished, that he sometimes feared he had committed a mistake, and taken that side of the question which he intended to oppose. He was convinced that every member on all occasions voted conscientiously: but it did, somehow or other, so happen, that gentlemen, when they approached the period of elections, voted very differently from their usual practice. (Hear.) From these circumstances he inferred, that the most beneficial effects would result from shortening the duration of parliament; and, therefore, he concluded with moving, that leave be given to bring in the bill. (Hear, hear, hear.)

Lord Folkestone seconded the motion.

After a considerable pause, strangers were ordered to withdraw, and the gallery was almost cleared, when Sir Samuel Romilly rose and said, that the motion had his most cordial support. It was quite free from all those inconveniences supposed to be connected with a more extensive reform. It might do good, and there was no possibility of any danger from it. He would take notice of only one argument that had been often advanced against triennial parliaments: it was used by Mr. Burke: namely, that those candidates who were supported by the crown would derive an advantage over those who were independent of it. If that were true, why should a triennial act be always opposed by the ministers of the crown? In the present reign, during which prerogative had been maintained and extended beyond all precedent, (hear) there had been 11 parliaments, of which eight had been suffered to last six years; and they were then terminated only because it was thought inconvenient to let the seven years elapse, when no choice or alternative would remain as to a general election. This clearly proved that the crown could derive no advantage from frequent elections. How different were the votes of members at the commencement of a parliament from what they were as it approached its termination? In the present session let them recollect the aversion to the measure respecting country bankers; the refusal to increase the burthens of the people, and the reduction of taxes, they must see at once that the approach of a general election had great effect. (Hear.) He had stated in the last session, (See vol. i. p. 1220.) that he hoped a proposal would be soon brought forward for the repeal of the septennial act, and he felt persuaded, that if the present motion were agreed to, the nation at large would derive the most essential advantages from it.

Mr. W. Smith said, he was desirous of expressing his entire concurrence in all the observations of his hon. and learned friend, and in nearly all which had fallen from the hon. mover. There was, however, another reason, which was alone sufficient to induce him to give his support to the present motion, and that was, the opportunity it afforded of marking his disapprobation of one of the most flagitious abuses of a public trust that ever had been committed.

* On the 25th of March 1681 (32 Char. II.) the house of commons voted thanks for electing their members without charge. The order stands in these words: "It being represented to this house by several members, that many counties, cities, and boroughs, have freely, without charge, elected many of the members in this present parliament, according to the ancient constitution of elections of members to serve in parliament; wherefore this house doth give their thanks to such counties, cities, and boroughs, for the said elections."

He alluded to that act by which a house of commons, elected for three years, had prolonged its own duration to seven. He would not say that there had been no reason for such a proceeding at the time; but there had been none for continuing it after the original cause ceased to exist. He felt anxious to see so great an inroad upon public rights stigmatized by that censure which it appeared to him to deserve.

Mr. Brougham said, he did not wish to prolong the discussion of a subject which there seemed to be no disposition in the house to consider in that serious manner which its importance rendered desirable. In the few words which he should offer on this occasion, in order to declare his hearty approbation of the measure recommended by the hon. baronet, namely, a return to triennial parliaments, he should not, however, satisfy his own feelings were he not to state his dissent from some of the opinions which had been expressed both by the hon. baronet, and by the hon. member for Norwich. He could not concur with them in pronouncing censure upon the illustrious persons who proposed and procured the adoption of the septennial act, because he was fully persuaded, that by its means they had saved the country from popery and despotism. (Hear, hear.) His hon. friend had thought proper to raise a question respecting the right of parliament to prolong its own existence; but, on the same principle, he might deny its right to perform various other legislative acts, the authority of which had never been contested. What was that right but the right of the supreme government of the state to make laws for its safety and welfare? If this were over-ruled, the legislative union with Ireland was at an end, the union of England and Scotland was illegal; for in each of those cases, one legislature had surrendered its existence, and the other had altered the character of its own, by becoming an united, instead of an English or British parliament. According to the argument of his hon. friend, neither of those great measures could have been lawfully enacted, except by a dissolution of both parliaments, and a recurrence to the first principles of government: and as they were passed by an incompetent authority, could not be constitutionally binding. But he must take leave to observe, that the supreme power necessarily rested somewhere, and that it was the constant practice of the legislature to perform acts which the electors had never had in contemplation, but which they had confided a full authority to their representatives to perform, if necessary. These, he conceived, were the principles of our constitution, and having said thus much, he should only add, that the motion would have his support, because he thought that the septennial act, though wise and just when it passed, had long survived the necessity which produced it*. (Hear, hear.)

The house divided—

Ayes, 42—Noes, 117.

LIST OF THE MINORITY.

Althorp, Lord	Lemon, Sir W.
Brougham, H.	Lockhart, J. J.
Burdett, Sir F.	Langton, W. G.
Bennet, Hon. H. G.	Lefevre, C. S.
Barnett, James	Martin, John
Brand, Hon. T.	Macintosh, Sir J.
Baker, J.	Madocks, W. A.
Calcraft, John	Newport, Sir J.
Cochrane, Lord	North, Dudley
Curwen, J. C.	Ossulston, Lord
Campbell, Gen.	Proby, Hon. Capt.
Calvert, C.	Parnell, Sir H.
Dowdeswell, E.	Rowley, Sir W.
Folkestone, Visc.	Rancliffe, Lord
Fergusson, Sir R. C.	Ridley, Sir M. W.
Gaskell, B.	Romilly, Sir S.
Howorth, H.	Stanley, Lord
Heathcote, Sir G.	Smith, W.
Hornby, E.	Smith, J.

* In Coxe's Memoirs of Sir R. Walpole, vol. i. p. 76. it is stated, that Lord Somers, said to Lord Townshend, in 1716, "I have just heard of the work in which you are engaged, and congratulate you upon it; I never approved the Triennial Bill, and always considered it in effect the reverse of what it was intended to be. You have my hearty approbation in the business, and I think it will be the greatest support possible to the liberty of the country."—This statement appears so very extraordinary, that one would think there must be some mistake in it. Is it possible that Lord Somers should have said, that he never approved the triennial bill? At the Revolution, he was a principal member of the committee which drew up the Report alluded to in page 1822, and when the triennial bill, founded on the principles of that Report, was passed, he sat in the House of Lords as Keeper of the Great Seal, and voted for it. There were four noble lords who, upon the last reading of the bill, entered their protest against it, but for this reason, viz. "Because it tended to the continuance of the present parliament, longer than, as they apprehended, was agreeable to the constitution; and because of the ill consequences which, in many respects, might attend it." This protest was signed by the Lords Devonshire, Weymouth, Aylesbury, and Halifax.—If Lord Somers disapproved of the triennial act, in 1716, it could not have been on account of the effect it had already produced; because, it is true, beyond the possibility of contradiction, that, under that act, the legislature had done much greater things than had ever been done by parliaments before. That he might approve of the septennial bill, is extremely probable, from the peculiar circumstances of the country at that time; but it should be remembered, that it was originally intended to suspend the triennial act for once only, that is, until the danger which then threatened the nation had passed away. (See the note, p. 1823.) That danger has long since ceased; and therefore, no reason exists why those "frequent and new parliaments," which the Triennial Act says, "tend very much to the happy union and good agreement between king and people," should not be restored.

Sharp, R. | Tavistock, Marquis
Sefton, Earl of | Wood, Alderman
Tierney, Right Hon. G.

TELLERS.

Heron, Sir Robt. | Grant, J. P.

ALIEN BILL.] Lord Castlereagh moved the order of the day for going into a committee on this bill. On the question that Mr. Speaker do leave the chair,

Mr. Bennet expressed his surprise, that none of his Majesty's ministers, nor any of the law officers of the crown, had offered any defence of this measure when its principle was under consideration on the second reading, and especially after the three able speeches which had been made in opposition to it. The only document produced in its justification was one which shewed that five or six persons who were suspected had not been sent out of the country; but what did this prove as to the number of foreigners whom it prevented from entering the country? It appeared, during the disgraceful scenes which took place some years ago at Cadiz, that no foreigner would be permitted to land here without a passport from his own government. If such were the rule, how could any person, unless under extraordinary circumstances, be expected to visit our shores? The practice of foreigners was, he believed, to write first, to ascertain, if possible, whether, if they came, they would be permitted to remain. Did his Majesty's ministers decide upon the character of foreigners on information received abroad, or at home, from foreign or from domestic spies? He feared it was chiefly on the representation of foreign ministers residing at our court, and he should like to be present at one of the consultations of this board of inspectors. Did the final judgment depend on the noble lord, or the noble secretary for the home department? If on the latter, he was sorry to say that he could feel no respect for his decision, considering him to be, as he did, and he hoped it was a parliamentary word, the greatest dupe that had ever belonged to any administration. If the noble lord should be dissatisfied with such an expression, he could only consent to exchange it for one of a much harsher nature. How could he regard in any other light a minister who had gravely affirmed that such a person as Oliver was "a much injured individual?" (Hear, hear.) Might not the dupe of Oliver be equally betrayed by other informers? He could easily conceive a foreign minister, on some such occasion—to use the figure of the poet—sitting, toad-like, beside our ministers, and instilling into their ears the venom of legitimacy, thus corrupting all those generous maxims which used to distinguish our national character, on pretence of the mighty danger arising from the residence of a handful of foreigners. No circumstances could be more different than the present, and those which existed in 1793, when the measure was originally adopted. Was it apprehended that, if foreigners had free access to this country, we should see delegates from France or Germany haranguing, in broken English, the populace in Spa-fields? In every point of view this measure appeared to him most discreditable to the national character. Previous to the French revolution there existed a variety of little independent states surrounding France, in whose hospitable bosom the victims of persecution were sure to find a safe asylum. In Great Britain and in Holland the same welcome reception was afforded, and men the most renowned for literary talents, a Bayle, an Erasmus, a Voltaire, had found a refuge within the territories of the governments which cultivated this generous policy. If every one of these states on the continent had been goaded or induced by the great military powers to abandon these principles, and act on a new system of exclusion, what necessity was there for England to imitate the same example, or degrade herself to their level? He feared, however, that at the congress of Vienna—that congress so mighty in promise, and so contemptible in performance—that congress, whose declared object was the restoration of public freedom, but which had subverted all national independence—a solemn pact and covenant was entered into, from which ministers knew not how to depart, and which constituted the only foundation of this measure. Upon these grounds he protested against it, as unwise, tyrannical, and derogatory from the character of the country.

Mr. Ellison observed, that not a single case of any abuse of the powers granted by the former act had been alleged. Nothing was urged but what the imaginations of hon. members suggested for the purpose of aspersing his Majesty's ministers. It was since the enactment of an alien bill that our humanity to foreigners had been most conspicuously displayed. He had little knowledge of the noble secretary for foreign affairs, but he thought him entitled to public gratitude for his great services. No solid argument had been brought forward against the bill, whilst it appeared to him to be a sufficient reason for it, that it would exclude from this country the outcasts of every other.

Mr. Bathurst contended, that no new considerations had been urged on the former debate, which called for any additional argument from those who supported the continuance of this measure. That was the only cause of the silence observed on his side of the house. As the hon. gentleman who spoke last but one, had introduced one or two topics which had not been before dwelt upon, there was no indisposition on the part of ministers to enter farther into the discussion. He thought the circumstance of there being no place of refuge for emigrant foreigners in other countries, was a reason rather for passing this bill than against it. It was not pointed against the admission of the peaceful artizan, or of persons persecuted for their religious opinions,—the description which applied to the ancestors of those hon. members who had done themselves so much credit by the feelings which that recollection inspired. The house must be aware that it was against persons of a very different character that the precautions of this measure were provided. He contended, that the execution of the act had been universally confined to protect the safety of this country, and that it had never been put in force on the representation of any foreign government. The person who had been alluded to as having been sent out of this country under the provisions of this statute, came to England in the year 1807. He was then a dealer in pictures. In 1811, he applied for a passport to go abroad, when he was told that, if he went, he must not return during the war. He thought proper, however, to return; and from information that was afterwards received respecting his conduct, he was ordered to leave the kingdom. The fact was, that he first of all returned, and while he was here, from 1812 to 1813, information was given by different persons, representing him to be engaged in improper objects. He was accordingly removed from the country in 1814, on the most satisfactory evidence that he could not be permitted to remain. It would not be proper for him to mention the specific grounds on which that person was sent away; but he would state, that a paper was found in his baggage which completely established the necessity of sending him out of the country. Upon the whole, he felt confident that the house would agree in the policy of continuing this act, until the spirit of the French revolution had evaporated—until this country could be rendered secure against the designs of a disaffected and dangerous class of persons, who were continually plotting the overthrow of all governments, and the subversion of all order in society, and who thought it most convenient to repair to this country, violating its laws, and abusing its hospitality, until their plans were matured and ready to be put into execution. Men of sound principles and of peaceable habits would have nothing to dread from the existence of these powers in the hands of his Majesty's ministers; but it would deter bad men from coming to this country, when they knew that they would not be suffered to remain in it.

Mr. Lyttelton said, that if the right hon. gentleman did not think proper to state the specific grounds on which the person in question had been sent away, he had at least admitted that the ground on which he was removed did not consist in that correspondence which was found in his baggage. The foreigner said, that he underwent the most strict examination, and that nothing was discovered to render him liable to suspicion. He had not had the means of verifying those assertions, and now he had only to set against them the statement of the right hon. gentleman. To that statement he was sincerely disposed to give every degree of credit; but, at the same time, he must add, that he thought the proceedings in the case of Mr. Befort tended to illustrate the vicious consequences of bills of this nature. He had been sent out of this land of freedom—this asylum, as it once had been, for the persecuted of all other countries—without any satisfactory account being given to the public: he had had only six days allowed him for packing up his goods, relinquishing his interests, and leaving the country. The right hon. gentleman had said, that no person would be sent out of this country except for plots against the state; but, on a former night, the hon. gentleman (Mr. C. Grant) had declared, that there was something in the affairs of Europe which rendered it necessary that we should keep our eyes on foreigners, lest men who should meditate a revolution in France should find an asylum here to carry on their plots. As far as the fact went of half a dozen persons being sent out of the country, this measure would not bear the smallest test; but, on the other hand, it shewed the intolerant spirit of the British ministers. Let the house bear in mind, not only the number of men who might be sent out of the country, but the number of those who might be intimidated while they remained. The total number of foreigners who were here engaged in honest and industrious habits, beneficial not only to themselves, but to the public in general, was, he believed, not less than 20,000. Let the house, then, consider the alarm and terror with which that large body of persons must be continually agitated by this odious measure. (Hear.) It was, in itself, not only a despotic power, unworthy of the time in which we lived, and hostile to the spirit of liberty, more particularly to the liberties of this free country, but a power into which no inquiry had been instituted, and into which, in the present temper of the house, no inquiry was likely to be instituted. (Hear, hear.)

Sir Samuel Romilly remarked, that there had been nothing stated in support of this bill, except what the house had this night heard from a right hon. gentleman opposite, and the observations on a former night of a lord of the treasury, in which there was much more of eloquence than of convincing argument and reasoning. He was not surprised at the course which his Majesty's ministers had thought proper to adopt on this occasion: they knew that their strength consisted, not in speaking, but in voting. He hoped the house, however, would consider, that those on his side who resisted this measure, were speaking on the behalf, and for the protection of persons who had no representatives in that house. (Hear, hear.) There were two classes of persons to be affected by this bill: one class was, the foreigners who might seek an asylum in this country, the other, the foreigners who had settled amongst us, and had become a part of ourselves. As far as it related to foreigners who might come to reside in this country, it was to be considered on far different grounds than as it related to foreigners who had long domiciled here. In all that had been said on this subject by the other side, it was manifest, that the executive government could act only on the suggestion of foreign powers, in preventing individuals from coming here; for whether they came from France, from the Netherlands, or from other places, how could they guard themselves against such persons, but by listening to the representations of foreign ministers? So that a person who was endeavouring to shelter himself here from religious or political persecution, from the terrors of the holy inquisition, the tyranny of the King of Sardinia, or the despotism of some other government that we had established on the ruins of the free and independent states of Europe, must be deprived of an asylum, on the statements made to this government by their own persecutors and enemies. In all these cases ministers would act implicitly on those representations; and, under that influence, the unhappy victims of despotism and oppression would be driven back from our shores. (Hear, hear.) The hon. gentleman had said, that this measure was intended only as a prevention against dangerous persons; but by this he meant, as it appeared, persons who had worshipped the goddess of Reason at one time, and afterwards worshipped Napoleon Buonaparté. It was originally stated, that this bill was to continue in force for two years only; but the right hon. gentleman had that night said, that it was to continue till the principles of the French revolution had evaporated—till the whole race of Buonaparté was extinct—till all those persons had expired who were supposed to entertain any friendly disposition to that family. It was said, that it was a measure directed only against bad men. He admitted, that if his Majesty's ministers were to know the real state of the case, they would not put it in force against good men; but the evil was, that they proceeded on secret informations. (Hear.) When a person was brought before them, the same course was pursued as before the grand inquisitor. In Spain, he was asked, without knowing any thing of the specific charges against him, whether there was nothing which he had said against the orthodox principles of the Catholic religion, and the man was left to ponder in his mind what he could have said. So, in this country, after this bill should be passed, the unfortunate individual would be asked, had he said nothing against the doctrine of legitimate governments—had he mentioned nothing against the family on the throne? Did any one really suppose that the unfortunate foreigners who might seek an asylum in this country could be safe under the exercise of such powers? Did any one believe that if the ministers of Charles II. and James II. had been invested with similar authority, those monarchs would have had their eyes offended by the crowd of Protestants who fled to this country for protection? No; if the same powers had existed in those times, the persecuted Protestants would not have ventured to seek an asylum in England; but they came hither because they relied on what they knew to be the constitution of this country; (hear, hear;) they relied on the character, the hospitality, the public law of the country. It had been said, that more protection had been shewn to foreigners during the last five and twenty years, than at any former period whatever. This, he would boldly affirm, was a false statement of history. (Hear, hear.) It was utterly false to say, that more protection had been shewn to persecuted individuals in the last 25 years, than during the reigns of James I. and Charles I., Charles II. and James II. (Hear, hear.) The right hon. gentleman had said, that the paper alluded to in the case of Mr. Befort was found among his baggage, just as he was about to be sent out of the country. Now it might not be difficult to explain how it came there.

Mr. Bathurst begged to explain. He believed the fact was, that the custom-house officers thought it their duty to examine the articles which the individual in question wished to take with him, and, in doing so, they discovered that paper.

Sir Samuel Romilly thanked the right hon. gentleman for this explanation. It seemed, then, that the paper was not sought for, but merely discovered in searching the baggage, and certainly it would not be fit to say much against the delicacy of custom-house officers. (A laugh.) In the case of Las Casas, the papers were never examined: in the case of De Berenger, they were made use of to convict him of a misdemeanour, but they were most illegally made use of. He conceived that this measure, as far as it related to foreigners who might seek to reside here, was calculated merely to carry into execution the tyrannical intentions of foreign powers, and that we were the ready agents, the willing slaves, of those despotic governments. As far as related to those foreigners who had long domiciled here, that large description of persons who had been engaged in active and honest pursuits, of what crime had they been convicted that they should be put out of the protection of the law? Were any of them to be driven from this country because ministers might be told on secret information that they were Buonapartists in their heart—that they wished to overthrow the dynasty of the Bourbons? He begged to recal to the recollection of the house the sound principles laid down in the speech of an hon. gentleman (Mr. F. Douglas) on a former night; a speech, indeed, which had remained unanswered—a speech which the noble lord opposite had deemed unworthy of reply—but a speech which he (Sir S. Romilly) considered to be one of the most able and effective speeches that had ever been heard within the walls of that house. It was said, that if these powers were to be granted, they could not be in better hands than in those of the noble secretary of state for the home department. He (Sir Samuel) was against tyranny in any hands. It was not his business to pay compliments to any man, and therefore he said, that he thought these powers in very bad hands. (Hear.) He respected the private character of that noble lord, he was ready to acknowledge his integrity and worth as a private individual; but the noble lord now stood before them as a public man, and in that character he could not give him any approbation. He had never seen in him any regard for liberty; he had never witnessed in that noble lord any veneration or respect for the good, sound, principles of our recorded constitution. When he considered the manner in which the noble lord had suspended the habeas corpus act; when he reflected on his refusal to hear the petitions of the unfortunate persons who had been imprisoned under that suspension; when he remembered, that, after all, he had sought to cover the acts of himself and his colleagues by a bill of indemnity, founded on the report of a secret committee named by themselves, and furnished only with such evidence as they chose to adduce, there was no man in whose hands he should be more unwilling to intrust the exercise of the powers of the alien bill. (Hear.) Let the house, too, remember, that his Majesty's ministers had on all occasions refused an inquiry into the manner in which those powers had been exercised.—This was a most fatal blow to the character of this country; and he could not but reflect, that when we should have lost all our liberties, we should not even have the compassion of any nation in the world, because it would be said, that a people who were so regardless of the liberties of others did not deserve to enjoy their own. (Loud cheering.)

Mr. Serjeant Copley considered the subject as divided into two questions—the policy of the measure, and its foundation upon the law of the country. If the bill were not to be passed, a door would be opened to all persons who might be exiled from the continent—there would be an influx into this country of men who were known for the political criminality as well as the practical infamy of their conduct; who had been brought up in all the principles of the French revolution, and who would not fail to disseminate their pernicious doctrines among the people of England. He was not one of those hazardous politicians who would give their consent to put such a calamity to the trial. He was not willing to make the experiment as to what quantity of poison we could inhale without endangering the stability of our constitution. He would not agree to allow this country to become the seat of intrigue, which might destroy other governments, and finally bring destruction on our own. Much had been said of connexion with other nations in the enactment of this measure; but who would say that this country was not dependent for security on the systems and arrangements of other states? It had been said, however, that all their fears were chimerical, that all their apprehensions were absurd in the extreme. In 1816, the other side of the house had held the same language. But they knew what had happened since that period. In 1793, similar arguments had been used; but the legislature, by not adopting them, had saved the country from all those horrors into which it would otherwise have been plunged, as a neighbouring country had been. It had been said by the other side, that this measure would be a departure from the ancient principles of the constitution. The gentlemen opposite had urged, that if the crown formerly possessed the power of arresting foreigners, and of sending them out of the country, instances of the exercise of that power would be found. If such power existed, James II. it was argued, would have availed himself of it on the revocation of the edict of Nantz, in order to prevent the persecuted Protestants from landing on our shores. But it was the good policy of that monarch not to do so, though the power was vested in him; any argument on that point could not, therefore, avail. In the time of Henry IV. a proclamation was issued to the keepers of the passage, as they were called, commanding them not to allow the landing of aliens in this country, until examined. A similar power was exercised in the reign of Elizabeth; it was exercised by that sovereign in 1571, at the time of Norfolk's conspiracy, and again in 1574 and 1575. These were matters of fact, proved against assertion on the other side of the house. Aliens were liable to be sent home, whenever the king saw occasion; (hear, hear, from Sir S. Romilly;) but, at all events, the power of sending them home was vested in the legislature. (Hear, hear.) The alien bill was not introduced for the purpose of vesting the crown with any new authority. If safe conduct were required—if license of residence were demanded—it belonged to the crown to grant it. By analogy, then, the power of sending aliens out of the country ought to be vested in the same hands. This bill, he contended, merely went to regulate a power already possessed; it enabled the king to carry into effect with greater speed what he might do without it, by the mode of indictment, and by a more circuitous system which it was advisable to avoid. The king had the power of sending away aliens before, but it was of necessity to be by indictment. He could not but consider the bill necessary for a limited period. He was not satisfied with the arguments against it, unless, indeed, they ought to open the door to every man who might choose to enter the country for the purpose of carrying on any designs of his own, either with a view of impairing our own security, or of throwing other nations into disorder, and through them of endangering ourselves.

Sir J. Macintosh said, he must enter his most solemn protest against the principles and doctrines promulgated by the hon. and learned gentleman who had just sat down. Those who opposed the bill did not wish to deprive the crown of any of its ancient prerogatives, but those who supported it, wished to extend them —an extension that was not called for by the circumstances of the times. The hon. and learned gentleman, in speaking of the legal propriety of the measure, had adduced something that had been done 400 years ago; the period when the monarch assumed the right of pressing men for the army, when villainage existed, and the writ de hæretico comburendo was introduced*. (Hear, hear.) Such was the argument which the hon. and learned gentleman had, in the nineteenth century, adduced to the house of commons. (Hear.) The next precedent which the hon. and learned gentleman had adduced†, was that of Elizabeth, in 1571. But it should be recollected, that Scotland was at that time divided on the disputes between Mary and her son James; and foreigners were sent out of the country, because they were supposed to be friendly to Mary, whom they considered the lawful queen of this country‡. (Hear, hear.) The hon. and learned gentleman had then said, that James II. acted merely from good policy; but it should rather be said, that he acted according to the law of nations§. He denied that the power of the crown to banish aliens by proclamation, was legal; and the best proof that it was not so was, that no one had been prosecuted for disobeying it. The hon. and learned gentleman had said, that a power existed in the supreme authority of the state to banish aliens. Yes; and it would have been equally true, if he had said, that a power existed in the supreme authority to banish natives. By the law of the land, no man could be exiled or banished, except by authority of parliament, or, in case of abjuration of felony, by the common law; neither could aliens be sent out of the country without the authority of the legislature. The power sometimes assumed by the monarch of issuing proclamations having the force of laws had been repeatedly called in question. Every body recollected that Lord Mansfield, when a proclamation was issued by the crown forbidding the exportation of grain, called the period during which that proclamation existed, "a forty days' tyranny." On that occasion he exhibited the single instance in his life in which he was the friend of liberal and constitutional principles, while, on the other hand, Lord Chatham exhibited the single instance in which he was their enemy||. The hon. and learned gentleman had made se-

* The act for putting heretics to death (2 Hen. IV. c. 15.) was passed in order to suppress the Reformers, or the followers of Wickliffe's doctrines; and Prynne observes, "that this was the first statute and butcherly knife that the impeaching prelates procured or had against the poor preachers of Christ's gospel." The writ de hæretico comburendo was executed down to the year 1610; two Anabaptists suffered under it in the 17th of Eliz. and two Arians in the 9th of Jam. I. It was not totally abolished till the latter end of the reign of Char. II., when our lands were delivered from the slavery of military tenures, and our bodies from arbitrary imprisonment by the habeas corpus act.

† With respect to the precedent of Hen. IV., it should be remembered, that the reign of that monarch was bloody and tumultuous. At that time, several places in France were under the dominion of the crown of England, and the French not only invaded some of them, but actually made a descent upon the Isle of Wight. It was necessary, therefore, that the passages by sea should be carefully watched, in order that no foreigners, except the king's subjects, should be permitted to land. But, in time of peace, the king had no power to prohibit foreigners from coming to, and tarrying in England: the prohibition, in that case, should have been made by parliament, as appears by the note, p. 1786 ante. A precedent, contrary to the genius of the constitution, is entitled to no authority in the eyes of the legislature.

‡ In regard to the precedent of 1571, it is worthy of remark, that in that very year, Pius V. had thundered out all the anathemas of the Vatican against Elizabeth, and published a bull of excommunication against her, which was fixed on the palace gates of the bishop of London. He also stirred up rebellions in the north, and in Ireland, against her; and, in 1574 and 1575, he sent over great numbers of Jesuits and Popish priests to excite the nation to revolt.—In 1567, Elizabeth commanded the bishop of London to take a survey of all the strangers within the cities of London and Westminster. By his report, which is very minute, it appears that the whole number of Scots, at that time, was only Fifty-eight. (See Haynes, 455.) A survey of the same kind was made by Sir Thomas Row, lord mayor, in 1568. The number of Scots had then increased to Eighty-eight. (Strype, 4.) On the accession of James, a considerable number of Scots, especially of the higher rank, resorted to England; but it was not until after the Union that the intercourse between the two kingdoms became great.

§ With great submission, it may be observed, that James was bound to admit those persecuted Protestants, not only by the law of nations, but also by the law of God. "Thou shalt not deliver unto his master the servant which is escaped from his master unto thee. He shall dwell with thee, even among you, in that place which he shall choose in one of thy gates, (or cities) which it liketh him best: thou shalt not oppress him." Deut. ch. xxiii. vv. 15, 16.

In the 34th year of her reign, (anno 1591) Elizabeth demanded of Hen. IV. of France, Morgan and others, who had committed treason against her. The answer of the French king to the queen's ambassador was, No; all countries are open to fugitives: Elizabeth herself knows this—she received the Prince of Conde and others who fled from France. (See Camden, Eliz. p. 355.)

|| Lord Mansfield more than once contended, that the ancient constitution of this country was as absolute as that of Spain, and that the limitations upon the power and authority of the crown recognized at the Revolution, were not, as the Bill of Rights asserts, a vindication and assertion "of the true, ancient, and indubitable rights and liberties of the people," or, as the Act of Settlement (12 and 13 William, c. 2.) terms it, a restoration of the subjects to veral allusions to the consistency of that side of the house, (hear, hear,) and had accused them of holding the same principles in 1793. If such were the fact, it was no wonder that they should persist in that kind of criminality to the end. But it was not the fact, for there was scarcely one gentleman present who had been in the house at the time when the alien bill was discussed in 1793. At the same time he could assure the hon. and learned gentleman, that he, for one, should never be ashamed to adopt the principles, or revere the memory, of those who opposed the alien bill at that time. Whatever posterity might think of the various events of that period, and of the present day, he was sure they would not say that too much had been done in the way of resistance to the power of the crown—that the prerogative of the crown was too small, or that it had been weakened by what had passed in the course of the last 25 years. He was perfectly at a loss to know to what events the hon. and learned gentleman alluded, as having occurred since 1816, and as having falsified the predictions of those who opposed the bill of that day? What danger or alarm had since arisen from aliens? What had occurred to induce us again to suspend that asylum which ought always to exist interchangeably among the nations of Europe for a vanquished political party? He could not conceive a more dangerous principle than that set up as a ground for this bill. In future, before we received foreigners, we must examine into their moral character and conduct. The consequence would be, that when we received exiles from a foreign country, we should, in the approbation of their morality, involve a condemnation of their own government. Mr. Gibbon had said, that there was no principle so good as that of preserving an asylum in all the states of Europe for political offenders, who were, as he had before observed, generally vanquished parties. He could not help remarking, that there appeared a kind of indifference in that house to the fate of men who were without protection, and to whom the measure in discussion might be of great importance. The question seemed to be met with that kind of apathy which was not unusual when questions of justice and liberty came before them. Against what was this bill intended to act? He could find nothing, unless it were against three newspapers and 38 individuals. (Hear.) He remembered that the Earl of Liverpool, when asked by general Andreossi or Count Otto, he did not exactly recollect which, to banish Mr. Peltier, replied, that the British government had no such power. The Earl of Liverpool had shewn himself proud of his country, when he declared the inability of the government to put such a plan into execution. But what could be said, if, at some future period, some horrible tyrant on the continent should require us to give up the individuals who had sought an asylum among us from his barbarity? It might be the interest of England to keep at peace with such a personage, and yet how could they answer him? Would he not urge that, in 1818, an alien bill was passed to exclude three newspapers and 38 exiles? (Hear, hear.) Suppose that, in South America, the reign of imbecile and superstitious tyranny should be restored, which he by no means wished to be the case, and many of the leading persons engaged in the struggle in that country should take refuge in England; might not Spain say, that we shewed a spirit of animosity against her, if we refused to pass an alien bill for the expulsion of those individuals? What, if the leaders of the first Cortes should escape from those dungeons in which they had been confined for the last two years, and fly to this country; would not Spain consider England as her enemy if she refused to surrender those excellent persons to the imprisonment which they had eluded? It was extraordinary to reflect, that, in the year 1811, the Cortes was recognized by Russia as the constitutional government of Spain; and that, if the members of that body were to escape from their dungeons, they would obtain that asylum in Russia, which England, in order to avoid a quarrel with Spain, might refuse to give them. Thus it appeared, that Muscovy was at the head of liberality and justice, and England at that of prejudice and intolerance.—The hon. and learned gentleman concluded by declaring his principles to be in decided opposition to the bill.

The Attorney-General contended, that, by the common law, the king possessed the power of sending individuals out of the country by proclamation. He wondered to hear this principle disputed, as even magna charta recognized the right of the king over aliens, by enacting that alien merchants might reside in the kingdom without molestation, nisi antea prohibiti fuerint, a phrase which plainly implied that they might be prevented from entering the kingdom, the full and free possession and enjoyment of their religion, rights, and liberties," but innovations on the ancient constitution, in favour of the people. (See his Speech, 3d June, 1782, in the 8th vol. of Debrett's Parl. Reg. p. 334.) Blackstone, however, who was by no means disposed to lessen the power of the crown, honestly says, that "the Bill of Rights was only declaratory of the old constitutional laws." (4 Comm. p. 378.)

Lord Mansfield was certainly a great lawyer, but, if he had continued to sit a few years longer in Westminster Hall, he would have gone far to convert the court of King's Bench, from a court of common law, into a court of equity. Lord Redesdale has very truly observed, that "he (Lord Mansfield) had on his mind prejudices derived from his familiarity with the laws of Scotland, where law and equity are administered in the same courts, and where the distinction between them which subsists with us is not known, and there are many things in his decisions which shew that his mind had received a tinge on that subject not quite consistent with the constitution of England and Ireland in the administration of justice." (Shannon and Bradstreet, 1 Scho. and Lefroy, p. 66.)

or ordered out of it by royal authority. (See the note, p. 1786.) When subjects left the kingdom, it belonged to the sovereign to call them back by proclamation; and, by analogy, the same power extended over foreigners to order them away. The king had no power in the latter case to take up aliens, and send them away—a power which was proposed to be given by this bill. He was obliged to follow the more circuitous plan of issuing a proclamation, and if it were not obeyed, to prosecute the persons who neglected it, for disobedience. The hon. gentlemen who opposed this bill had misrepresented its nature, by calling it an act directed against foreigners, and intended to render their residence here less secure; it enacted nothing against aliens; it conferred nothing on the crown but the proper exercise of its acknowledged prerogative. The question was, therefore, reduced to one of expediency; and he would ask, would it be safe, would it be politic, after the events of the last 25 years, to return immediately to the state of law on this subject which existed before 1793? The house had heard much from an hon. and learned gentleman on the debates which took place when the alien bill of that period was discussed; but, in opposition to the tendency of his argument, he would say, that the opponents of the measure at that time did not, like its opponents now, deny the king's right by proclamation to order foreigners to depart the realm. The same line of reasoning was then followed as on the present occasion with regard to the expediency or the policy of the bill, but all concurred in the principle of the royal prerogative on which it was founded. Those even who had then opposed the act on the only proper ground—its expediency and necessity—he was sure, on an impartial view of subsequent events, would now acknowledge that, however inconsistent it had appeared with their views or principles at the time, it had afterwards proved itself to be one of the wisest and most beneficial acts which had ever passed the legislature, by saving us from those revolutionary horrors to which other nations had been subject. The powers then granted had been exercised with impartiality, and had not, as had been stated by an hon. and learned gentleman on a former night, been directed more against one class of Frenchmen than another. The bill now before the house would be used with the same impartiality, as it was justified on the same grounds of expediency. It violated no principle of law, of hospitality, or of humanity. It could not be viewed with an hostile eye by foreigners as any injury to their rights. It was merely intended for self-protection; and if it were not passed, our character would not be raised, while our humanity might be despised and our policy derided by foreigners.

The question being put, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair," the house divided:

Ayes, 99;—Noes, 32.

LIST OF THE MINORITY.

Barham, J. F.	Langton, W. G.
Barnett, James	Leader, Wm.
Burroughs, Sir W.	Lemon, Sir W.
Byng, G.	Macintosh, Sir J.
Campbell, Gen.	Newport, Sir J.
Carter, John	Philips, G.
Caulfield, Hon. H.	Rancliff, Lord
Duncannon, Visc.	Ridley, Sir M. W.
Douglas, Hon. F. S.	Romilly, Sir. S.
Fazakerley, N.	Sharp, R.
Folkestone, Visc.	Smith, John
Fergusson, Sir R. C.	Tavistock, Marquis
Grant, J. P.	Wilson, Thomas
Gordon, R.	Wood, Alderman
Hamilton, Lord A.
Howorth, W.	TELLERS.
Heron, Sir R.	Bennet, Hon. H. G.
Jervoise, G. P.	Lyttelton, Hon. W.

The house then went into a committee, when Mr. Barham moved, that the blank respecting the duration of the bill be filled up with one year instead of two.

The committee divided:

For two years, 90
Against it, 24

The house then resumed, and it was ordered that the report should be received to-morrow.

FEVER HOSPITALS (IRELAND) BILL.] Sir J. Newport brought in a bill "to establish Fever Hospitals, and to make other regulations for the relief of the suffering poor, and for preventing the increase of contagious Fevers in Ireland."—It was read a first time.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF PARTNERSHIPS (IRELAND) BILL.] This bill was read a second time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, May 20.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR BILL.] This bill was brought from the Commons, and read a first time.

REWARDS ON CONVICTION BILL.] This bill was brought from the Commons, and read a first time.

BUILDING OF CHURCHES BILL.] On the motion of the Earl of Liverpool, the house resolved itself into a committee on this bill. On the first clause being read,

Lord Holland rose, and observed, that when he stated his objections to a grant of the public money, under the present circumstances of the country, for the purpose of this bill, he had intimated his opinion that the funds required for carrying the bill into effect ought to be supplied by the church itself. When he stated this, he was not aware that, in the present reign, and in his own time, a precedent for the practice he recommended had been established. There was, however, an act of the 37th Geo. III. by which the emoluments of two prebends of Lichfield were sequestered for the purpose of repairing the cathedral. Now, though the act to which he alluded might be regarded as a private act, he saw no reason why the principle should not be adopted in the present measure, and applied to the benefit of the public.

The Archbishop of Canterbury said, that the measure to which the noble lord had referred was resorted to for the advantage of the individual church from which the sequestration of the prebends had been made. This was a very different case from a measure which had in view the supplying of a general deficiency of churches by building new ones.

The Earl of Liverpool thought it must be evident, that a measure of the kind proposed by the noble earl would produce a mere mite in the expense required for the measure now under consideration. The precedent he recommended could not be adopted to an extent which would be in any way useful, without its operating to injure the interests of the church.

Lord Grenville could not admit the propriety of the precedent referred to by his noble friend. Whatever fairness there might be in the sequestration of prebends for the repair of a church, it did not apply to the building of new churches. It was besides objectionable on account of the great extent to which the principle must be carried to render it useful; for the object of the bill could not be accomplished without a sacrifice of a more serious nature than that which would be occasioned by the grant in this bill.

Lord Holland said, he was aware that the precedent which he had quoted did not exactly apply; but when the country was called upon, under the pressure of so many difficulties, to make so large a sacrifice as that required, he was of opinion, that a church so richly endowed as the church of England was, ought to be expected to supply from its own bosom some of the means to carry the bill into effect. He acknowledged the justice of the distinction pointed out by his noble friend, but there was notwithstanding some analogy between the case which he had mentioned, and the object of the present bill. At any rate, the sequestration of those prebends was a complete answer to the assertion that the whole church establishment was not more than the good of the country required. If that were the case, how could this sequestration have been agreed to in 1796?

On the clause being read which directed, that the churches and chapels to be built under this act, should be constructed so as to hold the largest number of persons, at the least possible expense,

Lord Grenville expressed his hope, that this clause would not be so understood by the commissioners as to lead to the construction of places improper for the celebration of worship according to the church of England. He wished for no extravagance or superfluity, but that decent ornament which was suited to the object for which the buildings were destined. The clause might be interpreted to warrant the erection of barns rather than churches, and he thought some explanation necessary to guard against such a consequence.

The Earl of Liverpool agreed with the noble lord in the view he had taken of the subject. The commissioners who were to carry the act into effect would be accountable to parliament, to which their proceedings would be annually reported; and it would doubtless be expected of them, that the churches should be constructed in a way which should be characteristic of the established religion of the country.

Lord Holland said, he was far from being an enemy to ornamental architecture. He thought it might be displayed in churches as well as in other public edifices; but, under the particular circumstances of this bill, he should object to any superfluity which might create an occasion for calling for further sacrifices from the public. It was a principle, that acts of parliament should be interpreted by the fair construction of the words they contained, and not by any inferences of what had been the intention of those who passed them: and he confessed that, for his part, he liked the literal meaning of the words of the present clause much better than the explanation of them which the two noble lords had attempted to give. Such explanations might afford the commissioners a pretext for extravagant expenditure, on the ground that they had followed what they understood to be the intention of the legislature. Besides, their lordships stood in a particular situation with respect to a bill of this kind. How did they know but that the other house had worded the clause in the manner in which it stood, precisely for the purpose of preventing its being understood in the sense which the explanations of the noble lord would give it?

The Earl of Harrowby observed, that parliament would have the opportunity of controlling the proceedings of the commissioners, and checking either too great economy on the one hand, or profusion on the other.

The Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of Landaff severally observed, that the churches should be such as became the established religion of the country.

The bill then went through the committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, May 20.

CONTAGIOUS FEVER IN LONDON COMMITTEE.] Mr. Bennet, in presenting the report of this committee, stated, that during the last year, the cases of fever in the metropolis had increased to nearly seven times their former number. There was only one hospital for the reception of fever patients solely; it was instituted in 1802, and had grown to be a considerable establishment, but still it was by no means equal to the wants of the metropolis.—The committee, therefore, recommended that government should grant a sum of 2000*l.* in addition to the sum of 1000*l.* which they had already given, in order to extend the accommodations of the hospital.—The hon. member then moved that the Report be printed which was ordered.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR BILL.] Mr. Brougham moved the third reading of this bill. He observed, that it went only to inquiry and report; but he intended, after inquiry had been gone into, to ground farther proceedings upon it, without waiting for the whole of the reports of the commission. As soon as the first report was made, which would be in six months, if he should not enter on any general measure respecting the planting of schools or otherwise, he should at any rate ground on that report such remedial measures as might appear necessary. It would be a very feeble remedy for so great an evil to send all these abuses to a court of equity. (Hear, hear.)

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.] Lord A. Hamilton pursuant to notice, moved, that Thomas Ferguson be brought to the bar of the house, for the purpose of being discharged.

Thomas Ferguson was accordingly brought to the bar, where he received the following Reprimand from Mr. Speaker:

Thomas Ferguson: This house having received the report from the committee of privileges, respecting a letter written by you to a voter of the county of Lanark, to influence his vote in the election of a member to serve in parliament, did resolve, that in writing and sending such letter you were guilty of a corrupt attempt to subvert the freedom and independence of election, and a high breach of the privileges of this house; and for that offence you were committed to his Majesty's gaol of Newgate. Your petition has since been received; and in consideration of your full and entire acknowledgement of your offence, and of the contrition you have expressed for it, and trusting that what you have already suffered will operate both as a warning to yourself and an example to others; this house is disposed to extend to you its lenity as far as is consistent with its justice; and now to relieve you from further imprisonment: I am to acquaint you, you are discharged, upon payment of your fees.

Ordered, nem. con., that what has been now said by Mr. Speaker in reprimanding the said Thomas Ferguson, be entered on the journals of this house.

STATUTE LAW OF SCOTLAND.] Sir J. Newport moved, "That the lords of session, the judges of the court of justiciary, and barons of the exchequer of Scotland, be directed to cause to be made out and presented to the House of Commons within six weeks after the commencement of the ensuing session of parliament, a Statement of such parts of the statute law of Scotland, or of the United Kingdom, as the courts of justice of Scotland have declared or considered to be in desuetude, and no longer binding on the people of that part of the United Kingdom; together with a statement of the authorities on which they have grounded such decisions."

Mr. Bathurst thought that, as part of the statutes of Scotland had been declared to be in desuetude, a bill should be introduced to remedy the evil, without calling for the statement mentioned in the motion. At any rate, he conceived that the words "or considered," should be omitted.

Mr. Abercromby said, it was a most important question, whether courts should continue a practice by which they could silently subvert the laws of parliament, and that the judges should consider whether laws were or were not in desuetude, and no longer binding. This matter was fit for parliamentary consideration. As to bringing in a bill upon it, he must say, he thought it essential to have, first, the necessary returns, in order to know what laws had, and what had not, been considered as having fallen into desuetude. With that knowledge, the house would be competent to found some proceedings. It was quite a parliamentary usage to resort to the judges for information which they were the best enabled to afford. As to the words "or considered," he thought they should remain in the motion, as meaning that the judges were called upon to consider and state what laws they had declared in desuetude, and the principles on which they so held them. It appeared right, for the sake both of the judges and of the house, that the principles which governed the courts should be stated.

Mr. W. Dundas opposed the motion. He observed, that part of the information required was desirable, but it might be obtained without imposing the burthen on the court of session.

Lord A. Hamilton said, it was worthy of the serious consideration of parliament how far a court of justice should be suffered to set aside the written law by its mere arbitrary authority. It seemed extraordinary that judges should decide, as cases happened to arise, whether acts of parliament were in force or not. In a late case, the burgesses of Aberdeen clearly shewed that they had a right, by acts of parliament, to elect their magistrates. But the counsel on the other side argued, and the judges were of opinion, that long-continued usage had thrown those acts into desuetude. It was usage versus acts of parliament, and usage carried the day. At the same time, it would not be right to pass an act to declare all acts not repealed to be still in force; for decisions founded on the desuetude of several acts would, in that case, be unsettled. But inquiry was necessary, and some suitable remedy was much called for. In England, the old law of appeal of murder had lately occupied much attention. The judges had declared, that the trial by battle was the law of the land. There was no one who heard him who did not regret that this was the law, but no one would therefore say, that the judges had the power of annulling the law. The great city of Aberdeen had been disfranchised, and Edinburgh, the capital of Scotland, was likely to be disfranchised, and to be without representatives in parliament, owing to the desuetude of acts of parliament, and the doctrine, that long-continued abuses constitute a right.

Lord Binning said, that the first part of the motion was unnecessary, as the facts could be ascertained without troubling the judges; the return to the second part was impossible; for the judges could not state what acts they would consider to be in desuetude, until they had heard counsel and evidence on each particular case.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, that the doctrine of desuetude was established by all the writers on the law of Scotland, as well as by the decisions of the courts. This, however, inferred no legislative authority in the court of session. It was indeed extremely inconsistent with the English administration of justice, and with the vigilance that was now exercised over courts of law. But it was borrowed from the law of Rome, when Rome was in the highest splendour of its liberty. It was a principle in the Roman law, that all laws derived their authority from the people; the popular consent was either tacit or expressed: as tacit consent constituted law, so tacit consent was held to abrogate law. It was, however, a state of the law deserving attention. Some legislative measure should be applied to this subject in the present day, when so much attention was bestowed upon the administration of law, and the state of courts of justice. The motion of his right hon. friend, whose able and unwearied attention to matters of this kind, did himself so much honour, and his country so much service, went only to obtain the state of the fact, in order to lay a proper foundation for future deliberations.

Mr. Boswell thought that some remedy was immediately called for, if the law were, as it had been said to be, a trap, and not a guide for the people. If the judges could not tell what laws were in desuetude, till counsel were heard as to each particular law, how could the people know what the law of the land was? It was from want of attention to the progress of society that laws came to be in such a situation. Some of the laws were, at the same time, most abominably tyrannical. Lord Thurlow had decided, in the case of the church livings in Scotland, that long usage, which implied the consent of the people, had set aside the statute law. He congratulated the people of Scotland on the inquiry now originated. He hoped it would lead to the appointment of a commission, and that the result would be an act of parliament, taking away from the Court of Session the power of declaring any act in desuetude. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Wynn approved of the motion. He thought it quite as much a matter of course that the house should inquire into the laws of Scotland which had fallen into desuetude, as into the expired and expiring laws of this country. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh said, the house ought not to call on the judges to give opinions in their chambers, which they might afterwards depart from in their judicial capacity, on hearing counsel and witnesses. The information might be obtained by a committee of that house, or by a commission appointed by the crown; but the proceeding in either way would be inoperative at this late period of the session. He therefore moved the previous question.

Sir J. Newport said, that if nothing were proposed on this subject by his Majesty's ministers at an early period of the next session, he should feel it his duty to submit a distinct motion to the house.

The previous question was then carried.

SLAVES IN DOMINICA.] Sir S. Romilly moved an address for "A Copy of the Opinion of the Attorney-General of the island of Dominica, given in the month of March, 1817, to the Governor of the Island, upon the power of the Governor to pardon Slaves condemned by their Masters to work in chains on the Public Work; and a Copy of the Case or Letter upon which such opinion was given."—Ordered.

SLAVES IN NEVIS.] Sir S. Romilly moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to take into consideration certain Papers laid before this house on the 30th day of April last, relating to the Treatment of Slaves in the island of Nevis; and to report their observations thereupon to the house."—The hon. and learned gentleman said, that he had before stated several circumstances which took place in Nevis, and which called for legislative interference. Amongst others, he had mentioned the conduct of Mr. Huggins, (see pp. 1523, 1535,) who had been left manager of an estate belonging to Mr. Cottle. Two young men, slaves, were most severely flogged, and Huggins was present at the punishment, as were also two female slaves, one the sister, the other a near relative of one of the culprits. Those poor women shed tears, and for that heinous crime, Mr. Huggins, thinking it fit that they also should be flogged, ordered them to receive, one 25 and the other 20 lashes, which were inflicted with a cart whip. They were thus punished for what would have appeared meritorious in any other part of the civilized world—punished for displaying those finer feelings, of which they were often represented as being destitute. When Mr. Huggins had caused the young men to be flogged, he turned to one of his attendants, and said, "now bring out the ladies;" and while they were extended on the ground, and receiving their punishment, he was heard frequently to say to them, "now cry," as if taunting them with the possession of those feelings which were an ornament to the highest class of their sex in any country. (Hear, hear.) For this offence, Mr. Huggins was indicted, he was tried before a petty jury, and although the facts were clearly proved, and though no defence had been made, save an allegation of riot, which was also disproved by evidence, it was a singular fact, that Mr. Huggins was acquitted. The legislative assembly and the governor had expressed their approbation of this verdict; but, in the former, Mr. Huggins had several relations and friends, and at the table of the governor he was a constant guest, from his convivial qualities. Such being the state of affairs in that island, he felt it his duty to make this motion, not merely on account of the conduct of Mr. Huggins, but for the purpose of pointing out the evils which existed, and of obtaining a remedy for them. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Goulburn said, he had no objection to the motion, provided the investigations of the committee were properly limited.

Mr. Wilberforce declared, that justice was not equally administered in the West Indies. The unfortunate slaves, it must be remembered, had no representatives in that house; a circumstance that should induce it to take a more lively concern in their welfare. When he heard of the purity of West Indian justice, it brought to his recollection the descriptions he had formerly heard of the delights of the passage from Africa to the West Indies; descriptions which would have induced those who put any faith in their correctness, to regard it as a kind of Elysium, although it had been subsequently proved to be a concentration of misery, such as never was before crowded into an equal space.—He had never seen a set of papers relating to any trial that seemed to him to call for more serious investigation.

Mr. Marryat said, that if any cruelty had been exercised in this case, he would not be its apologist; but he did not think that any good could be accomplished by the perpetual agitation of such questions. He was not one of those who denied the right of the mother country to interfere with the administration of justice in the colonies on all occasions, or to watch with a vigilant eye, so as to prevent or to correct abuses, when the local authorities neglected so to do: but he would always contend for the policy of exercising that interference prudently, imperceptibly, and silently, taking care that no groundless clamour was excited, and no sentiments tending to the subversion of order and subordination countenanced or inculcated. He deprecated, particularly, doctrines that had a tendency to excite insurrection among the slaves, or to convince them that they were treated with cruelty or injustice, by being kept in a state of servitude. The phrases used, that the colour of a man's skin should make no difference in his situation, and the eulogies lavished in some publications on the black emperor of Hayti, inspired them with the idea that they were cruelly treated, in being debarred from an equality with the whites, and had a tendency to excite them to revolt, for the recovery of those rights, of which they imagined themselves unjustly deprived. It ought to be recollected that the dominion of the whites was founded on opinion; and if that opinion were destroyed, the order of society in the West Indies would be subverted, and the rights of the masters would be buried along with the comforts, prospects, and anticipated improvements of the slaves. The slavery complained of was the work of the British government, and continued under British laws; and if the rights of the colonial proprietors, acquired under such guarantees, were to be interfered with, the parties ought in this case, as in others, to be indemnified. The African Institution had told the world, and told it justly, that if you want to abolish slavery ultimately, you must cut off the supply of slaves. This had been done, and a gradual amelioration of the state and prospects of the slaves might be expected to be the consequence. As improvement advanced, and as the labour of slaves became of more value, from an increased demand for it, their condition would be altered. When at last the price given for the labour of slaves, would purchase that of free labourers, slavery would abolish itself. Looking to this view of the case, and the prospects thus held out, he could not but deprecate discussions of this kind, which might rather retard than promote the purposes in view, and disturb, by unseasonable interference with the conduct of the planters, the natural course of events. He concluded by saying that he saw no reason for the inquiry, and should therefore oppose the motion.

Mr. Gordon said, that as an individual connected with the West Indies, he was anxious not to be mixed up with the opinions expressed by the last speaker, on the inexpediency of a public inquiry into matters connected with the treatment of slaves in the colonies. He thought, that the dominion of the whites would be best maintained by kindness to the slaves. A stronger case than that now before the house had, in his opinion, never been brought forward.

Mr. Barham concurred in the propriety of bringing every subject connected with our colonies before the house, where the evil in question could not be remedied by the local governments. The present case was certainly one of a very flagrant nature; but there was only one case, and in one of the small islands, where the laws might be overpowered by individuals. In the larger islands, the condition of the slaves, (abstracting the name of slavery) was in general better than that of a large portion of the peasantry in this country. He had no objection to the motion, and admired the humane disposition of the hon. and learned gentleman who brought it forward.

Mr. Warre was surprised to hear it asserted that the condition of the slaves in some of the islands was superior to that of a large portion of the peasantry of this country. The most favoured slave was not in a situation equally favourable to happiness with the degraded peasant of the most despotic government*. He heard likewise with surprise a deprecation of discussion on subjects like the present. By discussion alone the traffic in slaves had been abolished, and by discussion and vigilance only could the state of the slaves be ameliorated, or their interests protected.

Mr. W. Smith supported the motion. He contended, that a sufficient case had been made out to induce the house to consent to an inquiry; and though it might be said on the other side, that the practices in question did not generally prevail in our settlements, still there was enough, in this instance, to shew that great cruelties had been exercised upon those unfortunate persons. He was ready to acknowledge that the African institution had been deceived on one or two occasions, but the accounts that had been transmitted to them in all other cases deserved the most serious attention.

Mr. A. Browne said, he did not mean to defend the case now before the house; he thought that the punishment of the women might have been dispensed with. He should not now enter into a discussion on the treatment of slaves in our West India islands, but he hoped that another opportunity would arise. If any persons had been guilty of improper conduct, let them be visited with the censure of that house and the punishment of the laws.

Sir S. Romilly briefly replied. He could not, he said, concur in the proposition for limiting this inquiry. He had moved for a committee to take into consideration the papers laid upon the table, and he did not know how farther to limit the subject. There was not a single fact before the jury which could justify their verdict. Huggins had acted with great and unjustifiable severity towards those unfortunate slaves, and he could not help making this melancholy observation, that, of all animals man was the only one that delighted in tormenting his own species†. (Hear, hear.)

The motion was then agreed to, and a select committee appointed, consisting of Sir S. Romilly, Mr. Wilberforce, Mr. Marryat, Mr. A. Browne, Mr. Barham, and several other members.

ALIEN BILL.] The report of this bill being brought up,

Mr. J. P. Grant proposed to add the following clause: "And whereas the powers granted by the said acts were hitherto unknown to the constitution of these kingdoms, and the policy of our ancestors, and it is expedient and necessary that the exercise of those powers should be placed under the control of parliament: be it therefore enacted, that from and after the passing of this act, a record be kept in the office of the secretary of state for the home department, of the grounds and reasons for every order made for the removal of any alien or aliens, after the passing of this act; and that a true

* The following excerpts from a very interesting work, entitled, "Notes on a Journey in America, from the coast of Virginia to the Territory of the Illinois, by Morris Birkbeck," London, 1818, will set this matter in its proper light.

"It has been confidently alleged, that the condition of slaves in Virginia, under the mild treatment they are said to experience, is preferable to that of our English labourers. I know and lament the degrading state of dependent poverty, to which the latter have been gradually reduced, by the operation of laws originally designed for their comfort and protection. I know also, that many slaves pass their lives in comparative ease, and seem to be unconscious of their bonds, and that the most wretched of our paupers might envy the allotment of the happy negro: This is not, however, instituting a fair comparison, to bring the opposite extremes of the two classes into competition. Let us take a view of some particulars which operate generally.

"In England, exertion is not the result of personal fear: in Virginia, it is the prevailing stimulus.

"The slave is punished for mere indolence, at the discretion of an overseer:—The peasant is only punished by the law when guilty of a crime.

"In England, the labourer and his employer are equal in the eye of the law. Here, the law affords the slave no protection, unless a white man gives testimony in his favour.

"Here, any white man may insult a black with impunity: whilst the English peasant, should he receive a blow from his employer, might and would return it with interest, and afterwards have his remedy at law for the aggression.

"The testimony of a peasant weighs as much as that of a lord in a court of justice; but the testimony of a slave is never admitted at all, in a case where a white man is opposed to him.

"A few weeks ago, in the streets of Richmond, a friend of mine saw a white boy wantonly throw quicklime in the face of a negro man. The man shook the lime from his jacket, and some of it accidentally reached the eyes of the young brute. This casual retaliation excited the resentment of the brother of the boy, who complained to the slave's owner, and actually had him punished with thirty lashes. This would not have happened to an English peasant.

"I must, however, do this justice to the slave-master of Virginia: It was not from him that I ever heard a defence of slavery; some extenuation on the score of expediency, or necessity, is the utmost range now taken by that description of reasoners, who, in former times, would have attempted to support the principle as well as the practice.

"Perhaps it is in its depraving influence on the moral sense of both slave and master, that slavery is most deplorable. Brutal cruelty, we may hope, is a rare and transient mischief; but the degradation of soul is universal, and, as it should seem, from the general character of free negroes, indelible.

"All America is now suffering in morals through the baneful influence of negro slavery, partially tolerated, corrupting justice at the very source." p. 21—24.

† This observation is, unfortunately, more true than novel. Cicero (de Consolatione) observes, "Nullum aliud in toto terrarum orbe genus animantium reperiar, præter unum hominem, quod in proprium genus, atque in se ipsum sævitiam exerceat suam." copy of the said record or records shall, within one month after the meeting of parliament, be laid before each house of parliament, sealed up, for them to report their opinion thereon."

The clause was brought up and read a first time: the question was then put, and it was negatived without a division.—The bill was ordered to be read a third time on Friday.

CHURCHES IN SCOTLAND BILL.] A bill was brought in, and read a first time, "for building and promoting the building of additional Churches in Scotland."

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, May 21.

SPANISH SLAVE TRADE TREATY BILL.] The Earl of Shaftesbury moved the second reading of this bill.

Lord Holland said, he rejoiced most sincerely that the right of search was stipulated for by the treaty, as it was only by its exercise that the slave-trade could be effectually stopped; at the same time he must say, that he thought the agreement of the court of Spain to abolish the slave trade in the year 1820, a very inadequate return for the pecuniary sacrifice made by the treaty on the part of this country; for he could not but consider the promise of an abolition two years hence as a very different thing from the actual consent of the court of Spain to abandon the traffic in slaves altogether. He was, indeed, surprised to find that it should be necessary to make so large a grant as 400,000*l.* in order to obtain this promise of an abolition from an ally for whom this country had already sacrificed so much. He should not oppose the second reading, but he thought it his duty not to permit a bill containing so extraordinary a provision to pass sub silentio.

The bill was then read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, May 21.

REVENUES OF LONDON—NEW PRISON BILL.] Sir W. Curtis moved, that the petition presented on the 4th instant, from the city of London, be referred to a committee, to examine the matter thereof, and report the same to the house. He observed, that an account of the revenues of the city had been called for, in order to establish a ground for refusing any assistance towards building an additional gaol. He did not think, however, that the city ought to bear the expense of the gaol, and therefore they were not bound to produce the account. In the reign of Charles I., a sum of 99,718*l.* had been granted to the city for building a gaol. In 1778, 40,000*l.* was granted for the same purpose. A similar grant of 10,000*l.* was made at a subsequent period. In short, the money expended for objects of this kind never came out of the funds of the corporation.

Mr. Sergeant Onslow said, that since the 24th of February, when the order was issued, the city of London had resorted to every shift to elude a compliance with it. This application to the house was their last hope, but, as they had not shewn any reason why the order should not be obeyed, he should move the previous question.

Sir J. Shaw said, that the city were not actuated by any fear of disclosing their affairs, but he thought that the order ought to be rescinded.

Mr. Wrottesley and Sir M. W. Ridley severally observed, that they thought it reasonable that the committee should be granted.

Mr. Speaker said, that the present motion was one of a peculiar nature. The petitioners required to be heard against the orders of the house, and that the subject should be referred from the house to a committee. This, he believed, was altogether unprecedented.

Mr. H. Sumner said, there was no instance of such a proceeding, and he saw no grounds for making a precedent. He had charged the city with embezzling 53,000*l.* from a trust vested in them for purposes quite different from those for which it was employed. Could they sit down quietly under such a charge, without attempting any justification? They could not justify themselves without producing the accounts that had been ordered. If they had not been most lavish and profuse in their expenditure, they would not have applied to parliament for money to build their new gaol. The only object of the motion was, to spin out the session, that they might evade what they could not contradict.

Mr. Bennet said, he was one of those who had voted for the production of the accounts, but he had since found, that the funds to which those accounts related, were the private property of the city, for which they were accountable not to that house, but to the court of Chancery. It appeared to him, therefore, that the motion ought to be complied with.

Mr. Alderman Wood said, that no part of the Bridge-house estate had been employed for private purposes. If the house would accede to the motion, they would find that the city had not acted improperly.

Mr. Wynn maintained, that when the city called for parliamentary aid, the house had a right to know the state of their funds. He saw no reason, therefore, why the house should not persist in its order.

After some farther conversation, it was agreed that the motion should be withdrawn; that the New Prison bill should be read a second time on that day six months; and that the orders of the house of the 24th of February and the 19th of March should be discharged.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Sir F. Burdett presented 60 petitions from Todmorden; 28 from Birmingham; 15 from Manchester; 16 from Westminster; 15 from Spitalfields, Shoreditch, and Finsbury; 14 from Pollockshaws; 31 from Halifax; 15 from Edinburgh; 76 from Sheffield; 2 from Austerlands; 1 from Taunton; 1 from Newington; 1 from Glasgow; 1 from Bristol; each of them signed by 20 persons.—They were ordered to lie on the table.

IMPRISONMENT FOR LIBEL.] Mr. Bennet rose to call the attention of the house to certain transactions which had arisen out of the circular letter of Lord Sidmouth. (See Vol. I. p. 1608.) In the month of February, 1817, that celebrated letter had been written. In the same month of the same year two persons were imprisoned upon a charge of selling libellous publications: they were, Jonathan Buckley Mellor and Samuel Pilling, of Warrington. There never was a more illegal transaction than the search of their houses and persons by the officers, in order to find libellous writings. The house would recollect, that the solemn decision of a court of law had declared, that the searching of houses for libellous papers was illegal. In the present instance, from the houses so searched, several books, such as, Rollin's Ancient History, and Wynne's History of America, were carried away by the officers in a sack. The occupiers were arrested, and bail was demanded from them, which they could not give, and they were accordingly committed to prison—not to the county prison, the only legal prison—but to the house of correction. They were ironed—they were sent to associate with felons, and were condemned to hard labour, such as convicted felons were sentenced to perform. The libels which these persons were accused of selling were the Political Litanies, respecting which he would say, that he held all publications of that kind in abhorrence, whether written by a broken down bookseller, or by a minister of state. (Hear, hear.) But to be apprehended for selling such publications, and treated as those men were, was an illegal and unjust proceeding, which every feeling of morality and religion must condemn. He imputed no blame to the gaoler; it belonged entirely to the magistrates. These two men, who it seemed were to be treated with the same persecuting spirit which the government had manifested in the case of Mr. Hone, were removed in an open cart, handcuffed together, and, in the company of several others, were taken 18 miles to trial. Any gentleman in the habit of visiting prisons must know, that those who were imprisoned simply for misdemeanours might have been guilty of great offences; might be, in fact, the most abandoned characters; yet, in this instance, it was not thought improper to send a bookseller in the same cart with persons who might have committed felony. When they arrived at the gaol, they were all huddled together, and lodged in one room. It was then moved by the solicitor of the persons in question, that they should be immediately brought to trial. But the answer was, that the indictment had been removed by certiorari into the court of King's Bench, and that they would be liberated if they could give bail. They were unable to give bail, and were therefore sent back to prison; where they remained till the month of September, when they were discharged on their own recognizances.—Having thus submitted to the attention of the house the cases of these two individuals, he felt himself bound to say, that he believed there might be something in the papers which he then held in his hand that might not be perfectly true. Some matters, he believed, might be rather overcharged, or mistaken, if not indeed untrue. It was certain, however, that great severity had been exercised. He held, that it would be wasting the time of the house to dwell on the argument, that imprisonment before conviction was not intended for any other purpose than safe custody. If any thing were superadded, if the persons were put in irons, or subjected to any species of punishment, it was not only illegal, but disgraceful to the country in which we lived—a reproach to the age in which we were born. He begged pardon of the house for having detained them so long on these two cases. (See the petitions of Mellor and Pilling, pp. 694—696.) He would now proceed to the third case, that of Robert Swindells, of Macclesfield; (See his petition, page 1016.) and, with respect to the statement which he was about to make, he could assure them, that he entertained no doubt of its being correct, as he had employed a professional person to endeavour to ascertain the strict truth, and this was the reason why he had delayed so long to bring the subject of these petitions before the house. (Hear.) He had also the affidavit of Mr. Swindells himself. It appeared, then, that on the 10th of March, 1817, about twelve o'clock at night, when Mr. Swindells and his wife, who was far advanced in pregnancy, were in bed, they were disturbed by a knocking at the door. Mr. Swindells looked out of the window, and saw some persons, who desired him to come down and open the door, or they would force it. Alarmed by this threat, he came down and opened the door, when they rushed in and asked for persons who, they supposed, lodged in the house. A strict search was made in every part, but no persons were discovered. They then tore open all the trunks, took several papers out of them, and stripped Mr. Swindells of the little property that belonged to him. The alarm and terror of the wife were so great on this occasion, that she never recovered from the effects. On the 26th of April she was delivered of a child, and on the 28th she died. On the 31st of May the child, deprived of the care and support of its mother, expired. Mr. Swindells was then arrested and committed to Chester castle, where he was confined for upwards of five weeks, and was then liberated without trial, and without receiving any thing to carry him home, a distance of 40 miles. (Hear, hear.) Here, then, was another instance of the tender mercies of his Majesty's government, another example of persons taken up without having committed any crime, and discharged without any opportunity of proving their innocence. Such cases of injustice could not fail to make a very powerful impression on the minds of the people. He thought it right to state to the house, that the individual whose case he had just described was an old seaman; he had been 11 years in the service, during four of which he was on board the Ville de Paris, blockading the squadron at Brest. He would now put it to them, whether, supposing that the petitioners had somewhat coloured their statements, these cases did not deserve the most serious attention. They were about to be sent back to their constituents; and would they return to them with the stigma on their characters, that when people were imprisoned by magistrates, under the sanction of his Majesty's government, the house shut its ears to their petitions, and refused to institute any inquiry? Leaving them to answer this question by the vote which they would give that night, he should now conclude with moving, "That a committee be appointed to inquire into the petitions presented by Jonathan Mellor and Samuel Pilling, of Warrington, on the 3d of March, and also of Robert Swindells, of Macclesfield, on the 13th of the same month."

Mr. Davenport said, that he knew nothing of the cases of Mellor and Pilling, but with respect to that of Swindells, he would read a letter which he had received from a magistrate of Macclesfield. The letter stated, that on the night in question, a large party had set out from Manchester, and had arrived at Macclesfield, in consequence of which, the town was in a state of great confusion and alarm, and the cavalry were ordered to parade the streets. Information had been given that several persons had assembled at the house of Swindells, and accordingly a magistrate, and several others under his authority went there and informed him of the object of their visit. They then found several printed papers and pamphlets, and warned him of the danger of selling them. The persons who searched the house were very benevolent men, and had not exercised their authority with any violence.

Mr. Blackburne said, that, with respect to the cases of Mellor and Pilling, he had that day received a communication from the magistrates, who stated, that those persons, whilst in the workhouse, had every accommodation which the place afforded, and that their removal was not attended with any unnecessary rigour, they being placed in an open cart, and connected together, for the sake of security, by a light chain. They had been committed to Preston gaol, because the prison of Lancaster castle was at that time excessively full.

The house were about to divide, when

The Attorney-General rose, and said, he could assure the house, that the law, as far as related to what had been done in these prosecutions, could not have been conducted with more lenity. If these persons had been discharged on their own recognizances, it was under his advice and direction; and if he had been guilty of any dereliction of duty on the occasion, it was that he had relaxed the law in their favour. With respect to the cases of Mellor and Pilling, what course did he pursue? Did he frame a bill, or file an ex-officio information against them? He would tell those gentlemen who objected to informations ex-officio, that their objections in these cases might be set at rest; for he had filed no information against these men; and as to those who objected to the apprehension of persons charged with libel by the warrant of magistrates, he would tell them, that their objections also might be easily removed, for none of these persons had been arrested under that process. He sent down a bill of indictment to the grand jury. (Hear, hear.) The bill being found, and the parties, in consequence, having been arrested, it struck him to be more proper that the publication of such libels—or, of such papers, if he might not call them libels—should be submitted to a higher tribunal than the quarter-sessions; that, in fact, it should be argued before the judges of the land; and therefore he removed the proceedings by certiorari, into the court of King's Bench. Now, these men being in custody under the bill of indictment, he had a right, unless they found bail, to keep them in prison, although the proceedings had been removed; but he was unwilling, as the trial would be postponed by his own act, that they should remain in custody; and with this view it was decided, he declared upon his honour as a man, that they should be discharged on their own recognizances. If then, he had done any thing wrong in those cases, it was because, as Attorney-general, and looking at the character and tendency of the papers, he had relaxed the law. The defendants entered into recognizances to appear on the first day of the ensuing term, and plead. They appeared before the court of King's Bench and pleaded; and the moment they appeared and pleaded, a motion was made, that they should be continued on their recognizances, to appear again, in case they should be called upon to answer the charges against them. These were the whole of the proceedings; and he now asked the house, whether it were possible that the law officers of the crown could have acted with greater lenity? (Hear, hear.) The hon. mover had said, that magistrates had no right to commit persons of this description to the house of correction. He begged to inform the hon. member, that two statutes existed under which magistrates were not only authorized to commit persons charged with felonies, but also those who were apprehended for misdemeanors, to the house of correction, instead of the common gaol. This was the law, and in many cases, too, it was very advantageous to the persons in custody; for it might happen that the county gaol would be at a great distance from the place in which they were arrested, and the house of correction would be very near. There were two statutes which empowered magistrates in towns and liberties of their own, to commit for trial to the house of correction. The hon. gentleman had stated another proposition, which was true, but which did not apply to these men. The 22d of Geo. III. c. 24. has this clause:—that persons sent to the house of correction, though not committed to hard labour, may be set to work, if they are supported at the expense of the county: the work, however, must not be severe, an account is to be kept of the money they earn, and when they are discharged, they are entitled to one half of it. This statute applied to persons not committed for trial. Now, these men did not state what the work was to which they were set; but he (the Attorney-general) knew what it was. They were ordered to pick two pounds of cotton; he did not know whether two pounds per day, but this was the work. (Hear, hear.) With respect to the case of Swindells—he was now speaking to that part of the case which related to the prosecution—no man could be prosecuted with less severity than he was. In this case there was no arrest by a magistrate at all. Swindells having repeatedly circulated these publications, he (the Attorney-general) filed an information ex officio against him. There was, however, no warrant issued by a judge, none: no warrant issued by a magistrate, none. He was merely served with a subpœna, which is a notice to appear, and that was the document which he referred to as placing him under the penalty of 100*l.* If a man does not appear to this notice, the common law process is, an attachment for a contempt of court. The day of appearance having gone by, thirteen days after an attachment was issued out of the crown-office for the apprehension of Swindells. He then applied to the magistrates, who told him, they had nothing at all to do with it; that it was a process issued by the sheriff, and they had no more power to interfere than in a case of debt; that he was bound to file an appearance, and the moment he had filed an appearance, he was entitled to his discharge. The defendant, however, did not appear, and, in consequence of his remaining in gaol, he (the Attorney-general) caused this notice to be given to him, and if he had not have given this notice, he might have lain in gaol to this hour. He said to him, "If you will appear, if you can't come to London, or can't afford to pay an attorney, order the Solicitor of the Treasury to enter an appearance for you, and you shall have a copy of the information gratis, and be discharged." He appeared and pleaded, and he was discharged, and he was under no recognizance whatever. (Hear, hear.) Now, he contended, that if any prosecution were to be instituted at all, he had relaxed every one of the rules of law, except that of giving up the prosecution. He declared most solemnly, that when he received the account of Swindells circulating these publications, when he filed the information ex-officio against him, he never knew that his house had been entered, that his wife had died, or that he had suffered any of the misfortunes which had been stated. (Hear, hear.) It would be recollected that, on the night on which his house was entered, a large body of persons had assembled at Manchester, and formed what was called the "blanketeer meeting." One party intended to proceed by Stockport, the other by Macclesfield. One thousand of them arrived at the latter place, much confusion prevailed, and it was said, that some persons had gone to the house of Swindells. The magistrates sent to him, and he denied that any persons were there. They then desired to see who were in the house. It was true also (but he was not going to justify it), they took some papers, the political catechism, and others, and cautioned him not to sell those publications. If the magistrates, however, had acted wrong in law, the house, considering the situation of affairs at that time, would not be disposed to blame them for what they had done. With respect to Mrs. Swindells, she had been ill for some time before; but on the next day, she went to her work in the manufactory, and neither she nor her husband ever complained that she had suffered any thing from the house being entered. Swindells had stated, that he could not get any medical advice. Now he (the Attorney-General) had seen an affidavit of a surgeon, who deposed, that after he had attended the wife for some days, Swindells told him that he did not want him any longer, as his wife had got into the infirmary. From that moment to the time of her death, she never made any complaint, nor attributed her illness to the causes which Swindells had mentioned. When Swindells was committed to gaol he lived as well as any of the debtors in confinement; he had tea, coffee, sugar, bread, and meat, and lived in every respect as well as they did. (Hear, hear.) He had now stated the facts of these cases to the house, and repeating, as he felt himself entitled to do, that no severity had been exercised by the officers of the crown, but, on the contrary, that the utmost lenity had been shewn, he should sit down with giving his dissent to the motion.

Sir S. Romilly said, that his hon. and learned friend had not touched upon the most important points of the question. Notwithstanding the disregard with which he had seen important subjects of this kind treated during the session, he could not have thought it possible that his Majesty's ministers would have sent the present motion to a division without some explanation. (No, no, from the Treasury bench.) He was sure that strangers had been ordered to withdraw, and that the gallery was almost cleared before his hon. and learned friend had risen. He did not deny that, as far as his hon. and learned friend was concerned, these men had been treated with lenity. He did not, however, very well see why the proceedings had been removed by certiorari: such cases ought to be brought to trial without delay. But this was not the part of the subject which he thought of most importance. It was the fettering of men charged with the publication of a libel. (Hear, hear.) Had any person stated a few years ago that such a transaction would take place at this day, no one would have believed him. (Hear, hear.) Why were these men confined in irons? They had not committed felony; and, even if they had, they had not been legally convicted. The libel with which they were charged was extremely reprehensible; but he denied that it was blasphemous: it could not be called blasphemous, either in the common use of the term or legally. His hon. and learned friend had admitted, that the magistrates had, in some degree, exceeded their authority. He was surprised that such a novelty as placing these men in fetters had not affected his hon. and learned friend in a much stronger manner. Recollecting the liberal opinions which his hon. and learned friend, in the early part of his life, had so ardently entertained, (hear, hear,) he thought that such a violation of law should have made a deep impression on his mind—should have excited his sympathy, and roused his indignation—acting, as he did, in a magisterial capacity, as well for the people as the crown. In the courts below, the Attorney-General might consider it his peculiar duty to defend the prerogatives of the crown against every attack upon them; but, in that house, he was sitting as one of the representatives of the people—as a guardian of their rights—a conservator of their liberties. (Hear, hear, hear.) Would his hon. and learned friend, in the early part of his life, have endured that irons should be placed on men charged with the publication of what country magistrates might deem libels? Was it not notorious that many persons construed every thing published, offensive to the feelings of men in power, a libel? Was not the very respectful petition of the bishops in the reign of James II. considered a libel? Let, then, the house remember, that they were that night deciding whether their constituents were to be placed in irons, at the discretion of magistrates, previously to their trial for offences, for which, if convicted, it would be against law to fetter them.

Mr. Blackburne said, that the letter which he had received from the magistrates stated, that these persons had been kept in the workhouse, by a fire-side, and merely chained by the leg to prevent them from running away.

Sir S. Romilly said, he was sure the hon. member would not deny that they had been confined with the usual precautions.

Mr. Blackburne admitted that to be the case.

Sir S. Romilly said, that was what he meant. He repeated, that it was not legal to put those men in irons; and as to any comforts which the hon. member might think they had enjoyed, what comforts could compensate for a species of torture so degrading and cruel to persons in their situation?* Surely there were circumstances in this case, if any regard for the liberty of the subject existed in that house, sufficient to demand investigation. The houses of the petitioners had been searched for papers, and papers, called libels, had been seized and taken away. Rollin's Ancient History, Law's Serious Call, and the Evangelical Magazine had been seized, because they were in company with the Liverpool Mercury, and by the side of some of Cobbett's Register. Such proceedings were most reprehensible. Lord Camden had severely reproved such practices: he had declared, that the sacredness of a person's private papers should never be violated on the presumption of libellous publications. Would any man write as Algernon Sidney had done, if every country magistrate might send a constable to examine or carry off his papers? Yet, such were the fruits of Lord Sidmouth's circular letter—that most unconstitutional interposition with the duties of the magistracy. Could the house refuse to inquire into these facts? In all other cases, the inclination was, to presume with the oppressed against the oppressor; but, on political questions, he regretted to say, that in that house the feeling was, however severe the injustice or harsh the agent—be he minister, magistrate, or constable—to decide against the complaints of petitioners. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Bathurst contended, that his hon. and learned friend had shewn from the law, that the magistrates were justified in sending these persons to the house of correction, and that such had been the uniform practice in the county of Lancaster with prisoners to be tried at the quarter sessions. He admitted that the magistrates had exceeded their powers; but it was to be considered in extenuation, that the occurrence had taken place at a crisis of public alarm, when large bodies of men were marching from Manchester for illegal purposes. All the points that required to be known were already before the house, and there was, therefore, no necessity for farther inquiry by a committee.

Mr. Lockhart said, he should support the motion, not because he thought the prosecutions had been oppressively and improperly instituted, or because he believed that they had been harshly conducted. On the contrary, he thought that such publications ought to be repressed by the salutary checks of law, and he saw every degree of lenity and humanity in the conduct of the law-officers of the crown, in pursuing the legal steps to repress them. So sensible was Mr. Hone, the author of some of these libels, of their immoral and irreligious tendency, that though acquitted by a jury, he had withdrawn them from circulation, a circumstance which did him great credit. (See page 22.) The Attorney-General had only performed his duty, and he would not support the motion on any grounds of crimination against him: but the use of irons to confine men accused of publishing libels, or of committing other offences under the name of misdemeanors, demanded investigation and correction, and on that ground he would vote for the proposed inquiry into the cases adduced.

* See the notes, pp. 1109, 1113.—The Editor is happy to observe, that the keeper of Newgate has lately set a laudable example of obedience to the ancient law on this subject. On the 3d of Nov. 1818, the Grand Jury presented a report to the court at the Old Bailey, in which the following passage occurs:—"The Grand Jury have to remark the good effects that have arisen from the lessening of punishment, by doing away the practice of ironing prisoners before trial; and trust that this deviation from general practice, on the part of Mr. Brown, will be universally adopted throughout the kingdom."

Mr. Bennet shortly replied. He observed, that the main facts of the case had not been denied, and trusted that, should the motion be negatived, the country would bear in mind, that one of the last acts of the present House of Commons was, to refuse inquiry into cases of gross oppression.

The house divided.

Ayes, 17—Noes, 73.

NABOB OF THE CARNATIC.] Mr. Marsh, after detailing a variety of circumstances relative to the debts of the Nabob of the Carnatic, moved, that the petitions of certain of his creditors (Messrs. Chase, Chinnery, and Co., Messrs. Abbott and Maitland, and Mr. Parry of Madras) be referred to a select committee of the house, to report their observations thereon.

Mr. Canning said, he would agree to the motion, not because he thought the claims of the petitioners well founded, but because the committee would come at the truth, which, in his opinion, would defeat them.

The motion was agreed to, and a committee appointed.

SAVING BANKS (ENGLAND) BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

PURCHASE OF GAME BILL.] This bill was reported, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

CHURCHES IN SCOTLAND BILL.] This bill was read a second time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, May 22.

SAVING BANKS (ENGLAND) BILL.] This bill was brought from the Commons, and read a first time.

REGENCY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.] On the order of the day being moved for the second reading of this bill,

The Lord Chancellor rose and said, that the bill, as he had stated on its introduction, had two objects. The first was, to authorize an increase of the number of persons composing her Majesty's council. The state of her Majesty's health requiring her to be occasionally absent from Windsor, it was proper that, at such times, some of the council should be present with his Majesty; but as many of the members of the council held official situations which might prevent their attendance, there was a necessity for an increase. Their lordships would recollect, that the act now in force on this subject provided, that if a vacancy should occur in the council, her Majesty should supply the same by her nomination. In one instance her Majesty had already exercised the authority with which she was thus invested; and it certainly must occur to their lordships, that, under the same provision of the act, it might have happened to her to supply substitutes for the greater part, or even the whole of the members originally appointed by parliament. In this view of the subject, it was thought, that there could have been no objection to her Majesty naming any further number of members which parliament might, under the present circumstances, think it advisable to add to her council. The main object, however, of this first part of the bill was, that there should be an increase; and if that principle were agreed to, it might be a matter of future consideration how the increase should be effected, whether by her Majesty, or by parliament. With respect to the other object of the bill, their lordships would perceive, that it tended to effect a very necessary amendment in the act of the 51st of the king. That act provided that, if her Majesty should cease to have the custody of his Majesty's person during a prorogation, parliament should assemble forthwith; if during a dissolution, that the old parliament should be reassembled. Now, if such an event should occur during a dissolution, after the writs were issued, or any day previous to writs being returnable, the greatest inconvenience would be occasioned; for all the expense which individuals might be put to in the elections would be lost, as the returns to the new parliament would, in fact, be abrogated. The act had made the same provision for the case of her Majesty ceasing to have the custody of the king's person, as for the demise of the king; but though it might be very proper to put the case of the demise of the regent on the same footing as that of the king, there could be no reason for similar provisions in the case of her Majesty. The amendment which was thus proposed would obviate much difficulty and inconvenience which might arise: and it therefore appeared to him liable to no objection.

Earl Grey said, that to the first clause of the bill he did not feel any considerable objection. At the same time he could not help observing, that the noble and learned lord ought to have shewn that there was not now a sufficient number of members of the Queen's council, independently of those who held official situations, to perform the duties of their trust. If, however, it really appeared, that the duties of the council could not be performed by the present number, an addition certainly ought to be made; and with that object, to whatever extent it might be found necessary, he was ready to concur. With respect to the mode of effecting the addition, unless some strong reason for the contrary were assigned, he thought it would be better to follow the example of the first formation of the council. The present measure stood on a very different ground from that of the occasional supplying of vacancies. The authority given to her Majesty to appoint a member when a vacancy arose, could not form a precedent for the exercise of the same authority when a substantial addition was to be made to the original number. This was, however, a matter of inferior importance compared with the other part of the bill, which made a material alteration in the regency act. The noble and learned lord had stated, that great inconvenience would arise if her Majesty should cease to have the custody of the king's person during a dissolution of parliament, particularly if that event should happen after the issuing of the writs for a new election, and previously to the assembling of the new parliament, or on any day before the writs were returnable. In such a case it appeared that the individuals engaged in elections would be put to great unnecessary expense, as there would be a total abrogation of all the proceedings for the formation of a new parliament. How did it happen, that the noble and learned lord had not foreseen this consequence before? This clause existed in the first regency bill. It was introduced in the act of 1811; and the attention of the noble and learned lord, as well as of parliament, was again called to the subject in the following year, when, in consequence of the unfortunate malady which afflicted his Majesty, it was found necessary to remove the restrictions imposed on the Regent. Under these circumstances it was impossible to suppose that the clause could have found its way into the act without grave and sufficient reasons. The noble and learned lord had stated, that the cases of the demise of the King or the Prince Regent stood on a very different ground from that which the present bill went to meet. But there were circumstances which might make the demise of the Queen a subject fit for the provision in the original act. It must have been considered, that the trust of the King's person was one of so sacred a nature that parliament only could properly provide for its due execution. It appeared to have been therefore thought, that though, during the interval between the Queen's demise and the meeting of parliament, the care of the King's person should devolve on the council, it was proper to make provision that the interval should be of the shortest possible duration; and, therefore, that the old parliament should reassemble with the view of regulating that important trust. This was what was to be inferred from the clause in the existing act, and he therefore must consider the noble and learned lord bound to make out a strong case before he asked their lordships to agree to so important an alteration. But he must again ask, if there were any reason for this measure, why was it not discovered before? Seven long years had passed away since the subject was under discussion, and during that time the country had been, by the noble and learned lord and his colleagues, left exposed to all those dangers and inconveniences which they now so strongly apprehended. When parliament had already provided generally for the event to which human nature was always exposed, what reason could there be for any particular provision now? It never could have entered the minds of the persons who so long ago framed this clause, that it should be repealed when the event it was intended to meet was apprehended to be near at hand. If the present measure were necessary, the delay which had taken place was unaccountable, and the bringing it forward now was neither consistent with delicacy nor duty. The object of the law as it stood was, that parliament should, with the least possible delay, provide for the proper care of the King's person, in case the Queen should cease to exercise that trust. The act was so framed, that the trust should remain in the council for as short a time as convenience would permit. But it was now proposed that an addition should be made to the council, not by the parliament, but by the Queen. The effect would be to commit the trust vested in the council to persons of whom their lordships knew nothing, and for a time depending on the pleasure of his Majesty's ministers—namely, until they should think fit to call another parliament. Thus the custody of his Majesty's person would be intrusted to individuals over whom parliament had no control, whose very names were unknown, and for a time altogether indefinite. He had complained that no grounds had been laid for the introduction of the measure, and he had also to complain that no good reasons were stated in the preamble. It was set forth in the preamble that her Majesty's health might occasionally require her absence from Windsor, and it was inferred that an additional number of her council would therefore be necessary; but, if that inference should be found just, it did not follow that her Majesty ought to have the nomination of the new members of that body. After the clause respecting the council, came the clause for repealing that of the regency act, which authorized the reassembling of the old parliament; but to this clause there was not the slightest reference whatever in the preamble. This was a mode of proceeding contrary to all parliamentary usage. No grounds for the measure were laid in the preamble; none of any consequence had been stated by the noble and learned lord; and he trusted that parliament would require very strong reasons before they consented to pass this uncalled-for bill. A prorogation was expected soon to take place, perhaps in a fortnight, or less. That prorogation, it was understood, would be followed by a dissolution, though there was evidently no public reason for that measure. The legal existence of parliament would not expire until October twelvemonths. There was, therefore, no reason why it should not reassemble. In that case, he, for one, would not object to the consideration of this or any other change which circumstances, or the lapse of time, might have rendered necessary in the regency act. There were several parts of that act which, in his opinion, required alteration, and he thought it would be highly advisable to revise the whole. Among the subjects to which, in such a revision, the attention of parliament ought to be particularly directed, was the Windsor establishment, (hear, hear,) which was far from contributing in any way to the comfort of him for whose sake it was pretended to be maintained, and served only unnecessarily to increase the heavy burthens of the country. Another important object would be to provide for the case of the demise of the Prince Regent, a case which, in the present circumstances of the country, more imperatively called for provisions than the demise of the King or Queen, as it involved in it a complete suspension of the royal authority. The next object which would fall to be considered, would be to make provision for the assumption of the royal authority, by the person who was to succeed the Prince Regent. That illustrious person, who of right would so succeed, would doubtless be vested with the royal authority without restrictions. On this point he apprehended there could not be two opinions, either in or out of parliament. When these cases were provided for, parliament might next turn its attention to the present subject, which was certainly one of inferior importance, and consider whether any new provision might be desirable in the case of the demise of the Queen. He had no hesitation to state, that, in his opinion, the right course would be to vest the custody of the King's person in the Prince Regent. He thought that, whatever the establishment at Windsor might be, it was proper that the executive government should possess all the influence connected with it. This he stated on general principles, without regard to the persons who might compose that government. Upon all these grounds, he saw many and strong reasons for opposing the bill, and could see none to induce him to support it. As, however, he was far from considering the present regency act suitable to the circumstances of the country, he should not give the motion for the second reading a direct negative, but would move the previous question, with the view of hereafter moving, not in this, but in the next session, for a committee to take into consideration the provisions of the regency act; in order that such alterations might be made as lapse of time and a change of circumstances had rendered necessary. The noble earl concluded by moving the previous question.

The Earl of Liverpool said, that the noble earl had made no objection in principle to the first clause of the bill. He admitted it was necessary that a power of adding to the council should reside somewhere, and only objected to the mode in which that power was to be exercised. As to that objection, he should state the situation of some of the council. Two of them were almost entirely precluded from attendance, and two others had great duties to perform, which made their attendance a matter of great difficulty. It was necessary, therefore, that an immediate power of appointment should exist in some one person, to meet any sudden emergency. It was perfectly true, that, in the original Regency act, the persons composing the council were designated by name, but there was a clause enabling her Majesty to fill up any vacancy occasioned by death or otherwise, and that power she had already once exercised. If that clause were an object of jealousy, there might be some ground for objecting to the present; but no objection had ever been made to the adoption of it on the former occasion. If, however, there were any difficulty on this point, he had no objection to the additional members being nominated by parliament, with the same provision as before, to enable her Majesty to fill up any vacancies that might occur.—With respect to the second part of the bill, the noble earl had expressed his surprise at the introduction of this measure, without any reason having been given for it in the preamble, or in the arguments employed by a noble and learned lord on the subject. He said, the only question was, whether the degree of inconvenience were such as to call for this measure. Undoubtedly it was a question of degree; but with respect to the question of another regency, unless parliament thought proper to provide for another, the clause was not one of mere expediency, but of absolute necessity. It was the old and established law of the country that parliament should meet on the demise of the crown, and there were many considerations that rendered it necessary—the civil list, the revenue, the commissions held under the crown. But the question for the house now to consider was, not the demise of the crown, but the inconvenience that might arise on the demise of the illustrious personage to whom the custody of his Majesty was chiefly confided. When the noble earl said that no necessity existed for the dissolution of parliament, he must admit that that necessity would exist in another year; what, then, was the difficulty in passing that now, which must at all events be passed in another year? As to the accusation of a want of delicacy in bringing forward this measure, he begged to assure their lordships, that the illustrious personage to whom the bill partly referred had expressed her approbation of the measure. The bill was called for by the necessity of the case, and great inconvenience might arise, if their lordships neglected to pass it.

The Earl of Carnarvon said, he should very willingly assent to any proposition calculated either for her Majesty's convenience, or to secure her peace of mind, with regard to the King's safety; but he could not approve of connecting that subject with other measures of great importance. The bill, he thought, should be divided into two parts; the former, for increasing the number of the council, might receive the assent of parliament with the least possible delay, while the latter might remain to be more fully debated. This discussion brought to mind the necessity of some prospective measure, for that event which the lot of humanity rendered more or less probable. On the demise of the Regent, parliament would have again to discuss in whose hands the regency should be vested, and though there might be no doubt on that point, there was great doubt as to the manner, for there was no precedent but that of the last bill, which was one, he thought, that would not be followed—a precedent that had devised a mode of obtaining the royal assent without the concurrence of the royal will, and was most dangerous to the prerogative.

The Earl of Lauderdale thought, that, in point of delicacy, there should be as little discussion on this subject as possible: he wished, however, that the bill should be withdrawn, to make room for another.

The Lord Chancellor said, that, with a very little alteration, there could not be a better bill than the present. He was ready to accede to the proposition of any noble lord respecting the mode of nominating the members by parliament, particularly as the members so nominated would hold their places independent of her Majesty, and would not be liable to removal.

The Marquis of Buckingham said, that circumstances had unfortunately arisen which rendered the proposed bill necessary, and if it were provided that the new members of the council should be appointed by parliament, the measure should have his entire concurrence.

The previous question was then negatived, and the bill was read a second time.

Bank Restriction Bill.] On the motion of the Earl of Liverpool, this bill was read a second time, on the understanding that the principle of the measure should be discussed in a committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, May 22.

Rock Salt Duties.] Mr. Calcraft rose to move, that the house do resolve itself into a committee on the rock salt duties. It was the opinion of the committee which had been appointed on this subject, that he should propose that the duty on rock salt, used for agricultural purposes, should be reduced to 5*l.* per ton, which, they thought, would render the article accessible to every holder of land who might be desirous of trying it. He therefore moved, "that the house do resolve itself into a committee of the whole house, to take into consideration the act 57 Geo. III. c. 49. as far as relates to the duties on rock salt."

Mr. Wallace said, he would not oppose the motion, as every facility ought to be given to experiments in agriculture. There were certainly many other points which concerned the fisheries, but which would require much consideration. Government, he was sure, was disposed to give every accommodation in their power.

The house then went into the committee, and a resolution was agreed to, instructing the chairman to move for leave to bring in a bill.

Clandestine Marriages Bill.] This bill was read a second time.

Parliamentary Reform.] Mr. Bennet presented a petition from Brighton, praying for a reform of parliament.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Scotch Burghs Committee.] Sir G. Clerk brought up a report from the committee, respecting the funds of the burghs, which appeared inadequate to the building and maintaining of proper gaols. (See page 414.) The committee recommended, that the burghs might be allowed to assess themselves.—The report was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Medical Officers.] Mr. Bennet, seeing a noble lord connected with the war department in his place, wished to know, whether he could give him any information on the subject of a regulation which excluded certain medical officers employed on the continent, from sharing the prize-money due to the army, for the battle of Waterloo. He understood that the medical officers employed in laborious duties at Brussels, who had in six weeks restored 5000 wounded men to their regiments, were deprived of their share of prize-money, or other remuneration, contrary to former practice; while many officers, and even general officers, who had not heard a shot fired, nor faced an enemy, but who travelled in their own postchaises to Paris, and were found at the theatres and the restaurateurs were held to be entitled to all the pecuniary advantages resulting from the victory at Waterloo.

Lord Palmerston said, that a regulation had been adopted, under which those medical officers only were entitled to prize-money for the battle of Waterloo, who were connected with the troops engaged on the 16th, 17th and 18th of June, or who were present at the sieges and blockades of garrisons in France, and thus those who had remained at Brussels were excluded. By referring to the orders relating to the war in the Peninsula, it would be seen that the same system was followed. The payments there were confined to particular parts of the army: the first related to those who moved from Coimbra to the Douro; the second to those who broke up from Portugal on the 5th of March; the third to those who were present at the taking of Ciudad Rodrigo, and so on. It appeared necessary to confine the system to the troops actually engaged on particular services. Many sick and wounded were brought to this country from the Peninsula, and if the rule in question were not applied strictly, it might be extended to the medical attendants at home.

Mr. Bennet said, it was true that, in the Peninsular war, the troops at Tarragona had nothing to claim in common with those on the Douro. But that did not apply to the medical staff remaining in the cities to attend to the wounded; and he thought that the medical men who remained at Brussels for that purpose, after the battle of Waterloo, had a right to their share. If nothing were done on this subject by the war department, he should bring forward the subject again in the next session.

POOR LAWS.] Mr. Brougham begged to call the attention of the house to the subject of the Poor Laws. He understood that the Committee had now introduced all the measures which they meant to propose, namely, the Select Vestries bill, the Poor Laws Amendment bill, and the Parish Settlement bill. The last was to be postponed till the next session. He was surprised and disappointed that they had not taken a more extensive view of this great and important subject. At the same time he by no means undervalued their labours, or the excellent report which they had drawn up; he acknowledged their diligence and sagacity, and thought the house was indebted to them for the foundations they had laid for farther proceedings. But, seeing that their efforts were limited to these three measures, he wished to give notice, that, early in the next session—if he should then have the honour of a seat in the house—he should endeavour to lay before the house the result of the consideration which he had given to this subject. His first plan would have for its object, to limit the progress of the existing burthen. His second plan would be, to gradually narrow those limits. His third plan would have for its object, to equalize the burthen, so as that it might not be thrown on the land-owner only, but might affect, in something like an equal degree, the other classes of society.

Mr. Huskisson said, the committee were aware that other measures would be necessary, besides the three bills which they had introduced, to correct the evils of the present system. The subject, however, was one of great difficulty, and the hon. and learned gentleman would render an important service to the country, if he could devise any means by which, in time, the same extension of relief as existed at present would be no longer necessary. (Hear, hear.)

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY—MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.] The house went into a committee of supply, when the following sums were voted.

1.—14,246*l.* 12*s.* for sundry works proposed to be done at Holyhead.

2.—15,000*l.* for the purchase of land on Hounslow Heath for the exercise of cavalry.

3.—50,000*l.* towards defraying the expense of making an inland navigation from the Eastern to the Western sea, by Inverness and Fort William.

4.—2,397*l.* to pay retired allowances and gratuities to the officers and other persons formerly employed upon the military roads in Scotland, the management of which roads have been transferred to the commissioners for highland roads and bridges.

5.—120,000*l.* for such expenses of a civil nature in Great Britain as do not form part of the ordinary charges of the civil list.

6.—43,500*l.* for further making good the deficiencies of the fee funds.

7.—26,000*l.* for further defraying the contingent expenses and messengers' bills, in the departments of the treasury, three secretaries of state, and lord chamberlain.

8.—5,500*l.* for further defraying the salaries to the officers, and expenses of the court and receipt of exchequer.

9.—11,500*l.* for further defraying the expenses of the houses of lords and commons.

10.—23,500*l.* for further defraying the salaries and allowances to the officers of the houses of lords and commons.

11.—37,000*l.* towards further defraying the expenses of works and repairs of public buildings.

12.—10,000*l.* for the expense of making variations in the road between Bangor and Chirk.

13.—8,663*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* to be applied towards the expenses to be incurred in the management of the British Museum.

14.—3,626*l.* 8*s.* towards completing the improvements in Westminster.

15.—20,000*l.* towards building a bridge over the Menai Strait, near Bangor Ferry.

16.—1,000*l.* towards defraying the charge of the Veterinary College.

17.—78,058*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* to complete the expense of building the Royal Military College at Sandhurst.

18.—100,000*l.* for the augmentation of the maintenance of the poor clergy.

19.—10,000*l.* for the augmentation of the maintenance of the poorer clergy of Scotland.

20.—13,685*l.* 15*s.* 4*d.* to make up the total sum charged upon the fees arising in the exchequer.

21.—259,686*l.* 19*s.* 10½*d.* to make good the deficiency of the grants for the year 1817.

22.—18,000,000*l.* to pay off and discharge the exchequer bills issued by virtue of an act of the last session of parliament, for raising the sum of eighteen millions by exchequer bills, for the service of the year 1817, outstanding and unprovided for.

23.—850*l.* for the purchase of a lot of ground adjoining the branch of the Royal Military Asylum at Southampton, for the purposes of air and exercise.

FRENCH INDEMNITIES.] The house having resumed, it was moved that the report of the committee be brought up.

Mr. Warre rose and said, he considered this a proper opportunity for making a few observations on an account which he held in his hand, relating to the amount and application of the sums of money received from France, by virtue of the treaty or convention entered into at Paris, on the 20th of November, 1815. It appeared, that the sum of 125,000,000 of francs was stipulated to be paid to this country in the nature of an indemnity for the expenses we had incurred in the prosecution of the war. This sum, as far as it had been paid, he had expected to see brought in aid of the revenue for the domestic service of the year, and that this country would have been relieved to that extent. France had engaged to pay a certain sum for the maintenance of the British army of occupation. He recollected that copies of this treaty had been no sooner received, than a noble friend of his had declared in another place, that the sum was inadequate to its object; and it now appeared that a very considerable sum in addition had been employed as a donative to the British army, since the second occupation of Paris. Of the 125,000,000 of francs, about 61,000,000 had been received, and it was remarkable what had been its application. Above 14,000,000 had been paid into the military chest of France, towards the expenses of the army of occupation; and 8,000,000 had been applied in the same way in the form of prize-money. With respect to this, he had no objection to urge; but when he saw that a much larger sum, amounting to 1,400,000*l.* sterling, had been remitted to this country, he began to entertain hopes that we had gained something for the service of the year; but he soon discovered that it had been all sent back to France, and there expended for the use of the army. On looking at the whole amount of the money received from the French government, it would be seen that it was very considerable. We had agreed to relinquish our demand for prisoners of war, which amounted to 7,000,000 sterling, for a sum of 250,000,000 of francs. But now it appeared, that instead of obtaining any thing in aid of the revenue, the whole sum which had been received on account of the public had been applied in the prosecution of objects abroad.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that the sums received from France had enabled us to accomplish all the objects recognized by parliament as expedient, with a view to our present policy on the frontiers of the French territory, without bringing any charge upon this country. The new line of fortresses, the expense of which had been estimated at 2,000,000*l.*, had thus created no incumbrance upon our resources. If the hon. member had examined the former accounts, he would have seen that it never had been calculated that the French contributions would be sufficient to discharge all the expenses of the British army of occupation, whose pay and allowances were considerably greater than those of any of the allied forces. The money remitted here partly defrayed extraordinary charges arising in this country, and was partly sent back in a circuitous but necessary course of payments. The money payable by France never was intended in the shape of indemnity for the expenses of the war, but simply as a sum of money, useful as far as it would go, and applicable to any purpose. The fortifications in the Netherlands were important to us as a measure of general policy, and it should be recollected that we had received a consideration for the expense by the cession of the Dutch colonies. With regard to private claims, about three millions and a half had been received and applied to their liquidation; but as many still remained unsatisfied, and, being of a doubtful nature, were likely to be litigated, it had been judged most advisable to compromise them by accepting a round sum at once in lieu of them. He believed this arrangement was satisfactory to the British creditors; and, with respect to the claims for prisoners of war, it should be remembered, that there were counter-claims on the part of France, which considerably diminished the balance due to this country.

Mr. Tierney complained, that the house had no knowledge of the manner in which the sums paid by France had been expended. All they knew was, that a very exorbitant proportion of them had been applied to the service of the army, and that nothing was applicable to the necessities of this country at home. Where we expected to receive, all the consolation afforded by the noble lord for the disappointment was—that we had nothing to pay. Such was the result of the noble lord's diplomatic skill, after the shoutings with which he was hailed on his entrance into the house, after concluding the treaty! All the boastings, it now appeared, ended in nothing. He begged the house to recollect, that the general civil claims of the country had been compromised for one half of their amount. (Hear, hear.)

The report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS.] On the motion of Mr. Lushington, the house resolved itself into a committee of ways and means.

The hon. member then rose and moved, 1. That towards raising the supply granted to his Majesty, there be applied the sum of 250,000*l.* arisen from the sale of old naval and victualling stores.

2. That the sum of 800,000*l.* be raised by treasury bills, for the service of Ireland.

3. That the sum of 11,600,000*l.* be raised by exchequer bills, for the service of Great Britain.

The resolutions being agreed to,

Mr. Tierney rose, and made some observations respecting the delay in furnishing the house with the finance accounts for the year. He trusted that, in future, they would be laid upon the table early in the session, in order that members might have an opportunity of perusing and considering them, before the respective branches of the public services came to be discussed.

Mr. Goulburn stated, that the papers had been furnished a considerable time back, but were afterwards withdrawn, as the accounts from Ireland had not arrived. In another year, some new regulations would be adopted, in order that the accounts of both countries might be presented at the earliest possible period.

The resolutions were ordered to be reported to-morrow.

ALIEN BILL.] Lord Castlereagh moved that this bill be read a third time. It being read accordingly,

Mr. Brougham rose and proposed the following clause:—"Provided always, and be it further enacted, that every such alien, before being sent out of the country, shall receive notice the space of at least one month before he shall be so sent, and in case, during the said space of one month, any vessel shall sail to any kingdom, country, or place, where such alien may desire to be carried, shall have liberty to embark himself on board of such vessel, any thing in this act, or in the said recited act, to the contrary notwithstanding; provided always, that it shall and may be lawful to keep such alien in custody during the aforesaid space of one month, and until he shall have embarked on board of such vessel."

Lord Castlereagh opposed the clause. He said, that it would be very injurious to the objects of the bill; and as no grounds had been laid to shew that his Majesty's ministers had abused the powers with which they had been entrusted, he saw no occasion for it; and, besides, it would throw a considerable expense on the government, which, in such cases, they could not be expected to bear.

Lord Compton observed, that this and every country had a right to send foreigners away, but they had no right to send them wherever the government pleased. (Hear, hear.) He should therefore give his support to the clause. He voted for it, not from any suspicion that his Majesty's ministers would abuse their powers, but it should not be forgotten, that it was the nature of all power to be abused. Laws were not made to guard against what men would do, but to protect the people against what they might do. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Clive objected to the clause. He contended, that government ought not to be at the expense of sending foreigners to any part of the world to which they might be inclined to transport themselves.

Mr. Brougham expressed his astonishment that the noble secretary of state, and the hon. gentleman who spoke last, should put such a construction on this clause as they had done. They had, it seemed, discovered a new mode of interpreting acts of parliament, and he congratulated the hon. gentleman in having attained this knowledge so soon after his appointment. (A laugh.) They argued that the alien must be conveyed to any place—to Botany Bay, for instance, (a laugh)—at the expense of the government. Now, what was the fact? The clause said, that such alien should have liberty to embark himself on board a vessel, &c. Did this make out that the government was to bear the expense?—that a right to embark in the good ship Mary to Botany Bay, instead of Bourdeaux, (a laugh), or to Bourdeaux instead of Botany Bay, would subject the government to defray the expense of the stage-coach to the coast, the custom-house fees, the passage in the vessel, the charge for stores, the steward's dues, the boat on landing, and the porter for carrying the trunks to the White Bear Inn, or the Hotel de la Paix? (Loud laughter.) As this was the first opportunity he had had, and would, in all probability, be the last he should have, of expressing his sentiments on this subject, he now desired to enter his protest against the whole of the measure—to express his disapprobation, not to say his abhorrence, of it. With a view to save the time of the house, he would now propose another clause, and they might be discussed together. This clause was, to enable aliens to be heard by their counsel or agents, as well as by themselves, before the privy council. It was nothing more than a mockery, a mere nominal or verbal check, to provide that the alien himself, ignorant perhaps of the language, might be heard. The noble lord, on a former occasion, had said, that the alien might be accompanied by an interpreter; but it was not the interpretation of languages that was wanted; it was the habitus practicus interpretandi leges, and that could be performed only by a person conversant with the laws of the country. He lamented that this measure had been so little noticed by the public. Whenever a new tax was proposed, or an old one was sought to be repealed, the people rose from one end of the country to the other; but, on a point that so vitally affected the liberties of the constitution, and which would cast such a stain on our character in the eyes of Europe, they were totally indifferent, cold, and silent. It had been said, that the bill was for the guilty, and not for the innocent; but if such a power were granted, they might as well at once give the sword of justice to the crown, and let the cadi or the vizier, or whoever he might be, exercise the power of trying and transporting individuals at his pleasure. If the law were directed as seemed to be the intention, instead of guilty aliens, they might alter the word, and say guilty subjects. It was, in fact, neither more nor less than a suspension of the constitution. They were, indeed, in a sad condition, if they were to pass a measure of such vital importance, on such grounds—if they were to proceed as they had before done, upon reports which had been swollen and exaggerated till they reached and poisoned the easy ear of Lord St. Vincent. (Hear, hear, and confusion.) He should have said, of Lord Sidmouth; but if any apology were due to the house for the mistake he had made, it was much more due to the noble earl whose name he had so unluckily coupled with that of the present Secretary of State for the home department. No two men could be more dissimilar; and it was only because the contrast between the two was so striking, the energy and talents of the one so opposed to the inefficiency and deficiency of the other, that the two names had been brought together in his mind, and Earl St. Vincent's title obtruded upon the house in a debate with the subject of which he had no connexion. If he had been called upon to point out two individuals the direct reverse of each other in all particulars that qualified a man for a high office in the state, he could not have been more happy in his selection that when he mentioned Earl St. Vincent, and Viscount Sidmouth.—The hon. and learned gentleman concluded with declaring himself strongly against the bill, and hoping the clauses which he proposed would be accepted.

Mr. Canning said, that the practice of opposing every thing had grown of late too common with gentlemen on the other side. To throw in a little light and shade now and then would bring out the black in its place; but to cry out upon every occasion, was to cry 'wolf' to the country to no purpose, and to weaken any little authority which they might have had when their call was really serious. Notwithstanding all the elegant Latin and all the classical humour which the hon. and learned gentleman had applied to the purpose of his speech, he could agree neither with his Latin nor his humour. There was nothing introduced into the hon. and learned gentleman's clause relative to the alien who might wish to be transported to a particular part, that he should bear his own expenses. The whole expense was laid upon the country. That was the fact, and he defied the most practicus habitus man in the house to prove the contrary. The bill inflicted no imprisonment, but the hon. and learned gentleman's clause allowed a month's delay, till the ship should be procured in which the alien might be conveyed to the place of his choice, and during that time he was to be incarcerated. It would be recollected that a man had been sent to Hamburgh at his own desire, when ministers would have sent him to Ostend. Did that appear as if they were disposed to abuse their power? The second clause would change the whole nature of the bill. It would make it judicial instead of executive. The object of this bill was to guard against those melancholy scenes of bloodshed by which the continent had been wasted. If storms arose abroad, the shores of England could not but feel their violence. She must be shaken in her orbit, if the rest of the system were disturbed. It was, therefore, the duty of parliament to take measures to prevent the country from being overrun by the very pests and refuse of Europe—by those who, driven from their own country for their crimes, sought shelter in this until they could ripen into action their detestable machinations. Formerly, during the French revolution, these islands had been the refuge of all that was loyal and respectable; but the other side of the house were now desirous that the very reverse should happen, and that treasons, not only against ourselves, but against our neighbours, should be hatched in a country where, in the earlier ages, treason was almost unknown. The opposers of this measure seemed anxious that new scenes of glory and ambition should be opened to those who had learnt no lesson from the calamities of their country, but how to avail themselves of its distresses to procure their own aggrandizement. (Hear, hear.) Did not the publications which daily arrived from the Netherlands prove, that a set of malignant spirits were there hovering about, who still hoped to undo the work of peace, and to rekindle the flames of war. As yet they could find no spot where to begin their diabolical operations, no station whence they could launch their engines of destruction. Like the famous geometrician of Syracuse, they wanted a resting-place for their lever, that they might shake the world with ease. The answer which this bill gave them was, "You shall not stand here." (Loud cheers.) But a few years had elapsed since England was the depository of the hopes and fortunes of the world. All longing eyes were turned to her, and marked her standard above the smoke of battle. She had stood firm in the most impetuous torrent, unshaken in the rudest shock of war; and what man, who loved the glory of his country, or valued the liberty of the world, would consent even to the chance that it might become the unsuspecting prey to secret and foreign enemies? It might be said, that this bill was offering a slight violence to the constitution; but he was convinced that, at most, it was a temporary sacrifice to secure the tranquillity achieved by our victories, and for such a purpose it was not only justifiable but necessary. As to the persons to whom the power should be intrusted, that was a matter of little consequence, and he should feel content if it were reposed in any English gentleman competent to fill the office of a minister of state. He could most conscientiously say, that if the hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, he would cheerfully confide this power to them; and from them he only required for himself and his colleagues a similar degree of confidence.

Sir F. Burdett said, he rested his opposition to this bill upon the ancient laws and constitution of the country. If magna charta were yet to be respected—if it were not a disgrace at this time of day to refer to its salutary provisions, he should point it out to the house as affording abundant reason for rejecting this measure. The right hon. gentleman who spoke last had complained that the hon. and learned mover had, on frequent occasions, cried wolf! wolf! when no such ravenous animal was at hand, but while ministers persevered in measures like the present, the cry could not be too often repeated; the danger was not only at hand, but in execution; wolf! wolf! ought to have long been the cry all over the country, for the unhappy people had long suffered under the rending jaws and talons of pitiless and insatiable wolves. (Cheers.) The hon. baronet argued that the laws of this country which governed its own natives, were sufficient to regulate the conduct of foreigners, and to punish their malpractices; and consequently, that the object of this bill, like many others, was only to lodge power in the hands of the crown, in order that it might be abused. The right hon. gentleman had asserted that, during the French revolution, this country had been the refuge of all that was loyal and respectable; but these were mere words, and he had offered no proofs; indeed, it would be much more correct to state, that it had become the lurking-place of all that was degraded and despotic—of those who fled from the revenge of an injured and oppressed people, struggling to regain their liberties. The real object of this alien bill was, to aid that European conspiracy in which the noble lord opposite had taken so active a part, and the effect of it would be to destroy that character for generosity and hospitality by which the people of England had been hitherto distinguished. Another effect would be to drive all the talent and industry of Europe to that now only free country in the world, America. The right hon. gentleman had objected to what he called making the measure judicial, and for the plain reason, that it established some control over the conduct of ministers. It would compel them to be less arbitrary and despotic, because they might be brought before another tribunal—the usual pretence of ministerial responsibility, by which the house had been so frequently juggled, though the country could not quite so easily be deceived. That responsibility had been used and abused with regard to our own subjects, who had been tyrannically and unconstitutionally imprisoned, and was it to be supposed, that it would be more respected when the defenceless subjects of other states were concerned? Responsibility in the first instance was usually converted into indemnity in the last, as was proved in the case of the habeas corpus suspension; in fact, ministers were no more controlled by this stalking-horse responsibility, than they had been by the natural feelings of humanity and the dictates of conscience. (Hear.)

Sir S. Romilly was anxious to embrace this last opportunity of resisting the progress of this bill. It was urged, that its operation would be confined to criminal foreigners, and yet, with singular inconsistency, the right hon. gentleman had objected to the clause which gave the party accused an opportunity of stating his own case, and being heard by counsel; so that, in fact, that measure which was to be directed against criminal foreigners, was to be so framed that no means were allowed to ascertain whether they were innocent or guilty. (Hear.) The right hon. gentleman had also said, that he should be satisfied if the power were lodged in the hands of an English gentleman. Undoubtedly the Secretary of State for the home department was a gentleman, and of course the right hon. gentleman must be contented that the execution of the bill was entrusted to him; it was of no consequence whether he had the talents or the foresight which became a great officer of state—whether he was likely to become the dupe of spies and informers—he was an English gentleman, and that was enough. (Hear, hear, hear.) The right hon. gentleman never thought of satisfying the country—if he were satisfied, nothing more was necessary. He had also asserted, that France could not be disturbed internally or externally, without such an effect being produced upon England that she must necessarily be embroiled in the contest. Surely, this was most alarming intelligence in the present state of our finances, and coming from such a quarter. It was much to be dreaded that, should the tranquillity of France at any future period be disturbed, the people of Great Britain would be called upon to bear new burthens, and to undergo new privations for the support of that interest which ministers thought fit to espouse. (Hear.) The right hon. gentleman had reproached his hon. and learned friend with inconsistency in opposing these injurious and unconstitutional measures. Doubtless, judging from the conduct of the right hon. gentleman, he held it a disgrace to adhere to the same opinions or to the same friends. (Hear, hear.) He enjoyed all the advantages of inconsistency, and those who resisted this measure could long ago have partaken of those honours, if they would have consented to the same mental degradation to procure them. (Loud cheers.) The only danger pointed out by the right hon. gentleman, arose from a few discontented individuals in the Netherlands, who sought a fulcrum for their engine of destruction; but it was singular that, as this was the only danger, it had been broached that night for the first time. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Canning explained. He did not mean to state, that if France were disturbed by internal commotions, this country must necessarily be involved in war: he had only referred to certain foreigners, who were attempting to engage the two nations in new hostilities.

Mr. Barham opposed the bill. He said, it was grounded on mere possibilities of danger, and was calculated to make us parties in all transactions between foreign governments and their subjects. It was wholly gratuitous and uncalled for, and was inconsistent with the spirit of our laws.

Mr. W. Smith opposed the bill, as sapping the best principles of the constitution, and affording no advantage whatever.

Sir J. Newport contended, that, by the effect of this bill, the blood of Britons, at the battle of Waterloo, had been shed in vain, and that tyranny, by being permitted in one place, would spring up in another. He would not intrust such powers to any party, and he hoped, that the house would not suffer the measure to pass.

The house then divided on Mr. Brougham's clause.

Ayes, 35—Noes, 87.

LIST OF THE MINORITY.

Astell, W.
Althorp, Vis.
Babington, T.
Baker, J.
Barham, J.
Barnett, J.
Brougham, H.
Burdett, Sir F.
Byng, G.
Compton, Earl of Carter, J.
Duncannon, Vis.
Fazakerly, N.
Fergusson, Sir R. C.
Finlay, K.
Folkestone, Vis.
Gordon, R.
Howorth, H.
Hurst, R.
Jervoise, G. P.
Lemon, Sir W.
Macintosh, Sir J.
Markham, Adm.
Martin, J.
Newport, Sir J.
Parnell, W.
Philips, G.
Ramsden, J. C.
Ridley, Sir M.
Romilly, Sir S.
Smith, R.
Symonds, T. P.
Tavistock, Marquis of Tierney, Right Hon. G.
Warre, J. A.

TELLERS.

Douglas, Hon. F. S.
Smith, W.

Sir S. Romilly then moved a clause, to exempt from the operation of the bill aliens who were resident in Great Britain or Ireland on the 1st of January, 1814, and who had ever since continued to reside therein.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that foreigners, although long resident in the united kingdom, might be made the instruments of mischief.

Sir S. Romilly replied, so might natives—the next step therefore of government ought to be directed against them.

The clause was negatived without a division.

Mr. Brougham then proposed a clause, to exempt "women married to natural born subjects of the realm, or to persons who have been naturalized."

Lord Compton thought, that the house were bound in honour to admit this clause. (Hear, hear.)

The house divided.

Ayes, 37—Noes, 87.

The question was then put, "That the bill do pass."

The house divided.

Ayes, 94—Noes, 29.

PURCHASE OF GAME BILL.] This bill was read a third time and passed.

EAST INDIA DOCKS.] A petition of several ship-owners and merchants engaged in the East India trade, complaining of the want of accommodation, and the delays which occur in the East India docks, and that the rates which are charged by the company are excessive; and a petition of the chairman, deputy chairman, and directors of the East India Dock Company, praying to be heard, by their counsel, agents, and witnesses, against the allegations contained in the former petition, were referred to a committee to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their observations thereupon, to the house.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Saturday, May 23.

ROYAL ASSENT.] The royal assent was given by commission to the Pardons under the Great Seal bill*, and several private bills.—The com-

* The effect of a Pardon under the Great Seal is, to make the offender a new man; to acquit him of all corporal penalties and forfeitures annexed to that offence for which he obtained his pardon; and not so much to restore his former, as to give him a new credit and capacity. A pardon pleaded before sentence is past, stops the attainder, and prevents the corruption of blood; which, when once corrupted by attainder, cannot afterwards be restored, otherwise than by act of parliament. If therefore a man has a son, and is attainted, and afterwards pardoned by the king, this son can never inherit to the father, or father's ancestors; because, his paternal blood, being once thoroughly corrupted by his father's attainder, must continue so; but if the son had been born after the pardon, he might inherit; because by the pardon the father is made a new man, and may convey new inheritable blood to his after-born children. (Co. Litt. 392.)—If a man has issue a son, and is attainted, and afterwards pardoned, and then has issue a second son, and dies; here the corruption of blood is not removed from the eldest, and therefore he cannot be heir: neither can the youngest be heir, for he has an elder brother living, of whom the law takes notice, as he once had a possibility of being heir: and therefore the younger brother shall not inherit, but the land shall escheat to the lord; though had the elder died without issue in the life of the father, the younger son born after the pardon might well have inherited, for he has no corruption of blood. (Ibid. 8.)—So if a man has issue two sons, and the elder in the lifetime of the father has issue and then is attainted and executed, and afterwards the father dies, the lands of the father shall not descend to the younger son: for the issue of the elder, which had once a possibility to inherit, shall impede the descent to the younger, and the land shall escheat to the lord. (Dyer, 48.)—But if the ancestor be attainted, his sons, whether born before or after the attainder, can inherit to each other. (1. Hal. P. C. 357.)—Where a new felony is created by act of parliament, and it is provided (as is frequently the case) that it shall not extend to corruption of blood: here the lands of the felon shall not escheat to the lord, but yet the profits of them shall be forfeited to the king for a-year and a-day, and so long after as the offender lives. (3 Inst. 47.)

Upon the subject of forfeiture and corruption of blood, Mr. Hume, 2 Comm. cap. 17, p. 364, writes thus concerning the law of Scotland. "By custom time out of mind, every capital sentence is attended with a farther consequence, the confiscation, or escheat as we call it, of all the convict's moveable goods and substance, to h's Majesty's use; to which effect the sentence bears a general declaration, and an order and authority to the proper officers, to collect and bring in the effects. This had become the law of Rome under the emperors; but it is the cusmissioners were, the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Winchilsea, and the Earl of Shaftesbury.

SPANISH SLAVE TRADE TREATY BILL.] This bill was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Saturday, May 23.

GRAND JURY PRESENTMENTS BILL.] This bill was read a third time and passed.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.] The resolutions of this committee were reported, and agreed to by the house.

WAYS AND MEANS.] The resolutions of this committee were reported, and bills, founded upon them, ordered to be brought in.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, May 25.

IRISH GRAND JURY PRESENTMENTS BILL.] This bill was brought from the Commons, and read a first time.

IRISH FEVER HOSPITALS BILL.] This bill was brought from the Commons, and read a first time.

REGENCY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.] The house having resolved itself into a committee on this bill,

The Lord Chancellor rose and said, that in consequence of the objections made by some noble lords to the mode of increasing the queen's council as originally provided in the bill, he had already intimated his willingness to agree to the nomination being made by parliament, as was the case with respect to the first council appointed under the regency act. He should, therefore, now mention the names he intended to propose for insertion in the bill, subject to the approval of their lordships. To the present number of the queen's council, which consisted of eight persons, he proposed the addition of four, making the whole of that body twelve. If any of the persons nominated by parliament should decline to act, or if any vacancy should otherwise occur, he proposed that her Majesty should retain the power which she had under the present act of filling up the vacancy. He then proposed the following names, on each of which the question was put, and carried in the affirmative without opposition:—George, earl of Macclesfield; William, lord bishop of London; Alleyne, Lord St. Helens; Morton, Lord Henley, of Ireland.

On the first clause of the bill being read,

Lord Holland rose and observed, that the house ought not to proceed with the enactments of this bill, without a strict examination of its necessity. There was nothing stated in the preamble which in any way accounted for the clauses that followed. From the nature of the clauses in the bill it was to be inferred that his Majesty's recovery was no longer an event to be anticipated. But if they were now, for the first time since the passing of the regency act, to legislate on the principle that his Majesty's recovery was not probable, the measure ought to be preceded by an inquiry into that fact. If that probability no longer existed, why bring in a bill merely to remedy the inconvenience which it was the object of this bill to remove, when there were so many circumstances which rendered the revision of the whole regency act necessary? That act was passed with a view to the probability of his Majesty's recovery. Every measure then adopted, on the suggestion of the noble lords opposite and their friends, had a reference to that event. Their lordships were told, as an excuse for the expense of the Windsor establishment, that it was proper his Majesty should, on his recovery, find again about him all that state to which he had been accustomed. But if the probability of recovery had now ceased, ought not their lordships to proceed to a reconsideration of the whole subject of the tom also of several nations, who have not the same regard to the Roman law that we have, and has probably been derived to us from a less remote source. Except in cases of treason, the forfeiture of property on capital conviction, has never, at any period of our practice, extended to the real or heritable estate; which, in England, at this day, seems to fall as escheat to the lord of the fee, in all cases of petty treason or felony. In this respect also, our custom is less rigorous than that of England, as we have never admitted that fictitious corruption of blood, consequent with them on attainder of felony; whereby all descent of property to the felon's kindred is obstructed, wherever they have to connect a title of inheritance through him to any of their predecessors."

Buchanan (Rerum Scotic. l. 4.) says, that Mogaldus (the 23d king of Scotland, A. D. 138.) was the author of that unjust and barbarous law which declares, that all the goods and chattels of condemned criminals shall be forfeited to the crown, excluding their wives and children from any part of them. His words are these: "Mogaldus, avitæ gloriæ oblitus, in vitia præceps abiit: ac præter alia facinora fœda, et publicè perniciosa, legem iniquissimam condidit, ut damnatorum bona fisco addicerentur, nullam in partem liberis et uxoribus admissis. Eam legem etsi omnibus iniquam, et inhumanam et tum intelligerent, et nunc intelligant, tamen à fisci procuratoribus, qui Regum cupiditatibus lenocinantur, hac etiam ætate defenditur."

Innocent children ought not to be punished for the crimes which their parents committed. It is lamentable to reflect on the prejudices of mankind, even in this country, and in this enlightened age; but let those who may chance to be descended from parents who violated the laws of their country, or transgressed the rules of civil society, console themselves with this advice of the poet:

——Ne perge queri, casusque priorum
Annumerare tibi. Nec culpa nepotibus obstat.
Tu modo dissimilis, rebus mereare secundis
Excusare tuos. (Statius Thebaid, l. 1.)

Lament no more, nor to yourself misplace,
The crimes or fortunes of a former race.
Our parents' guilt but to themselves extends,
Taints not the blood, nor to the sons descends;
By your own worth you blot out the disgrace,
And raise the faded lustre of your race.

regency. He, therefore, could not agree to the first clause of this bill, unless it were to be followed up by many other provisions, which were in his mind equally necessary and urgent.

The Earl of Liverpool reminded their lordships of the circumstances under which the regency act had been passed. There had been then great differences of opinion on the question of limitations, and one of the grounds on which those limitations were defended, certainly was the probability of his Majesty's recovery. After a year had elapsed, and the state of that probability was to a certain degree altered, the limitations were removed. He should be sorry to say, at any time, that the probability of his Majesty's recovery had ceased; but parliament, in enacting any measures relative to the regency, must necessarily legislate on the greater or less degree of that probability. With regard to ascertaining the nature of the probability, there could be no necessity for any measure; for their lordships must be aware, that a quarterly report of the state of his Majesty's health was regularly made by the attending physicians. Would it be advisable, then, to subject the country to the chance of the inconvenience which this bill was calculated to prevent, in order to an inquiry for which there was no necessity whatever?

Earl Grey, in reply to what had fallen from the noble earl on the subject of the limitations in the regency, observed, that the whole of the regal powers were given for the public benefit, and that they should, therefore, be fully and entirely vested in the person who was placed at the head of the executive government. With regard to the present measure, in what case did their lordships find themselves? They knew of no difference in the situation of his Majesty since the passing of the act, except by a longer continuance of his malady. But the noble earl had said, that no report was wanted, because a quarterly report was made by the physicians. Their lordships had, however, no information on the important question of the probability of his Majesty's recovery. Why had it never before been proposed to alter the regency act? The noble earl was of opinion, that the country might sustain much inconvenience if this bill were not agreed to; but the country had been exposed to that inconvenience, whatever it was, ever since the passing of the former act. That act, which provided for the reassembling of the old parliament on the demise of the queen, was passed with a view to the security of his Majesty's person: but if that important provision were now repealed, it must be admitted that the measure proceeded on the ground, that his Majesty was now in a state which required in a less degree the care and anxiety of parliament. If they legislated on this principle, it was obvious that the provisions of the bill ought to be far more large and extensive. There were many things to be provided for, but he should at present mention only one. In the case of the king's death, after a dissolution, the parliament reassembled, and the regency bill placed the demise of the Prince Regent on the same footing; but as the Prince Regent exercised the royal authority in the name and on behalf of his Majesty, it was possible that some difficulty might arise if the writs for a new election were issued. It was his opinion that in such a case the writs would be abrogated; yet doubts perhaps would arise which might create considerable embarrassment to the returning officer. He therefore proposed that, in case of the demise of the Prince Regent after a dissolution of parliament, the writs issued for a new election should cease and determine.

The Lord Chancellor adverted to the quarterly report, which, he observed, was drawn up by the queen's council, and was never made without taking into consideration the opinion of the physicians on the probability of his Majesty's recovery. These reports were laid before the privy council, and might be called for by parliament.—The noble and learned lord then proposed clauses, with a view to the possible event of the queen's demise, after the day appointed for the meeting of a new parliament, and to obviate the difficulty stated by the noble earl, with regard to the possible event of the demise of the Prince Regent, his opinion being, that the king's writ would not in that case be vacated.

These amendments were agreed to, and the house resumed.

Poor Laws Amendment Bill.] The Earl of Hardwicke moved the commitment of this bill. His lordship went over the several clauses, and observed, that the bill was not to be considered as a solitary measure, but as part of a system intended for the reform of the poor laws.

The Marquis of Lansdowne declared his opinion, that the measure was essentially at variance with the most important principles of public economy and private morals. It came recommended by the committee of the other house on the poor laws; but he must say, without any disrespect to that committee, that the public were far more benefited by the principles they had laid down in their report, than by the bills which they had founded upon it. In legislating on the poor laws, one principle ought to be kept in view: if their lordships could not venture to cut off the springs of that inundation of evil which had overspread the land, they ought at least to take care not to legislate on the same vicious principle, the force of which had increased with the duration of the system. That system was better described in the report of the House of Commons than it could be by any words of his. The passage in the report to which he alluded, stated the infallible effect of compulsory contributions for the maintenance of the poor, to be the abatement of those exertions and that industry in the labouring classes, on which the happiness of mankind depended, and the checking of the impulse of natural affection. This principle, so ably and truly stated in the report, was totally irreconcileable with the provision in the bill, which made it lawful for overseers to take the children of paupers from their parents, and consign them to the care of a workhouse. This provision, which held out to the inconsiderate that their children were to be taken from them and maintained at the public expense, might lead to that effect which an eminent writer on political economy had pointed out as the consequence of infanticide being permitted by the laws of China, and which was the great cause of the misery to which a vast portion of the overloaded population of that country was reduced *. This bill created the certainty of getting rid of the burthen of a numerous family, and therefore removed all that prospect of difficulty which ought to be taken into consideration in contracting marriage. Its effect would be to foster new generations of paupers, who would look to the workhouse as their inheritance, and who would rely on the public, not on their own industry, for their maintenance. The expense of this mode of providing for the children ought also to be considered. A child could not be maintained by the parish for less than 20*l.*; but it was needless to observe, that a much smaller sum given for the relief of the family to which the child belonged would be sufficient. What, too, would be the moral effect of the separation? Any system of education which was not founded on the interchange of the domestic affections was vicious. God and nature had rendered the cherishing of these affections as necessary to the strengthening of moral character as healthy exercise was to the physical constitution of children.—This bill then went to establish a system which would counteract what had been hitherto with pride regarded as the distinctive character of Englishmen. At 12 years of age, the children which had been separated from their parents were to be returned to them. But would the parents, whose affections the law had thus endeavoured to extinguish, receive them? And if they refused, what would the parliament do with them? He was aware it ought to be said, on the other hand, that many parents would be averse to part with their children, and make every exertion to retain them; but the temptation to improvidence was so great, and the distress occasioned by that improvidence so pressing, that few would be able to act on such pleasing impulses. The only true remedy for the evil was to breed up the lower classes with the idea that they must depend on their own exertions alone for support.—Another clause to which he felt a great objection was, that which enabled parish officers to buy land for the purpose of employing those who could not find work. If the land were poor, it could only be cultivated at a loss, and the poor-rates must be increased to the amount of that loss; if the land were rich, the cultivation of it with parish funds would be an injury to those who laboured for their own support. The whole enactment was the result of that unfortunate principle that held it out as possible to create a demand for labour, whatever the circumstances of the country, or the state of manufactures and commerce, might be—a principle so absurd that it was at once subversive of itself. If this principle were not abandoned, wages must be brought to the lowest limit that human misery could endure. In fact, the magistrates at Birmingham had on this principle lowered the wages of the nailers, and told them, that they must make up the difference with relief out of the poor-rates. He, therefore, entreated the house to consider whether the perseverance in this system would not plunge the community into an irretrievable danger, which could only end in a convulsion.

The house then went into the committee, in which the clause for taking children from their parents was withdrawn, without a division.

The Marquis of Lansdowne, the Earl of Harrowby, and Earl Grosvenor, having made some observations on other clauses of the bill, and several verbal alterations having been agreed to, the house divided on the clause for rating the landlords of houses let at a rent above 4*l.* and under 20*l.*

Contents, 17—Not Contents, 7.

* About 9000 children are said to be annually exposed in the city of Pekin, and the same number in the rest of the empire.—Among the Hindoos, children are hung up on trees in baskets, and devoured by birds of prey; and female infants among the Rajpoot Hindoos are destroyed by starving. See Buchanan's Mem. on India, App. pp. 94 and 97.—Nothing could be more pitiable than the state of infancy in some of the most celebrated nations of antiquity. Lycurgus not only permitted, but enjoined the murder of sickly or deformed infants. (Plut. in Lyc.)—And Aristotle (Pol. l. 7. c. 16.) and Plato (de Rep. l. 5.) both give a decided opinion in favour of this execrable practice. Romulus allowed the murder of infants, and it does not appear that this practice was forbidden by any subsequent law. Some think it was confirmed by the twelve tables. (Vide Dion. Halic. Rom. Antiq. l. 2.) The Roman law considered children not as persons but as things; it extended its severity even to the adult. A slave could be sold only once, a son three times; and he might be imprisoned, scourged, exiled, or put to death by the pater-familias, without appeal to any other tribunal. The father could compel his married daughter to repudiate a husband whom she tenderly loved, and whom he himself had approved. (L'Esprit des Loix, T. iii. Liv. 26. c. 3. p. 75.)—The first Christian emperor, in order to prevent the destruction of grown children by their father (a practice at that time too frequent) ordained, that the public should maintain the children of those who were unable to provide for them. (Taylor's Civil Law, p. 406.)—The exposure of infants, however, still prevailed. This he also restrained by an edict, in the year 331; and under the emperors Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian, this crime was made a capital offence. (Ibid. p. 406.)

Parish Vestries Bill.] This bill went through a committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, May 25.

Irish Fever Hospitals Bill.] This bill was read a third time and passed.

Finance Committee.] Mr. D. Gilbert brought up the 11th report of the committee on finance. It was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Lead Mines Assessment Bill.] Mr. Morrit moved the second reading of this bill.

Mr. Brougham objected to the measure, as extending the liability to the poor-rates, instead of narrowing it, as sound policy seemed to him to require. He suggested the propriety of postponing the subject till another session.

Mr. Morrit contended, that the bill was only to prevent an evasion of the present laws. He thought that all mines should be subject to the rates, or all should be exempted.

Mr. D. Gilbert said that the object of the bill was, to make all the proprietors, whether they received their dues in money or kind, alike rateable. He approved of the measure, and on this occasion should give a vote which directly clashed with his own interest.

Sir C. Monck opposed the bill, and Lord Lascelles supported it.

Mr. S. Bourne contended for the propriety of putting lead mines on the same footing as coal mines, with regard to their liability to the poor-rate.

Sir J. Graham expressed a wish, that the bill should be postponed till the next session. With that view, he proposed, that it should be read a second time that day six months.

The question being put, that the bill be now read a second time, the house divided.

Ayes, 72—Noes, 54.

Charitable Funds.] Mr. Brougham rose and said, that some years ago, an individual had bequeathed a large sum of money, amounting to 120,000*l.* to charitable purposes. The will, on account of some informality, was set aside; and the testator having no kindred, the property devolved to the crown. He conceived that this sum of money would form a proper fund for meeting the expense of the commission about to inquire into the grants for the education of the poor; and with that view, he moved, that an humble address be presented to his royal highness the Prince Regent, for "an account of all sums of money received by the crown under the will of Samuel Troutback, esq. dated 21st July 1780, and the application of the said sums."—Ordered.

Privilege of Parliament.] Mr. Speaker begged to call the attention of the house to a subject of considerable importance, as it affected the order and dignity of their proceedings. A trial had lately taken place in a court of law, namely, the case of the King against Merceron, in which the short-hand writer of the house had been examined, relative to the practice of the house in its committees, and to what passed in them. In all former cases, application had been made either to the house, or to the speaker, for permission to examine their witnesses. This had occurred in an instance where Mr. Gurney, the present short-hand writer, was examined. He found, however, upon communication with that gentleman, that he was not till now aware of the existence of this necessary form, the parties in the preceding case having made the application to the house without his knowledge. This explanation certainly accounted for the irregularity; but it should be understood that the necessity of a permission, which applied to the production of the journals, extended to all evidence taken before that house or its committees. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Bathurst said, that he would move a resolution of privilege to-morrow.

Settlement of the Poor Bill.] Mr. S. Bourne moved the order of the day for the further consideration of the report on this bill, for the purpose of postponing it. The order being read, the hon. member moved, that the report be taken into further consideration on this day three months.—Ordered.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, May 26.

Building of Churches Bill.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

Bank Restriction Bill.] The Earl of Liverpool rose to move the commitment of this bill. He said, he had already had several opportunities of stating the grounds on which he considered this measure necessary. He had, in particular, very recently had an opportunity of stating his views, when the noble earl opposite moved for a committee, to inquire into the state of the coin and paper-currency of the country. Having had those opportunities, it would not be necessary for him to enter into detail on the present occasion; still, however, it might be desirable that he should give a short statement of the reasons on which he supported the bill, before he made the motion for going into the committee, and he would rely on the indulgence of their lordships, if it should be necessary for him to give any further explanation in the course of the discussion. He had already stated, that delay in the resumption of cash-payments did not arise in want of preparation by the Bank, in any thing connected with our domestic situation or ordinary foreign relations; but it was matter of notoriety that there were depending in France, transactions of a financial nature, which must necessarily have a great influence on the circulation of this and every other country in Europe. Their lordships were aware, that a financial operation, which took place last year, had produced a very unfavourable effect on our exchanges. That, however, would have been easily got over, had it not been connected with the prospect of other financial measures, which were in contemplation for the present year. Their lordships knew that the engagements into which France had entered were partly financial, partly political. Under these engagements an arrangement had lately been made between the French government and the allied powers for payment of the contributions fixed in 1815, and the discharge of the claims of private individuals in foreign countries. The object which the French government had in view by this arrangement was, to pay off the whole of the claims in the course of three years, instead of five, the time originally fixed—that is to say, to anticipate the payments of the 4th and 5th years. In consequence of the stipulations entered into under this arrangement, the government of France would find it necessary to raise more than 30,000,000 sterling within a very limited period. Now, when their lordships recollected the effect which had been produced on the exchanges last year, by a far more inconsiderable operation, what must they expect to be the consequence of so large a demand as this? It was certainly desirable that the exchanges should be favourable at the moment the Bank resumed payments in cash; and, though in an ordinary state of things it was not difficult to restore the exchanges to an advantageous state, it would not be advisable that the act should expire just at the moment when they happened to be unfavourable. But if the feeling existed, that the resumption of cash-payments would be improper at such a time, how much more strongly ought it to be felt when the unfavourable state of the exchanges did not arise out of any circumstances connected with the ordinary transactions of commerce, but out of a financial operation of the nature and magnitude of that to which he had referred? A noble marquis opposite had on a former occasion asserted that foreign loans never could form a ground for such a measure as the present; and instanced the effect of the loans made in Holland and in this country. With what the noble marquis had stated on the subject of these loans, he was ready on general principles to agree; and if the present measure applied to ordinary circumstances, would give him the full benefit of his argument. But had the transaction which he had described, growing out of an arrangement for the payment of military contributions to the powers which had occupied France, and claims of individuals on the government of that country, arising during a revolution of twenty-seven years, the nature and character of an ordinary loan? Could such an uncommon and extensive financial operation be compared to any loans ever made by foreign powers, either in London or Amsterdam? The question for their lordships to consider was, whether, acquainted as they were with the existence of that operation, and with the effects it must have, or, he would say, might have, they would choose to pass the present bill, or expose the country to the risk which would arise from its rejection? Were the risk much less than he thought it was, he certainly, for one, would not be bold enough to allow the act to expire without submitting to their lordships a proposition for its renewal. He knew it had been stated, that his argument on this subject was fallacious. It was stated, that the remittances occasioned by any loan made in this country would always be paid in goods. He would not enter into any argument on this point. The remittances would doubtless be made in the way most consistent with the interest of the individuals concerned. (Hear, hear.) Goods would be exported when the exchanges were favourable: but it was only to a limited extent that this could be expected to take place under such extraordinary circumstances. It was certain that a great artificial drain could not be made on a country without its injurious influence being felt. It was therefore quite unnecessary to discuss this topic. It had also been asserted, that the difficulty experienced in the resumption of cash-payments was owing to the great advances made by the Bank to the government. The same thing had been stated to have been the case of the original suspension. There had been considerable authorities for that opinion, but the idea was unfounded. The advances made to government had not, he was convinced, occasioned the first suspension; and he was equally confident that the present advances were not the cause of the continuance of the measure. But, if it were true that the Bank was in an unfavourable situation in that respect, that would be a reason for giving farther time, and would afford an additional argument for the present bill. Government were in the course of paying up the advances; and they were already repaid to a greater extent than they had been in 1797. If, therefore, any persons really thought that the whole difficulty lay in advances made to government by the Bank, they ought to support this bill, in order to give time to government to complete the measures which had been adopted for reducing them. His lordship concluded by moving that the house resolve itself into a committee on the bill.

Lord Grenville expressed the greatest disappointment at the statement he had just heard from the noble earl. He was one of those who had given entire credit to the grounds on which it had before been proposed to continue the Bank restriction for two years longer. He should be trespassing too much on their lordships' time, if he were to tread back the past history of that unfortunate transaction. Even at the commencement of the last war, he thought it a matter of great impolicy to acquire, not a facility of supplying the wants of the country, but to burthen it with a dreadful difficulty, to which its resources could not be equal but by the greatest sacrifices. Satisfied as he was then, and confirmed as he was now, that there never had been a more fatal measure than the commencing and continuing of the suspension of cash-payments, he looked with the greatest anxiety to the time when we should be again free from that clog. He had always been far from thinking that the six months which had been promised, or that one year after the conclusion of the war, would be too long a period for the resumption of those payments. But if he felt or stated fewer objections at the time the continuation of the restrictions for two years was proposed, it was because he confidently believed that parliament had given the country a sacred pledge, which nothing but the most urgent necessity, such as a general failure of the Bank at least, could tempt them to relinquish—a pledge which he deemed so inviolable, that nothing but insuperable difficulties should induce them to renew the restriction. Not only on account of the public, but on account of the Bank itself, it was high time that the truth should be known. It was not fitting to go on with what was called restriction and restraint, if that restraint were in truth no other than indulgence granted to the Bank (hear) for the purpose of paying their creditors in depreciated paper. (Hear.) That, in effect, was the privilege that was given to the Bank; and when the noble earl talked of danger to the Bank, he should also have some consideration for the ends of distributive justice, and the dictates of common honesty, and consider what was due to creditors whose debts were paid in paper sunk five per cent. below the value that it represented. Before the house passed a measure of that importance, they should clearly know how the matter stood—whether it were an indulgence to the Bank proprietors, under the name of a restraint, or a measure affecting them against their wishes, and calculated for the public welfare alone. Whatever name was given to the transaction, it was admitted that it was not disagreeable to the Bank in the first instance, though doubts were now thrown out, that that body did not any longer acquiesce in it. It was necessary, therefore, to inquire, whether, in a great commercial nation like this there could exist any grounds for compelling the Bank to defeat the claims of its creditors. However, if it were really true that this measure was against the wishes of the Bank, we should have something more than a mere negative. If a proposal of the same description were made by government on behalf of the great banking-houses in London; if it were stated that the house of Hope, of Drummond, or of Child were likely to be distressed in attempting to pay their creditors, and that therefore it was expedient to pass a law enacting that they should be restrained from doing so, was there one of them that would not come forward and remonstrate, not only as to the injustice of such a measure with respect to their creditors, but its oppression with regard to themselves? Would they not say, that to compel such injustice would not only be against their feelings, but destructive of their credit; that it was only by the opinion entertained of their ability to satisfy the claims of their creditors, that they had risen to the degree of opulence which they at present enjoyed; that to destroy their responsibility was to destroy their solvency, and alter the very essence of their commercial establishments? But in whatever light the Bank of England might view these transactions, whether as a restraint to which they were willing to submit, or, as was sometimes insinuated, as measures in which they unwillingly acquiesced, the great interest to which parliament was bound to look, was that of the country, and looking at that, he never could be induced to give his consent to such a measure, even for the shortest period, on reasons so problematical as those which the noble earl had urged. At the commencement of this system we had been told that the existence of the country depended upon its adoption, though it was then admitted that the resumption of cash-payments would be an operation of great delicacy. It was now contended, that this was not the period for such a resumption, and that we ought to look to a time when it might be more convenient. This, however, was not a question of convenience: the measure could be justified only by imperious necessity. All men agreed, whether practical or scientific, that a metallic currency was the only proper basis of circulation. With this principle admitted, they were now called upon to substitute paper in its place, knowing that paper must continually vary at the will or caprice of the Bank, and according to their views of profit. They were required to give to that body an absolute control over the property of every man in the kingdom. Was this mere theory, or did they exercise the power as he had described it? They issued paper at one period until it was depreciated to the extent of 25 per cent. below the currency it represented; so that no man received his rent without suffering a loss of 25 per cent., or more. At that period when landlords felt the mockery of being paid 75 per cent. only on the amount of their rent, when the state creditor lost one-fourth of his dividend, and creditors as much of their debt, how did government meet the calamity which affected all classes of society? By enacting a law, which made that depreciated currency a legal tender, imitating thereby the worst conduct of the worst government that had ever disgraced the country. In this might be seen the error of surrendering the management of our currency to a class of men, who adapted their issues rather to promote their own gain, than to supply the wants of the country. That such was the case was clear, from the fact that, in the face of all this depreciation, the issues of the Bank had doubled, if not trebled, in amount. In all this he meant no imputation on the Bank. The objects of the Banking company were grossly misunderstood, when it was said that they were to consider the interests of the public. They were no other than the directors of a mercantile concern, who were bound to do as well as they could for themselves and that concern, and it was for parliament to take care ne quid detrimenti capiat respublica. But this duty had been shifted from parliament to the directors of the Bank. The history of this transaction was one of the grossest breaches of trust that ever had disgraced the history of a nation, and had placed us in a situation of unparalleled difficulty and danger. After making every allowance for the enormous expense of the last year of the war (120,000,000*l*.), for the distress and dearth that attended the first year of peace, for the extent to which the exchanges were affected, and all other operating causes, he was confident that the principal cause, the sine quâ non of all our late calamities, arose from the extensive issue of Bank paper, and the ruin consequent on the depreciation of that issue. To that, more than to any other cause, must thousands in every rank of life, in the highest circles of commercial and agricultural enterprise, and the lowest sphere of laborious earnings, attribute the sufferings they had so grievously experienced. The principal cause of all this, he repeated, was the suspension of cash-payments, the over-issue of Bank paper, and the depreciation consequent on that over-issue. When the circulation of this country was in a healthy state, it consisted of coin, of Bank paper, and of country paper. It was an inevitable consequence that the over-issue of Bank paper should cause an over-issue of country paper; and it was in evidence before the committee that made inquiries on this subject, that whenever the Bank paper increased as one, the country paper increased as three. When the Bank paper became a legal tender, the country bankers could not be called on to pay in coin, because there was none to be had, but they paid in Bank of England paper, and if that had been confined within any limits, it would have been some restraint on the increased circulation of the country banks. But the former having increased to an enormous amount, there was nothing that could affix any bounds to the circulation of paper money, and the ruinous extension of credit. Out of this arose also the enormous losses sustained in consequence of forgery, which, though not so great on the country banks, had caused an unprecedented amount of loss and crime in the case of the Bank of England. The forgeries, indeed, on the Bank of England had increased to a frightful degree; and even if the bill before the house could produce a hundredfold more benefit than the noble earl anticipated from it, if the actual dangers were a hundred times greater than he apprehended, those benefits and those dangers would be light and trivial, compared with the mass of misery occasioned by the circulation of paper which entrapped thousands into the commission of crime. It was the duty of a wise legislature not merely to punish, but to prevent the commission of crimes; and therefore, on this consideration alone, the resumption of cash-payments was of paramount importance. Besides this, the Bank paper having led to an inundation of country paper, that had happened, which had happened in all countries where paper was made a legal tender —the prices of all commodities were raised, the value of all property was disturbed, and speculation was carried to an inordinate height. These had been the consequences of the Mississippi scheme, of the South Sea bubble, of the plantation paper-money, and of the French assignats. The Bank continued its issues till the country bankers failed on all sides for sums in which they never could have been debtors except through the medium of that paper currency that was forced on the country: they had failed in this manner to the ruin of the poor and industrious, of the great commercial speculator, and of the agriculture of the country: all of these had been unable to meet the demand for making good their engagements, through the convulsion attending the banking system. The next step was that which could not be wondered at. Other country bankers were obliged to control their issues and narrow their accommodation; they were obliged to call in payments, for which the demand came wholly unexpected; and unavoidable failures ensued. At this time the Bank called in its paper, thereby reducing the amount of country paper, and causing calamity which no other country could have endured without entire destruction. This was the state of things produced by the system he had described, and after which, as the noble earl had informed the house (a melancholy truth indeed), the Bank might have safely resumed payment in the course of last year. If there were any who felt like him (Lord Grenville), how must they be disappointed at being told, that the very level of exchanges, so much required by the other side of the house, did then exist: and there was no circumstance of deeper regret than that the Bank did not avail itself of that crisis: he said the Bank, because, though it was incumbent on the government to provide for the necessities of the country, yet, for two years, the government had abdicated that power, and in the very preamble of the former bill, said, that they gave the Bank those two years to take such measures as they might deem advisable for the public advantage, to prepare for the resumption of cash-payments. But were their lordships in the result satisfied with the exercise of this discretion? It was greatly to be regretted, now they were again called on to renew this pernicious system, that they were not allowed to examine what measure the Bank had taken to ensure the resumption of payments; because, if he were to trust to mere report, they intended, instead of preparing for payment, to throw such difficulties in the way of government as to deter it from proposing any such measure. Now if the Bank wished to create any such difficulties, they could not do it better than by creating a difference between gold and paper, making gold dearer and paper cheaper; nor could they adopt more effectual means for this latter purpose than by drawing from the continent from 25 to 30 per cent. of their circulation. If you draw from any market a commodity to the amount of one-fourth of its quantity, that commodity must become immediately dearer, and this was what had actually happened. Persons who were really desirous of resuming payment, would take care that their paper should increase in value: and how would they do this? By contracting their circulation. The Bank knew very well that by an excessive issue they had depreciated the value of their paper; they knew, therefore, that by limiting the issue they might again, in some measure, restore its value. Instead of this, they had actually increased their issues two millions sterling. He did not ask the Bank to confess their error of 1811, but he asked them, when they had seen that an issue of 29 millions had decreased the value of their notes, whether the means to increase their value was not to reduce the circulation. The error would be more striking if their lordships called to mind the state of the other paper circulation of the country. It was notorious, that while the Bank had been thus increasing its issues, it had been doing so at a time when the country banks were beginning to revive from the distress which they had so deeply experienced. The circumstances to which he had adverted greatly increased his repugnance to commit any thing further to the Bank of England, without instituting the strictest inquiry. Their lordships should recollect, that this was not a concern of the Bank, but of the nation; every man in the country, from the highest to the lowest, was more deeply interested in it than in any other question that had of late years come before parliament. He was well convinced that one of the greatest difficulties with which this kingdom had to encounter in its late contest with France, was occasioned by the measure of Bank restriction, which had produced that disastrous state of the circulation so frequently admitted and lamented; and had it pleased Providence to continue the war but a single year longer, he apprehended that the country must have submitted to the yoke of the enemy; not that it had not physical force to resist him, but in consequence of its crippled resources and depreciated currency, it must have given up the contest. The pretence now urged for a farther suspension had never been heard of—because foreign princes were raising loans in their own countries, the renewal of cash-payments in this was to be farther suspended. He denied that the late loan in France of fifteen millions had produced the effect attributed to it by the noble earl: neither the raising of that sum, nor indeed of any sum in the present year, could have had the effect of altering the exchanges, or of raising the price of gold, at least to the extent asserted; for it was notorious and obvious to the most superficial, that where payments were to be made by one country to another, they were made in that commodity which it best suited the interest of the country paying to send. This point required no argument, since experience proved that the payments from this country had been made in cloth or other manufactures, or in the produce of her colonies. The proportion paid in gold was so small, that it could have no effect on the coin required for circulation. Under all the evils arising from this protracted system, he had hoped that parliament would now have stepped forward to compel the Bank to do that which was absolutely necessary to a wholesome state of circulation. If it had done so at an earlier period, no part of the remittances from this country would have been made in gold, which now gave a profit of five per cent. above other articles, but in articles of trade and commerce that would have added to the wealth of the nation, instead of draining and impoverishing it. The mistake out of doors, that the loan to France was to be made in specie, and not in goods, was too gross for the noble earl to fall into, but his argument shewed that he was in reality biassed by it: and therefore the moment the mistake was exposed, his argument fell to the ground. If cash-payments were not to be resumed, if the bill now before the house were only the prelude to others, if gold were not to be the chief circulation in 1819, but the paper system was to be continued in 1820 and 1821, and so on indefinitely, he entreated the house to reflect upon the consequences. Every landlord would feel the effects of it in his rents, every merchant in his remittances, and every tradesman in his receipts; every man who had money in the funds, and who went to obtain his dividend, would annually be paid by the Bank five per cent. less than was his real due. It was but a short time ago that the burthened subjects of the kingdom were relieved from the income-tax; that was a national impost, and while it was necessary it was paid cheerfully; but would the country submit in future to pay five per cent., not as an income-tax, but in a different form; not to the State, but to the Bank? Such was, in truth, the effect of measures like that before the house: it gave to the Bank the power, as it were, of putting a pump into the estate of every man, and pumping out just as much as it was thought convenient. Now it was at the rate of 5 per cent., but if the issues of the Bank were augmented, in a short time it might be 10 per cent., or even more: the profits of the Bank, and the losses of the people, were equally unlimited by any provision which the legislature had yet adopted. This was a state of things not to be endured. Though he was willing and happy to live under the dominion of the king and of the parliament, he could not consent by this noxious law to be placed under the control of the Bank of England. It was worthy of remark also, that as the measure was now framed, and as it had existed since 1797, even if the directors should themselves wish (a supposition certainly not very probable) to put an end to this injurious system, they had not the power to do so. There was, besides, no clause to prevent an excessive issue of paper, which might soon involve the labouring and industrious classes in the same ruin and distress which they had experienced about two years ago.—He had thus endeavoured to shew the consequences of persevering in this paper currency: on the one hand, he could discover no benefit that would arise from it; and, on the other, he saw nothing but mischief and ultimate destruction to the finances of the country. The evils were so many, that he would not enumerate them; and so great, that his Majesty's ministers did not dare to look them in the face. (Hear, hear.)

The Earl of Harrowby contended, that his noble friend had begged the question in the most material points to which he had adverted in the course of his speech. In the first place, he had asserted that the act of restriction of 1797 was one of the most fatal measures that had ever been adopted by the legislature: he had founded a great part of his argument upon this point, which he had taken for granted, forgetting that the matter had frequently come under discussion in the house, and that it had been decided over and over again to be a measure that it was not only right to adopt in 1797, but which it had been wise to renew at several periods since. He (Lord Harrowby) was one of a great majority who held, that without the Bank restriction this country could never have attained the eminence it had acquired; without it, it never could have reached that height of mercantile prosperity which had made it the envy of the world; nor could it have effectually resisted the attempts of the great despoiler of nations. Although the proposition in 1797 was received with some astonishment, not to say dismay, that feeling soon abated; and, afterwards, experience convinced even those who had been most alarmed, that without its aid Great Britain could not have maintained her rank among nations for a single year. Another point which the noble baron had taken for granted was, that the bill now before the house was introduced at the instance, if not at the solicitation of the Bank; the contrary was the fact; the Bank had interfered in no way regarding it, and although the monied part of the nation were united in their opinion as to its necessity, yet the Bank directors had made no representations to ministers upon the subject. Of course he did not mean to say that they at all objected to a measure that would be for the benefit of those whom they represented; but they had taken no part in the affair, and had naturally shewn some reluctance to stand forward to be subjected to the calumnies, not to call it abuse, to which now they were daily exposed. It was not his business to pronounce a panegyric upon the directors, but he would take this opportunity of stating, that their views were liberal and disinterested, and that, although they had the interests of the proprietors in view, they did not forget those of the country. His lordship then entered into a detail of some dates and figures, in order to shew that his noble friend had been mistaken and misrepresented by the noble baron. He insisted that, coupling the amount of the issue of paper now, with the amount of gold in circulation in 1797, according to the statements of the late earl of Liverpool, there was no reason for asserting that the quantity of paper now forming a part of the circulating medium was excessive: and with regard to the advance in price of various commodities, it was not fair to contend that it was owing entirely to the Bank restriction, when so many concurrent causes might be shewn, and among them the great increase in the amount of taxation. The noble baron had complained, that neither in the bill of 1797, nor in any subsequent enactments, had any provision been introduced to limit the amount of bank-notes in circulation: but surely public opinion, and the control of parliament, if called for, were sufficient for that purpose; and by those the circulation was not only more effectually, but more beneficially limited than by the interposition of legislative authority.—It was not correct to assert, that the Bank had persevered in its issues, in defiance of public opinion; a few able speeches might have been pronounced in parliament, a few learned pamphlets might have been published, but those speeches and those pamphlets were not public opinion; they were the opinions of a few individuals, but they were far from being the sense of the great body of the nation. To those who urged that cash-payments should be immediately resumed, he would observe, that the inconveniences of delay were much less than the inconveniences that might result from a sudden and violent change: the precise moment must be chosen, and that was a matter of no slight difficulty or danger. If at too early a date an artificial circulation were abandoned, the consequence might be, that it would be found necessary to return to it, and the result of such a proceeding must be highly injurious. In the mean time, notwithstanding what had been thrown out, there could be no doubt of the solvency of the Bank, even to four times the amount of its issues. The constitution itself was not more firm and stable than the credit of the Bank of England.—The argument respecting forgeries had been greatly overcharged. During the last fifteen years the average number of executions had not exceeded thirteen in each year. During the same period every other species of crime had increased much more; some three-fold, four-fold, five-fold, and some even six-fold. It was, therefore, incorrect to say that human misery had been increased by the restriction of cash-payments. At the same time, the Bank had done every thing in its power to resume cash-payments; but it was necessary, for reasons in which the Bank had no interest, to continue the restrictions for a further period. A foreign loan of an ordinary amount and in ordinary circumstances would not justify the measure; but never before was there an instance of such a loan as France required at the present period. France had first required a loan of 15 millions, and then another loan of 30 millions. It had been argued, that if gold should be by the operation of the loan carried out of the country, it would increase the ability of the country which might receive it to purchase our manufactures. But by draining this country of its gold, it would increase the price of our manufactures, and thus the ability of other countries, instead of being increased, would be diminished. Besides, in commercial transactions with foreign countries, long credit was required, and the immediate pressure could not therefore be relieved by the distant return of trade. With respect to France in particular, the commercial laws of the two nations were such as to prevent any return to this country for commodities exported. It had been asked whether any evil could be specified such as was now apprehended. But how had 30 or 40 millions of the current gold of the country disappeared? He had been informed by some of the Bank directors, that, in 1814, 6,000,000*l.* of English gold had been melted down at the mint in Paris. The supporters of the bill were asked, when would the proper time come for resuming cash-payments? The only proper moment, in his opinion, to remove the restrictions would be when no person in the country could perceive their removal. The water should be level on both sides when the flood-gate was opened, otherwise it would rush with such violence as to shut the gate again.—For these reasons he felt it his duty to support the motion.

The Marquis of Lansdowne said, he would not, at that late hour, and after such long speeches, enter at length into the question: but he could not omit the opportunity of protesting against the principle on which this measure was founded. Throughout the whole of his speech, the noble earl who had just sat down, had been begging the question of his noble friend's argument. He had, on the one hand, included among the advantages of the restriction, that it enabled the government to carry on the war; and had excluded, on the other hand, the enormous increase of debt, arising from the great increase of prices. (Hear, hear, hear.) It had, in fact, increased the prices at a double, triple, ratio during the war; and was consequently the source of all the accumulated pressure which the country had already felt, and which it had still to support. The whole commerce, the whole agriculture, the whole energy and industry of the country felt the weight of the evil of that system which was now proposed to be continued. It had been argued, that no depreciation had taken place: if not, it was for the supporters of the bill to say what reason prevented the resumption of cash-payments after the general pacification of Europe. The only reason which they had to allege was, the French loan. No loan had, at any former period, been charged with such consequences. The noble lord at the head of the treasury had asserted, that the loan would be paid in gold, and was all to go out of this country. He could affirm, on the authority of those who negotiated the loan, that but a small part of it would be remitted from this country. The credit of Britain had been necessary for raising it, but the greatest part of it would be raised in France itself, and other countries of Europe. But even though it were to proceed entirely from this country, it did not follow that it must be made altogether in the precious metals. If an individual in this country were to enter into a contract for supplying an army abroad with bread, or with arms, did it follow that he must take out of this country all the flour that was to make the bread, or all the iron from which the arms were to be manufactured? He would do that, or not, according as it would be to his advantage. If the high price of gold made the purchase of manufactures easy, would not the increase purchase of manufactures diminish the price of gold? the one would always be found to correct the other. The experience of all former transactions of this kind had confirmed and illustrated this principle. The noble earl had stated, that in 1814 and in 1816, the price of gold had increased, while the issue of bank-notes had increased. But in those years country bank paper had been withdrawn from circulation, which had formerly constituted a much greater proportion of the paper currency than Bank of England notes. At no period had the price of gold continued for any time to decrease. In 1785 it had fallen, but it was only for a short time, in consequence of a quantity of gold bought in Portugal. The present system was dangerous, as it enabled a private corporation to control the value of every man's property in the country. The noble earl had said, that public opinion was a sufficient corrective to make the Bank directors do their duty. But how had they performed their duty under this corrective? The paper currency, which in 1797 was only 10,000,000*l.*, was, in the last half of the year 1817, 29,000,000*l.* Was it to public opinion, which had been thus ineffectual, that the resources and revenue of the country could be trusted? During the last year public opinion had been more loudly declared for the resumption of cash-payments than at any former period; and yet, from the beginning of 1816 to the end of 1817, the Bank had increased its issues 3 millions. Let not their lordships, therefore, be told, that public opinion was an adequate corrective. The noble earl, in mentioning the subject of forgeries, had omitted the true evidence of the increase of this dreadful evil—the amount of prosecutions. Prosecutions had increased to such an extent, as to alarm the country, and to alarm the government so much, that the Bank had not resolution to prosecute in all cases to conviction. The solicitor of the Bank was left to determine whether they should prosecute for the major or for the minor offence. While no fixed standard was assigned to regulate our currency, the whole financial system was at the mercy of the Bank. It had been said that the directors were not desirous of this measure; but they had not petitioned against it, and since they had profited by the restriction, he could not believe that its continuance was disagreeable to them.

Earl Bathurst said, that if the Bank were now to resume cash-payments and issue gold, it must diminish its issue of paper in proportion. The consequence would be, that the gold would be taken out of the country and the paper circulation contracted at the same time. Such a state of things must produce the most serious injury to commerce. He should not delay their lordships longer, but give his support to the measure, from a conviction that the opposite line of policy would be attended with the greatest inconveniencies.

The Earl of Lauderdale urged several arguments against the bill (See the Protest of the noble earl at the end of the debate), and concluded with observing that he should, in the committee, propose a clause to limit the restriction to six weeks after the next meeting of parliament.

Lord King declared, that he was decidedly hostile to the measure. He did not believe that a foreign loan would injure the Bank, if cash payments were resumed. The Bank had formerly regulated their issues by the price of gold, and afterwards by the demand for discounts; but now no rule existed by which they were governed. He wished to bring them back to the first rule he had mentioned. If this bill were suffered to pass, he was afraid that arguments would never be wanting to prolong the restriction ad infinitum.

The Earl of Liverpool, in reply, stated, that the continuance of the restriction was not an indulgence claimed by the Bank. They had long ago declared, that they were ready to resume their payments in specie. He was convinced, that the restriction had not checked commerce or agriculture, and that, without it, we could not have made such immense efforts in the war. But, nevertheless, he was anxious to put an end to the restriction as speedily as possible, and for this reason—the tendency of an inconvertible paper currency was to create fictitious wealth, bubbles which, by their bursting, produced great inconvenience and loss to the people. He admitted, that the report of the bullion committee was a valuable document; but it had stated, that the country paper was regulated by the circulation of the Bank, which was not the case.

The house having resolved itself into a committee,

The Earl of Lauderdale proposed as an amendment, that, instead of the 5th July, 1819, the restriction should expire in six weeks after the commencement of the next session of parliament.

The committee divided:—

Contents, 9—Not Contents, 22.

The bill then went through the committee.

PROTEST AGAINST THE BILL.] The following protest was entered on the journals by the Earl of Lauderdale, against the second reading of the bill:

"Dissentient,

1. Because this bill for continuing the restriction of payments in cash on demand, for another year, has been introduced and supported on the ground, that the raising of foreign loans would drain this country of its coin; an opinion founded on gross misconception and ignorance of the subject; for the metallic currency of no country can be exhausted, except by the substitution of a paper currency, not payable in cash on demand, which is unfortunately the very system it is the object of this bill, at least for a time, to establish.

To such a degree does the ignorance of those who have argued the necessity of this bill, on the probability of great foreign remittances, appear to me to extend, that it seems to have escaped their observation, that capital may be conveyed from one country to another in the shape of goods as well as of bullion; and that the former is the mode in which the great bulk of foreign remittances must be made; for the moment the exchange becomes unfavourable by the forced exportation of a small quantity of coin, it must give such encouragement to the exportation of commodities, and such discouragement to the importation of them, that, whilst it is impossible, consistent with the interest of the merchant, to import commodities equivalent to the goods exported, it must be his interest to make every necessary remittance in goods rather than in coin.

It is, in truth, folly to imagine, that the exportation of coin or bullion, as a means of restoring the balance of payments, when deranged by a foreign loan, or any other source of necessary remittance, can be long persevered in, either by this or any other country: for, on the supposition that those who have engaged to make remittances will consult their own interests, the quantity of coin that can at any time be withdrawn from the circulation of a country to effect this object is small indeed; as must be obvious to those who reflect, that as soon as any portion of the gold or silver coin is exported, the value of that which remains must increase, or, in other words, the value of all the commodities must diminish; which, of course, will present to the contractor for a foreign loan a state of things that renders the exportation of goods a more advantageous means of fulfilling his engagements than the exportation of coin or bullion.

It is true that the foreign market may be glutted with those goods, at the price at which the merchant can afford to sell them, and that bullion may again become a source of less expensive remittance: but the moment a little more gold is exported, a further reduction of the price of commodities must ensue, which cannot fail once more to create an efficient demand for our manufactures, and to render the exportation of gold the least profitable means of conveying capital abroad.

Thus, therefore, before any country can be drained of its gold, by the necessity of remitting capital, in consequence of foreign loans, there must be a proportional demand for, and exportation of, its commodities; and as gold and commodities must become alternately the least expensive means of remittance, so it cannot be exhausted of its coin, without supposing that it is possible that it should be exhausted of all the goods of its growth and produce.

2d. Because this doctrine, sound in theory, is supported both by authority and experience.

From the authority of Mr. Winthorp, when examined before the Irish Exchange Committee, we learn, that it is impossible to drain any country of so much of its coin as is necessary to carry on its traffic, unless by the establishment of banks, and the issue of the paper of such banks, made to answer as a substitute for coin.

And from experience we know, that at a time when great foreign remittances were forced, both by the existence of the Austrian loan, and large subsidies we had agreed to pay to German princes, betwixt the years 1794 and 1797, little more than 1,250,000*l.* in specie was remitted by Mr. Boyd, the agent for the imperial loan; whilst it appears by the report of the House of Lords on the Bank of England, 1797, that the exports to Germany alone, in the years 1795 and 1796, amounted to eight millions annually, when in time of peace they did not amount to more than 1,900,000*l.* Indeed, eight millions, the value of the goods annually exported to Germany at that time, exceeded, by at least 2,600,000*l.*, the value of the exportation of commodities, in time of peace, to France, Flanders, Holland, and Germany combined, leaving no doubt that such an increase of demand could alone arise from the circumstances of the engagements which the country had formed, to send capital abroad.

3d. Because the probability of great and extensive foreign loans, to be filled by the capitalists of this country, which gives to parliament reason to apprehend the necessity of large foreign remittances, far from forming a ground for arguing that the restriction of payments in cash ought to be extended, forms a solid ground for maintaining, that the welfare of the State more than ever requires that it should immediately be done away.

For, as these remittances may be made either in goods or in bullion, procured by the melting of our coin, it is apparent that, as the taking off the restriction must create a home demand for our coin, it would encourage the remittances being made in goods, to the great benefit of our manufacturers; whilst the continuance of the restriction, by annihilating all demand for our gold coin, must encourage the remittances being made in gold, to the great injury of our manufacturers."

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, May 26.

MOCK AUCTIONS.] Mr. Alderman Atkins presented the Report of the Select Committee appointed to take into consideration the laws relating to Auctions.—It was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

ROCK SALT DUTIES BILL.] Mr. Calcraft brought in a bill "to repeal the duty upon Rock Salt delivered for feeding or mixing with the food of cattle, and imposing another duty, and making other provisions, in lieu thereof."—Read a first time.

FINANCE.] Mr. J. Smith seeing the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his place, begged to put a few questions to him upon a subject very interesting to the public in general, as very mischievous reports were in daily circulation with the avowed object of depressing the public credit. The first question was, whether he intended to raise any money by loan or otherwise in the course of the coming year. The second question was, whether it were intended to pay off the 3,000,000 of exchequer-bills which were borrowed, free of interest, from the Bank? The other point upon which he wished to have some information was respecting the payment of the 6,000,000*l.* to the Bank. It was of great consequence that the public should have the best information on this subject, because many people strangely supposed that if the Bank received 6,000,000*l.* from the government, the amount of the circulation of bank-notes would be diminished in that ratio.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated his astonishment at the first question which had been put to him by the member for Nottingham; for so large a sum in exchequer-bills had been funded this year, as to render it very improbable indeed that either a loan or funding would be resorted to next year. In answer to the second question, he was in treaty with the Bank, and he had no doubt but that the sum of three millions would remain in the Bank as a loan to government at a low interest. In answer to the third question, the six millions would be paid to the Bank at the periods most convenient to the government. It was absurd to suppose that the amount of notes in circulation would depend upon payments by government to the Bank.

The Bank had the control over its own issues, and it would, no doubt, supply the public, as usual, liberally, and he had reason to know that this was their intention.

Mr. Tierney observed, with regard to the three millions of exchequer-bills, that as notice had been given for payment, an interest of 4 per cent. would become payable, unless an arrangement were intermediately made by the government and the Bank; and unless the government paid the 6,000,000*l.* before the end of the year, it was idle to talk of the issues of the Bank being lessened, or the restriction upon cash-payments being ever taken off.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer explained, that with regard to the 3,000,000*l.*, an arrangement was actually in progress; and that, upon the other part of the subject, he had already stated that government had made its arrangements with a view to a gradual payment of the 6,000,000*l.*

PROPERTY-TAX RETURNS.] Mr. Lushington brought up a Statement of the measures which had been taken for the destruction of Books and Papers ordered on the 10th March.—It was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

LAND-TAX ASSESSMENT.] On the motion of Mr. Brougham, an account was ordered forthwith "of any Orders which have been issued by the Lords Commissioners of his Majesty's treasury, or the commissioners for taxes, regarding the land tax assessment, within the last three months."

PRIVILEGE OF PARLIAMENT.] Mr. Bathurst, in pursuance of the notice which he had given yesterday, rose and moved the following resolutions: 1. "That all witnesses examined before this house, or any committee thereof, are entitled to the protection of this house, in respect of any thing that may be said by them in their evidence." 2. "That no clerk or officer of this house, or short-hand writer employed to take minutes of evidence before this house, or any committee thereof, do give evidence elsewhere in respect of any proceedings or examination had at the bar or before any committee of this house without the special leave of the house."

These resolutions were agreed to, nemine contradicente.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.] Mr. M. A. Taylor rose and moved, that the report of the select committee, appointed to inquire into the administration of justice upon the northern circuit, be read. (See page 1569.) This being done, the hon. member observed, that no man was more thoroughly convinced of the excellence of our laws than himself, when they were administered; but that administration, however pure, could not be effectual, unless the judges received some assistance in the execution of their arduous duties. He had had communication with several of the judges upon this subject; and Mr. Baron Wood, who had authorized him to use his name, declared that he had been obliged to leave the circuit before the business was half performed. The apprehension of any danger from effecting a change in the present system was perfectly idle. No danger or inconvenience had resulted to Scotland from the change which had been made in the constitution of its courts for the administration of justice. In that country, the principal court had been divided into two chambers, and a new jury court established with the happiest effects. Had the people of England less right to require that a remedy should be applied to the defective system of their courts? The judges found that, with all their diligence, it was impossible to get through the business assigned to them. The court of King's Bench had not been able, during the last term, to hear all the motions for new trials from the northern circuit, although it sat on the last day until twelve o'clock at night. The parties in those cases must in the mean time be at a loss how to proceed, and the summer circuit was approaching. It was well known that the term business could not be completed in due form, and that the judges were obliged to sit at Serjeants'-inn, where, by a fiction, they constituted a court—a court which heard, but could not determine. For his own part, he was not satisfied with this mode of administering justice. It ought to be administered, not in a corner, before a thin bar and a few bystanders, but in a full court, before a full and enlightened bar, at stated periods, and in the view of the public at large. The constitution regarded the judges but as men, and the best control over them was, the publicity of their opinions and decisions. (Hear, hear, hear.) It might be matter of consideration whether any of the judges of the court of King's Bench could be spared for the additional circuit, or whether it might be necessary to add to their number. If two additional commissioners were appointed, he should suggest the necessity of clothing them with the judicial dignity in all its circumstances; for although serjeants, who were frequently employed in discharging an arrear of cases, might be, and probably always were, fully competent to the task, their decisions were not received with the same satisfaction as those of men who had not only a higher rank and station to give them authority, but who were known to be abstracted from all party feelings or interests which might create a prejudice in their minds. Let the house consider now what was the attendance which the judges gave at the Old Bailey, where they tried most of the capital felonies, and where the sessions lasted frequently 14 or 15 days. No appointments would secure confidence or respect which should not place the new commissioners on an equality of rank and dignity with the rest of the judges. A barrister might be appointed, if the crown should think proper to execute a commission of gaol delivery, though not of assize or Nisi Prius; but would his judgments command respect, or be listened to with veneration? The hon. member, after observing, that the report of the committee had lain on the table nearly a month, which had afforded ample time for its consideration, and that the opinion of the judges, of the most eminent counsel, and of the people in general in the northern counties, was decidedly with him, concluded by moving, "that an humble address be presented to his royal highness the Prince Regent, representing to his royal highness, that this house having taken into their consideration the report of the select committee on the administration of justice upon the northern circuit, humbly request that his royal highness will be graciously pleased to adopt such measures as shall give to the counties of Westmorland, Cumberland, Durham, and Northumberland, and the town and county of Newcastle upon Tyne, the benefit of a general gaol delivery, and a commission of assize and Nisi Prius twice in each year; and to assure his royal highness that this house will make good any expense attending the same."

Lord Castlereagh said, he did not mean to oppose the general principle of the hon. member's motion. He admitted the existence of the evil, but the most effectual mode of redressing an evil was often a matter of difficult consideration, and the house would feel itself bound to see its way through the embarrassments which might occur before they adopted any decisive measures. He hoped that the hon. gentleman would consent to withdraw his motion, on the assurance that his Majesty's ministers would satisfy themselves as early as possible with regard to the most practicable and efficacious remedy that could be applied.

Mr. Brougham recommended to his hon. friend the expediency of withdrawing his motion upon the understanding held out by the noble lord. It was much too late to legislate upon so serious a subject, for an address would have all the effect of a legislative proceeding without any of its advantages. The house of lords, as the supreme court of justice, was, perhaps, that branch of the legislature with which all reforms of the judicial system most properly originated.

Mr. M. A. Taylor replied. He observed that he had been formerly told that the house should wait till the facts had been stated; the facts had now come, and he was now desired to wait till some other opportunity should occur. Did the noble lord, and the hon. and learned gentleman recollect, that if they adjourned this question, the next circuit would be left exposed to the same evils and inconveniences, the same denial of justice? If the noble lord would give a plain assent to the principles that had been laid down, he was willing to withdraw his motion; but if no such assent were given, he should, in the next session, if he had then the honour of a seat in that house, be left just where he was. He never could assent to any proposition that did not give to the four northern counties the same benefit of Nisi Prius as the other counties enjoyed. (Hear.)

Lord Castlereagh said, that his Majesty's ministers would pay every attention to the subject, but it was impossible that they could then pledge themselves to any particular measure.

Sir C. Mordaunt, Mr. W. Smith, and Mr. Harvey, severally insisted on the necessity of altering the present system, and supported the principle of the motion.

Mr. M. A. Taylor then rose, and said, that in consequence of the representation of the noble lord, that his Majesty's ministers would devote their attention to the subject, he had no objection to withdraw the motion.

The motion was then withdrawn*.

* It is extraordinary that the evils arising out of the present system of administering justice in the northern counties, should have been suffered to exist so long. They were fully exposed, many years ago, in a valuable and highly interesting work, which has been generally ascribed to that eminent lawyer, John Lee, Esq.—"One capital defect in the administration of our laws, which most immediately calls for redress, is the great length of time which is suffered to elapse between the crime and the punishment. In no part of England, but the county of Middlesex, are there more than two assizes held in every year, and those at such unequal distances, that a man who is the object of a prosecution may lie eight months in prison before he is brought to a trial. This grievance is still greater in the four northern counties, for they have but one assize in a twelve-month; and in the town of Hull (incredible as it may appear) the assizes are seldom held more frequently than once in the three years. I have been informed by a gentleman who goes the northern circuit, that at the last assizes held at Hull, a man was convicted of some offence, for which the judge said he should never have punished him with more than six months imprisonment; and this poor wretch had lain two years in jail before he was brought to trial. An instance as striking, though of a different kind, of the evils resulting from this delay of justice, is mentioned by Mr. Howard. (State of Prisons, page 15.) One Peacock, a murderer, was kept a prisoner in Kingston jail almost three years before he could be tried; in the mean time the principal witness against him died, and he was necessarily acquitted. The consequence of executing the sentence so long after the commission of the crime has been well observed by the Marquis of Beccaria to be that of rendering the example of the punishment nearly useless. When the sentence is executed, the crime has been long forgotten. The spectators seem to contemplate not the punishment of a criminal, but merely the death of an individual; and the sentiments with which they go away impressed are, not of the justice of the law, and the danger of violating it, but of compassion to a fellow-creature to whose sufferings they have been witnesses. But there is another, and surely a much more important reason why the trial of a prisoner ought to follow much sooner after the perpetration of the crime, namely, that it is always possible that the trial may manifest his innocence." Observations on Madan's "Thoughts on Executive Justice," 12mo, 1786, pp. 109, &c."

At the last assizes for the county of Cumberland,

LOTTERIES BILL.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the third reading of this bill.

Mr. Lyttelton said, that undeterred by the want of success which his opposition to this measure had experienced, he now rose to state, that his objection to it remained wholly unchanged. He was ashamed of it in every respect; it was a most shabby and dishonourable plan for cheating the people out of their money. He was really surprised, when he considered the acts in which the right hon. gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was often engaged, that he should not only give his support to, but insist on the adoption of a system so base and disgraceful. What! could the right hon. gentleman, who, on one day, was the builder of churches; on another, was a friend to the education of the poor; on a third, recommending the distribution of bibles; and, on a fourth, supporting the plan of saving banks; could he be the patron of a system which went to undermine the morals of the people? He lamented to say that this was the fact. But if the right hon. gentlemen were disposed to sacrifice public morals for the paltry gain of 200,000*l.*, he was not inclined to agree with him. He abhorred and detested such dishonourable and fraudulent practices, and he would continue to oppose them as long as he had a seat in that house. With that view he should move, "that the bill be read a third time this day three months."

Mr. Parnell said, that nothing had given him so much pain during the short time he had sat in that house, as to see how much great questions of morality and policy had been sacrificed to profit. (Hear.) But the present sacrifice was of a more degrading character, as it surrendered those great principles to a paltry financial profit of 250,000*l.* Future ages, recording faithfully the events of the present day, would place such actions in a proper light. When the right hon. gentleman, yielding to the fate that awaits us all, should sink into the silent tomb, this epitaph, if not engraven on his monument, would form a most appropriate inscription for it.—

Here lies the Right Hon. Nicholas Vansittart,
Once Chancellor of the Exchequer:
The Patron of Bible Societies;
The Builder of Churches:
A Friend to the Education of the Poor,
An Encourager of Saving Banks,
And a Supporter of Lotteries!

Mr. Morland expressed a strong disapprobation of the measure. If his Majesty's ministers said that we should be slow in tampering with the revenue of the country, his answer was, that ministers should not tamper with the morals of the people. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Lockhart wished to know on what grounds that house could enact capital punishments, when they were passing laws which invited the people to perpetrate crimes? (Hear, hear.) He could not consent to this measure on any grounds of revenue whatever. Considering the abominable effects which this system was calculated to produce, he was satisfied that there was no impost that could be imposed which the people of England would not prefer to it.

Mr. Alderman Wood was of opinion, that no fault could be found with the keepers of regular offices. Many frauds and impositions, however, were practised, and great and extensive evils arose from the system of insurances. Some offices belonging to the latter description of persons had been entered, and the books taken away, by which it appeared, on inspection, that clerks in banking-houses, clerks in the customs, and in other public departments, had entered their names as insurers from 1*l.* to 10*l.* In exposing such evils to the house, he would not hesitate to mention names. One of the offices to which he alluded, was discovered in Newgate-street, and another in Covent-garden, where he entered and found all that he had stated. In one of those places, a gentleman who held a high office in the Long-room in the Custom-house was the person who took the insurances. The hon. member concluded with saying, he hoped the right hon. gentleman would at last find, that such an immoral system as this would not be tolerated by the people.

Mr. Lyttelton, after what had fallen from the worthy alderman, begged to trouble the house with a very few words. As the worthy alderman had spoken in praise of the licensed lottery-office keepers, he must now say a word in their dispraise. In doing so, he acted from the very best information on the subject, and the unbiassed conviction of his mind. He would say, then, that they were the last people in this country, next to hangmen and informers, on whom he would bestow any panegyric. He considered them to be fraudulent and criminal men, and he would add, that no persons could earn their money in a more dirty manner. (Hear, hear.) They practised the most shameful and disgraceful frauds on the public by their schemes and puffs, by which they hoped to entrap the ignorant, and, he regretted to say, they too often succeeded. It would be well, however, for all persons to know, that, in small prizes, the chances were four and a half to one against the miserable adventurer, and in the higher prizes they were 2000 to one against him. And yet people suffered themselves to be taken in by these "respectable persons," the lottery office-keepers, as the worthy alderman had called them. He trusted that the eyes of the public would be opened at last to such fraudulent and disgraceful practices.

(August 1818,) Mr. Justice Bayley was obliged to leave Carlisle, with several causes untried, in order to proceed to Appleby, in Westmorland. He proposed to Mr. Scarlett, and several other gentlemen of the bar, to return to Carlisle from Lancaster; but that, they said, was out of the question—they could do no such thing.—A meeting of solicitors took place at the Bush-inn, in Carlisle, at which were present several residing in that city, and nearly all from the other parts of the county. It was agreed, that a deputation should wait upon the Grand Jury, to express to them their opinion, that the assizes ought to be held in that county twice a-year. A deputation accordingly waited upon the Grand Jury, who, after considering the subject, unanimously came to a resolution in favour of a spring assize.—The Grand Juries of Northumberland and Durham, at the late assizes held in those counties, came to similar resolutions.

Mr. Alderman Wood, in explanation, said, that he had only spoken in praise of licensed lottery office-keepers, because he did not believe that they were engaged in any illegal insurances. He by no means meant to support the system of lotteries. (Hear, hear.)

The question was then put, "that the bill be now read a third time."—The house divided:—

Ayes, 40—Noes, 14.

The bill was read a third time, and passed.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF PARTNERSHIPS (IRELAND) BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, May 27.

PARTNERSHIPS IN IRELAND BILL.] This bill was brought from the Commons, and read a first time.

BANK RESTRICTION BILL.] The Earl of Shaftesbury moved the third reading of this bill.

The Earl of Lauderdale moved that the preamble should be altered to the following effect: "Whereas the affairs of the Bank, in consequence of its advances to government, have been placed in such a situation as would render it expedient, if not necessary, for parliament to continue the restriction act beyond the 5th day of July next, on which day it was enacted that cash payments should be resumed: and whereas the mint regulations were so altered and arranged by the 56th Geo. III. c. 68, as to make it impossible that gold should remain in circulation, though by the said act, gold is declared to be the only legal tender of payments beyond the sum of 40*s*. Be it therefore enacted, &c."

This preamble was negatived, without a division.

Lord Holland then moved a proviso, to put an end to the operation of the act, in the event of gold falling to 3*l*. 17*s*. 6*d*. an ounce.

This proviso was also negatived.

The Earl of Lauderdale next moved the following proviso:—"Provided always, and be it further enacted, that the restriction on cash payments shall continue till the 56th of the king, chapter 68, entitled 'An Act to provide for a new Silver Coinage, and to regulate the Currency of the Gold and Silver Coin of the Realm,' be repealed, or until the said act is altered or amended to the effect that our gold coin, or our silver coin, shall, one or other of them, be exclusively declared a legal tender of payment; or that the relative value of our coin in these two metals shall, as far as may be, be so adjusted, that the denominative value of each shall bear the same proportion to the intrinsic value of the pure metal respectively contained in each."

This proviso was negatived, and the bill was then passed.

PROTEST AGAINST THE BILL.] The Earl of Lauderdale entered the following Protest on the journals, against the rejection of his clauses;

"Dissentient,

1. "Because it appears to me that no reduction of the advances to government, on the part of the Bank of England, or any other arrangement of its affairs, however prudent and well calculated to secure its being qualified to pay in cash on demand, could, if the restriction was done away, enable that establishment to fulfil its engagements for any length of time, without enormous loss to the proprietors; unless the act of the 56th Geo. III. cap. 68, entitled, an Act to provide for a new Silver Coinage, and to regulate the Currency of the Gold and Silver Coin of this Realm, is altered or repealed.

"By that act gold coin is declared to be the only legal tender of payment for any sum exceeding 40*s*., and the proportion betwixt the value of our gold and silver coin is altered from 15,059 to 1, which is nearly the present relative value of gold to silver bullion in the market of Europe, to 14,121 to 1, making a difference of 5*l*. 18*s*. or nearly 6 per cent. in the relative intrinsic value of our gold and silver coin.

"Under this arrangement, it is evidently impossible that gold can continue to circulate in this country; for, unless there was a gold price and a silver price for all commodities, gold coin can only have the same avail in making purchases as silver coin—that is, it would have 6 per cent. less of efficacy in the purchase of commodities in these his Majesty's dominions than in the rest of Europe, a difference more than sufficient to force its being exported the moment it is issued from the Bank.

"The Bank, therefore, must be subjected to a great loss from a constant demand for gold, whilst it continued to issue its paper; a demand not naturally arising from the state of the circulation, but inevitably resulting from the profit afforded by the exportation of gold; and this loss must be the more formidable, as, under the present system of our paper circulation, the Bank of England is liable to provide gold, not only for its own notes, but, through its own notes, if they are allowed to remain in circulation, for all the paper issued by the private bankers throughout the kingdom.

2dly. "Because, though the profits the Bank has acquired since the restriction have been, to the great injury of the community, large beyond example, yet these profits would, without benefit to the community, be exhausted, if they continued their paper in circulation under the 56 Geo. III. cap. 68; as it is impossible that any capital could continue to sustain the operation of purchasing gold at the price it would infallibly hold in the market, when measured by our silver coin, and paying it away at the rate of 3*l.* 17*s.* 10½*d.* per ounce, to persons who could alone realize the profit which its comparative intrinsic value secures by exporting it; for that act provides, under severe penalties, that "no person shall by any means, device, shift, or contrivance whatsoever, receive or pay for any gold coin lawfully current, within the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, any more or less in value, benefit, profit, or advantage, than the true lawful value which such gold coin doth or shall by its denomination import; nor shall utter or receive any piece or pieces of gold coin of this realm at any greater or higher rate or value, nor at any less or lower rate or value, than the same shall be current for in payment, according to the rates and values declared and set upon them pursuant to law."

3dly. "Because, as I cannot help regarding the declarations made in the course of the debate on this subject, that every thing had been done on the part of the government and of the Bank to qualify it to resume payments in cash on demand, as tending to deceive parliament, whilst the 56th of the king, cap. 68, remains in force; so, I cannot concur in passing an act for the resumption of cash payments on the 5th of July, 1819, or at any other definite period, without reference to the alteration or repeal of that law; for I should feel myself by such conduct a party to a gross deceit, which parliament will practise on the people of this country, by passing an act which seems to assume the possibility that the Bank may, without ruin to the establishment, resume and continue its ancient salutary practice of paying in cash on demand, whilst the provisions of that act are in force."

(Signed) LAUDERDALE.

POOR LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.] The Earl of Shaftesbury brought up the report of this bill.

The Earl of Carnarvon suggested, that the clause which related to the meeting of select vestries should be so amended as to compel their meeting once a fortnight.

Earl Grosvenor objected to the clause which enabled the parish to rate the owners of certain houses instead of the occupiers. He disapproved altogether of the principle on which this clause proceeded. The evil complained of, and which had given rise to the introduction of the clause, was partial and confined to great towns. Why, then, legislate for the whole country, with a view to correct an inconvenience experienced only in particular spots? In many cases much injustice would arise from the execution of this bill; for owners who might be absent would be rated, and could not avail themselves of the right of appealing against the charge. He trusted that the noble and learned lords, who had agreed with him in his objections to this clause in the committee, would support him in a motion for rejecting it. He should not object to the bill, if it were corrected as to this point. This, and the other bill relative to parish vestries, had come before their lordships in consequence of the inquiry instituted in another place. It had been expected by many, that something more extensive would have resulted from that investigation; but when he considered the difficulties with which the subject of the poor laws was surrounded, he was surprised that so much had been done.

The Lord Chancellor thought that the really objectionable part of the clause might be amended. As to the absence of the owners of houses, he did not consider that an objection of much importance, as it might be expected that their stewards would be in the way, either to pay the rate charged, or appeal against it.

Lord Redesdale considered the clause very objectionable. From the manner in which it was worded, those who made the rate would have it in their power to charge some, and exempt others, as they pleased, which might lead to much injustice. The clause would also have a very serious effect on the cottages of the country, as it applied to houses the rent of which was from 4*l.* to 20*l.* The rent of 4*l.* would include most cottages, and as they were at present maintained by the owners of land, without any view to profit, the operation of this clause would either cause their destruction, or make them fall into the hands of persons who would raise the rents. It had been said in the committee, that much inconvenience was experienced at Birmingham, by the rates not being recoverable, in consequence of the mode of letting out low rented houses. It was therefore thought advisable to make the owners subject to the rate rather than the occupiers. But if Birmingham, or any other place, were in this situation, let a bill be proposed applicable to the particular case. This would be the proper course, and not that now proposed, which was hostile to good policy and the general spirit of our legislation. Nothing could be more mischievous than any measure tending either to the destruction of cottages, or to raise their rents. A foreign gentleman, a native of Switzerland, had assured him, that the disturbances which some years ago took place in that country, were entirely owing to a change of system, by which the cottages no longer remained in the hands of the land-owners, who were naturally disposed to pay consideration to the comfort of the people on their estates; but had become, by lease or otherwise, the property of persons who made a large profit by letting them. He should be afraid, if this bill passed, that the cottages in England would soon be in the same situation. In towns, the operation of the act would be attended with another evil, to which he had already alluded; for as the clause gave the power of rating any houses of the particular rent mentioned, it would be left to the pleasure of those who imposed the rate to say on what houses it should fall. It was easy to conceive how, under this clause, by the system of management which often prevailed in parishes, it might be contrived to charge some particular houses and exempt others. He would therefore propose, that the word all should be substituted for any, if the clause were adopted; but he hoped it would not pass without some amendment to remove the other objection.

The Earl of Liverpool thought the objections of the noble and learned lord, and the noble earl opposite, deserving of consideration, and, in particular, that which related to the rent of houses. If 4*l.* should not be found high enough to remove the apprehension which the noble and learned lord entertained of the operation of the clause, he had no objection to increase the rent to any sum which would be considered sufficient to form an exception for all cottages. The operation of the clause, with respect to great towns, he thought beneficial; but if that advantage could not be obtained without including cottages, he would rather give up the clause altogether. He was of opinion, however, that the clause might be so framed as to except cottages. With regard to the principle of the clause, he did not consider the objections which had been made to it as altogether well founded. On that subject the argument might be, and indeed had been, turned the other way. Only last year an application was made from the town of Birmingham for a measure of this kind, and a bill was introduced into the House of Commons; but it was then objected that a particular law ought not to be made for a single town; that if the change were desirable, it ought to be made general. On this ground the measure was lost, and he could not but say that there was weight in the argument by which the question was so decided. The clause under consideration, he thought, might be made so as to cover cottages; and, with that modification, it would be to him unobjectionable.

Lord Redesdale said, that increasing the rent would not answer the purpose. It would be necessary to limit the clause to towns containing a certain number of inhabitants.

The Earl of Lauderdale agreed, that to amend the clause in the way which the First Lord of the Treasury had proposed, would render it nugatory with respect to great towns. It would be necessary to alter it in some other way, if their lordships did not prefer omitting it altogether.

Lord Holland also thought that limiting the clause to great towns would be the best way of amending it; but even when so amended, the principal objection of legislating generally, in order to remove a partial inconvenience, would still remain.

Earl Grosvenor thought that, as the clause was objectionable on so many grounds, it would be better to get rid of it altogether. He should therefore move that it be omitted.

After a conversation of some length, it was agreed that Lord Redesdale should move his amendments before the question was put on the omission of the clause. The noble and learned lord felt, however, considerable difficulty in framing a proviso which should confine the clause to towns. He could not determine the amount of population which ought to form a rule for the limitation. He therefore only moved that the word all be substituted for any, which was agreed to.

The Lord Chancellor said, that though he considered the clause still objectionable, he would vote for it, thus amended, in the expectation that it would be farther corrected by a proviso, which might be introduced on the third reading.

Earl Grosvenor, however, persisted in his motion, and their lordships divided on the question "that this clause do stand part of the bill."

Contents, 22—Non-contents, 6.

PARISH VESTRIES BILL.] The report of this bill was brought up.

ALIEN BILL.] This bill was read a second time, on the understanding, that its principle should be discussed in a committee.

REWARDS ON CONVICTION BILL.] On the motion of the Marquis of Lansdowne, this bill was read a second time.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR BILL.] The Earl of Rosslyn, in moving the second reading of this bill, said, that it was not necessary for him to expatiate on the advantages of education to all classes of society, as he believed that those advantages were now generally acknowledged, and that the prevailing prejudices on the subject had all died away. His lordship pointed out the benefits which Scotland had derived from the blessings of education, and contrasted them with the disadvantages that England and Ireland experienced from the want of it. Into whatever country Scotchmen emigrated, they had always succeeded in improving and humanizing that country, as well as in deriving emolument from the exercise of their own talents and acquirements. The number of Scotch beggars was not above one in a hundred compared with the Irish; and yet the funds for the support of education in Scotland were exceedingly small: but they were well managed, and no abuses existed: whereas, in England, abuses had prevailed in the administration of charitable funds from the earliest period, down to the present moment. The noble earl then referred to various ancient and modern acts of parliament, the preambles of which distinctly acknowledged the existence of these abuses, and the necessity of finding a remedy. He referred also to the various commissions that had issued at different times, but the powers of which being insufficient, they had all failed in the accomplishment of their object. The existence of the abuses being thus proved beyond a doubt, the only question that remained was, as to the sort of remedy that should be adopted. The provisions of Mr. Gilbert's act had been found wholly inefficient. The 52d of Geo. III. c. 101. though well meant, had only enabled parties to attempt redress by commencing a chancery suit; and to say nothing of the unavoidable delay and expenses of such a proceeding, who was there that, with no hope of reward, or even of indemnity, would enter on such a course for the sake of the poor? A commission then, armed with the requisite powers by parliament, was the only mode by which any check could be imposed on the existence and increase of these abuses. When he considered that, within the last 50 years, the poor-rates had increased from 700,000*l.* to nearly 8,000,000*l.*, he thought it highly proper that an inquiry into the state of all charitable funds for the relief of the poor should be made at the same time. Those charities were the property of the public; and it was too absurd to say, that any private interests could be affected or should be considered in their examination. His lordship then detailed the chief provisions of the bill. They were for the appointment of 14 commissioners, six of whom were to have no salaries, and all of them to be appointed by the crown, which would, he hoped, in a case of such importance, use due discretion in making the appointment. The commission was to be armed with power to examine on oath, and to call for papers, persons, and records. His lordship then concluded by moving, that the bill should be read a second time. After the general approbation with which the measure had been received, and the expectations it had excited, he thought that any opposition to it could not but be discreditable, and attract ill-will on their lordships' house.

The bill was read a second time. On the motion, that it be committed,

The Lord-Chancellor said, that with as strong a sense of the existence of abuses as any man could entertain, and he hoped with as much reprobation of them*, he could not help thinking that this bill would be much more detrimental to the interests of charities than any mode of proceeding that could be devised, and therefore felt bound to give it his decided negative. With respect to the 52d of the king, an act which was certainly well meant, it gave a summary application to the Court of Chancery, by way of petition. He begged to state, that the late master of the rolls, (Sir William Grant) and himself, had applied themselves in every way to redress the evils that were pointed out to them, as far as was consistent with the rules of distributive justice: but, in the end, they found so many difficulties in the application of the act, that in their opinion, and that of almost every gentleman at the bar, who had been in any way concerned, they could do nothing else but desist. Where, indeed, it was clear who was the trustee, and who was the cestui que trust, there was no great difficulty; but they were all obliged to agree that they were unable to adjust any thing under the limited powers of that act, where the parties concerned could not be very clearly ascertained†. He thought the present measure, however, objectionable on many grounds. If the legislature did not protect to the utmost all honorary trustees, in the execution of their trusts—if they were to be exposed to suspicious and vexatious inquiries into all the details of their duty—not one honourable man would be found in the kingdom to take upon himself the responsibility of a charitable trust. There were in this country numerous and splendid charities, founded by munificent donors, with which courts of justice ought to have nothing to do,—cujus est dare ejus est disponere; and such charities ought only to be under the domesticum forum of the visitors nominated by the founders. Unless it were proved that the visitors abused their trust, he would resist to the utmost all legislative interference with their duties. He should be glad to know where was the power of parliament to interpose between the negligent schoolmasters and their scholars, even supposing they were negligent; but the fact was, that a foolish fashion prevailed of sending boys, by dozens, to private seminaries, so that the endowed grammar-schools in country towns were deserted, and the deficiency of pupils was unfairly attributed to the misconduct of masters. One great difficulty he felt with regard to the bill was, that although it provided that reports were to be laid before both houses of parliament, and even before the throne, it did not give the most distant hint what future steps ought to be taken, or how the trustees of any charitable institution who misconducted themselves were to be brought to justice. The 4000*l.* set apart in the bill would not pay the expenses of one-fortieth part of the inquiries that must be instituted; for there was scarcely a parish in the kingdom that had not some charitable establishment or other. The important trusts were generally gratuitously discharged, and if a more temperate measure than this were not provided, no man would in future take upon himself such arduous and hazardous duties. The corporation of the city of London, and all the companies forming it, were trustees for charitable purposes to an immense extent, and it became the house to be very careful how it interfered with the discharge of their functions. He admitted that the law upon this subject required amendment, but the alteration now proposed was most injudicious; there was nothing in the nature of a charity that was not within the cognizance of these commissioners; even the national schools would be subject to them, and to-morrow the Archbishop of Canterbury himself might be summoned before them to give an account of his demeanour. For this reason it was fit, not only that the duration of the bill should be limited, but that its application should be restricted like the 43d of Elizabeth, to certain enumerated charities. He did not intend to resist the commitment of the bill, but he despaired of making it unobjectionable.

* In 13 Ves. 580, the Lord Chancellor is reported to have said, "It is absolutely necessary, that it should be perfectly understood, that Charity Estates all over the Kingdom are dealt with in a manner most grossly improvident; amounting to the most direct Breach of Tr

† The Court of Chancery will not interfere with the management of Charities except in cases of direct breach of trust. It will take no cognizance whatever of any other neglect or misconduct on the part of the trustees. (See 2 Ves. and Beames, 138.) But even of cases of direct breach of trust, it affords most inadequate means of inquiry; and the facts disclosed in the note, page 1715, respecting the parish officers of Yeovil, are quite sufficient to deter any person from entering into that court from a sense of public duty.

Lord Holland said, he wished to state, shortly and plainly, his grounds for supporting the bill, to which the greater part of the speech just delivered did not at all apply. It was not a bill empowering commissioners to judge, but only to inquire—to ascertain the nature and extent of existing abuses. The noble and learned lord had himself voted for such a measure in the naval inquiry, which some years ago took place, and nothing was to be decided by the commissioners in this case any more than in that. It was necessary for parliament first to be informed upon this great subject, what were the funds, and how they were employed, for the purposes of education? It was not an inquiry directed against trustees or visitors, but in their favour; and if they discharged their duty faithfully, it would only redound to their honour and to the satisfaction of the house. He held it indisputable, that the conduct of every man to whom a trust was assigned, or even who possessed property under conditions, was subject to the investigation and control of parliament. Upon the question of right, the power of parliament could not be denied, and the exceptions in the bill in favour of particular institutions were rather a blemish than an excellence. The result of the investigation might be the proof that no abuse existed, and then parliament must proceed with the work of education with such means as it could furnish; but if it were found that the funds had been misapplied, or that the institutions had fallen into neglect, then it would be able to judge what steps ought to be taken, to advance the great object of the improvement of the lower orders with the means thus discovered. Did the noble and learned lord intend to say that parliament ought to act without information? No. Then how was it possible to proceed without encountering, in acquiring that knowledge, most of the objections this night stated? Could the noble and learned lord frame a better bill than the present? If he could, so much the better; but, however great the acumen he usually displayed in picking holes in the bills of other men, he had been singularly unfortunate in the measures he had himself originated. They were invariably found extremely defective; and this, among other proofs, shewed, that the framing and the blaming of a bill were two very different things, as had been said of speeches for and against ministers; for he recollected to have heard of a member of parliament, who, during the American war, had greatly distinguished himself by his harangues against government, but soon afterwards joining the ministry, had made a speech which was considered far below the usual pitch of his talents. A gentleman expressing his surprise at this falling off to Soame Jenyns, received this short and pointed answer:—"What right have you to expect that a man should be a good glazier who has been employed all his life in breaking windows?" (Laughter.) Because he had successfully attacked ministers, it did not follow that he could as successfully defend them; and because the noble and learned lord could find fault with the bills of other men, it did not follow that he could produce an unexceptionable measure of his own. The noble and learned lord had, in words, paid many compliments to the trustees and visitors of charitable institutions; but he had, in fact, cast upon the whole body a most galling stigma; for while he contended that their conduct was pure, he had refused to let it appear that it was so in any way but by his own assertion. The commissioners, it ought to be remembered, were to pass no censure, but merely to state facts, and upon their information parliament was to found any ulterior measures which its wisdom might deem requisite. Upon the whole, he supported the bill, because it instituted an inquiry, which the legislature had a right to make, which it ought to make, and which it had frequently made.

Lord Redesdale said, he was convinced that the bill could do no good, and might occasion infinite mischief. The commissioners would not do their duty if they did not rigidly inquire into all charitable foundations; and if they performed their duty, it would give disgust to all who had hitherto executed their trusts most faithfully and beneficially. The measure would also have the effect of deterring every honest man from accepting a duty which might subject him to malicious and groundless charges. The bill, it had been said, would be a vehicle for information; but it would be a vehicle for scandal, and a vehicle for immense vexation. The expenses of carrying the bill into effect would also be enormous. In each of the 11,000 parishes in England, the expenses would amount to three or four thousand pounds. It would thus occasion enormous taxation upon the parishes. The machinery already existing was sufficient to correct any abuse that could be pointed out. This bill could therefore do no good. It would convert that house into a criminal court of justice. The effect of it would be to disqualify individuals from being trustees. He had conversed with many trustees, who said, that they would not have accepted of the trust, if they had been aware of such a measure as this. The bill extended to all institutions excepting those which were excepted. If Jews were excepted, why not Roman Catholics—why not Quakers? The charitable lady (Mrs. Fry—see note, p. 549.) who was employed in reforming prisoners in Newgate, was not excepted from the inquiries of the commission to be appointed. If such a bill passed, trustees would consist only of persons of great zeal and of little discretion. On those grounds he should give his negative to going into the committee.

The Earl of Carnarvon said, that if their lordships were prepared to resist all preliminary inquiry, because they did not then know what might be the results of that inquiry, and to say, that they would receive only specific bills for every abuse which could somehow or other be proved to them, this bill must, of course, be rejected. But, unless they were prepared to go so far, he could conceive no reason, and he had heard no reason, why the bill should not be committed.

The house then divided:

Contents 10—Not-contents 8.

The bill was accordingly committed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, May 27.

Rock Salt Duties Bill.] This bill was read a second time, and committed.

Mines Assessments Bill.] The committee on this bill was postponed for three months.

Bankrupt Laws.] Mr. J. Smith rose, to call the attention of the house to the subject of the bankrupt laws. In the last session, a petition had been presented from a large body of persons engaged in commerce, who complained of the grievances arising out of the present system. The committee which the house had appointed on that subject had had the benefit of the opinions of some gentlemen of the first rank in their profession, and of several persons of most respectable character. An hon. and learned gentleman, (Sir S. Romilly) a member of that house, and also a member of the committee, had favoured them with his views of the present system, and of the necessity of revising it; (see page 1043.) and the committee had also heard the opinions of Mr. Cooke, Mr. Cullen, and Mr. Montagu, who had been commissioners of bankrupts for a great many years. The house would perceive, by examining the report of the committee, that the greatest abuses prevailed under the present laws. Mr. Montagu had stated, in the fourth examination before the committee, that it was scarcely possible to say more in a few words than had been said by the present Lord Chancellor when first he took his seat upon the bench; he at that time, from having been concerned as counsel in almost every bankrupt petition, well knowing the nature of the existing evils. In the first page of the 6th volume of Mr. Vesey's Reports, the reporter said this: "The Lord Chancellor took the first occasion of expressing strong indignation at the frauds committed under cover of the bankrupt laws, and his determination to repress such practices. On this subject, his lordship observed with warmth, that the abuse of the bankrupt law is a disgrace to the country, and it would be better at once to repeal all the statutes than to suffer them to be applied to such purposes; there is no mercy to the estate; nothing is less thought of than the object of the commission. As they are frequently conducted in the country, they are little more than stock in trade for the commissioners, the assignees, and solicitor; instead of the solicitors attending to their duty as ministers of the court, for they are so, commissions of bankruptcy are treated as matters of traffic; A. taking up the commission, B. and C. act as commissioners. They are considered as stock in trade; and calculations are made how many commissions can be brought into the partnership; and unless the court holds a strong hand over a bankruptcy, particularly as administered in the country, it is itself accessary to as great a nuisance as any known in the land, and known to pass under the forms of its laws." The opinion so expressed by the Lord Chancellor in the year 1801, must, he conceived, have been very much strengthened by the different cases which had been submitted to his consideration during the long period in which he had presided in the court of chancery.—He should now state to the house the leading points in which amendments of the bankrupt laws were proposed by the committee. The first question was, as to the description of persons who should be included within those laws. At present, this was not regulated by any general rule; and Lord Mansfield, in the case of Wyllie v. Wilkes, in Douglas, 519, had said, "It is a pity that the legislature should be silent, and force the courts, in order to attain the ends of justice, to invent legal subtleties which do not come up to the common understanding of mankind." An innkeeper as such could not be made a bankrupt, but if he sold a pint of liquor out of the house, he then might be a trader, and it was by facts of this sort that commissions issued against innkeepers, who clearly bought and sold to a very large amount. An extreme case upon this subject was ex parte Magennis, in Mr. Rose's Reports, in which an issue was directed, where the innkeeper sold only a pint or two of liquor out of doors. Persons who undertook the erection of buildings, and house-carpenters, as they were called, who had occasion for very great sums of money, and who obtained very extensive credit, were not traders, unless they could be made traders by the circumstance of their selling some moveables, such as bricks, or a carpenter making tables, of which there was a very recent instance in a contested commission, by a person who built the Circus at the end of Portland Place, who resisted his commission, and was found a trader solely by having made some tables for one or two customers. The workers of mines, coal mines, and other mines, although they dealt to the extent of many hundred thousand pounds, were not traders; but if they sold a bushel of loose materials at the pit's mouth, they were traders. There was another description of persons whose dealings were very extensive, who in consequence of gaining their subsistence as it was said substantially by labour, were not liable as traders, such as dyers, calenderers, and other persons of that description. Again, there was a case lately, in which a gentleman who kept a pack of hounds, and was in the habit of buying dead horses to feed them, and who happened to sell the skins of the carcases, was declared to be a trader. The committee, therefore, recommended, that the bankrupt laws should be extended to all whose dealings required that credit should be obtained by bills of exchange or otherwise; and that persons who were not generally so engaged, should not be subject to those laws, in respect of occasional or casual acts of buying and selling.—The next regulation was, as to acts of bankruptcy. In the first place, the committee had thought it desirable, that traders, believing themselves to be insolvent, or not having the present means of paying their debts, should be permitted to subscribe and lodge with the secretary of bankrupts a declaration thereof, which should be published in the Gazette, and thenceforth deemed an act of bankruptcy. This provision, he conceived, would be extremely beneficial both to the debtor and his creditors. As to making a man a bankrupt against his inclination, the committee thought, that the following additions should be made to the acts of bankruptcy now established by law: 1. A general stoppage of payment for seven successive days. 2. Being absent from home thirty days, without making provision for bills of exchange, promissory notes, or ordinary payments becoming due. 3. If after three notices in writing had been left at the house of a trader, allowing a period of seven days between each, informing him of a writ having been issued, he did not enter an appearance, or put in bail, in the regular way within nine days after the last notice; provided such trader were within the kingdom at the time the first notice was left. 4. If a trader remained abroad to defeat or delay his creditors, although he might not have gone abroad with that intention. 5. If a trader remained in prison upon civil process for fourteen days. Other regulations would be necessary, with respect to warrants of attorney and deeds of trust, but he would not then trouble the house with them.—The next object of the committee was, to provide more effectually for the security of the effects, books, and papers of the bankrupt, by making the messengers independent of the solicitors.—Then came a most important consideration, namely, as to the means of preventing fraud in proving debts. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Cullen had stated, that, at present, to prove a debt, a real or a fictitious creditor had no other trouble than walking to Guildhall in London, or to a master extraordinary in the country, to make a deposition or an affidavit of his debt. Here was no expense, no plunging into a suit, no declarations, no pleadings, no trial, no witnesses, no verdicts, no judgments, no executions; but the benefit of all these at once, by his own oath only! This too often occurred before assignees were chosen, or there being any person who had any knowledge of or means of opposing the claim. The great press of creditors, that appeared before assignees were chosen, was not for the choice only, but to get proofs upon the proceedings without investigation. From this practice, Guildhall, on a busy day, could be compared to nothing but a cock-fight; it was difficult to conceive a scene of greater confusion. The committee recommended, therefore, that the particulars of any debt intended to be proved should be delivered in to the commissioners four days prior to the day appointed for proof. They also proposed to empower the commissioners to strike out debts which had been improperly proved; for, at present, if a debt were admitted, though it was discovered two minutes after to be bad, the commissioners had no power to expunge it, but the assignees must petition the Lord Chancellor for that purpose—a remedy often worse than the disease.—The next branch of the subject related to the nomination of assignees. In Scotland, the provisions of the law respecting the sequestration of a bankrupt's effects, were perfection itself, compared with the law in this country. Two or three assignees were now appointed by the majority of creditors, and they were often placed in a most unpleasant situation. As many bankruptcies were concerted, the bankrupt might turn round on the assignees and prove the invalidity of the commission. The assignees were then liable to be called on to refund all the sums which they had received and expended, and also open to actions for interfering with the bankrupt's property. A man in this situation, not ten days ago, had been cast in an action in 500*l.* damages, and an execution had been put into his house on the judgment. The committee therefore proposed, that a new officer should be appointed, called an agent (similar to the trustee in Scotland) to be chosen by the creditors, subject to the approbation of the commissioners, and who should give security for good conduct, and be remunerated for his trouble. Such a provision would be very beneficial*.—The next

* This provision appears to be called for, not merely to protect persons in the character of assignees, but also for the benefit of the bankrupt's estate. There are many bad motives by which individuals may be induced to offer themselves as candidates for the office of assignees: for instance, they may wish to serve a solicitor with whom they are connected, or a banker with whom they keep money:

point, and that of the greatest importance, respected the facility with which bankrupts obtained their certificates, and the absence of discrimination between the culpable and the unfortunate. Persons had been known to prove debts to a great amount, that they might join in granting a certificate, and it was often more easy for a fraudulent than an honest bankrupt to obtain it. To elucidate what the law was, he would state a case in which a bankrupt had been known to possess 17,000*l.* a short time before: being asked to explain how he had spent it, he answered very truly, that he had expended it in different sorts of profligacy and debauchery, which he detailed. And yet he obtained his certificate, and, by law, he was entitled to it. To guard against such immorality and injustice, the committee proposed, that every certificate should be signed by four-fifths of the creditors, in number and value, and that it should be made a part of the duty of the commissioners to inquire into the previous conduct of the bankrupt in contracting his debts*.—Another point on which the committee had bestowed great attention, was, the capital punishment denounced against bankrupts in certain cases. After what had been so ably urged, particularly by an hon. and learned gentleman (Sir S. Romilly) against that part of the system, he should only say, the case was fully made out, that no good effects could result from a principle of such severity, and that its only operation at present was to prevent the punishment of fraud altogether. (Hear, hear.)—(See page 1043.)—With regard to the allowance which ought to be made to bankrupts, the committee were of opinion, that it ought, generally speaking, to be liberal. This would encourage them to assist their assignees in the recovery of debts. The committee thought that the ordinary measure should be 5 per cent. on the total amount of the dividends, or such further per centage as the commissioners should, upon a consideration of all the circumstances of the case, think it proper to award; but that in no case the allowance should exceed 2,000*l.* This might appear to some persons rather too much, but by those who were acquainted with the number and nature of bankruptcies, and how much depended upon the zeal and activity of bankrupts in the recovery of debts, the sum would be deemed comparatively immaterial.—Another object of the inquiries of the committee had been to provide for the better regulation of the commissioners. At present, the business was very ill managed. This he said with regard to London; but in the country the system was grossly defective; for, while in the former the commissioners were appointed by a judge competent to decide upon their qualifications, in the latter they were selected by the solicitor of the commission, that solicitor being probably influenced in his selection by a calculation upon those who might have an opportunity afterwards of appointing him to an office of the same nature. The latter system was liable to such objections, that Lord Rosslyn, when Chancellor, made out lists of those legal gentlemen from whom eligible persons might be selected as commissioners in several of the principal trading towns in England. But this had not been done by any of his predecessors; and the present Lord Chancellor had disapproved so much of this measure, that he had not, in a single instance, added to these lists, or even filled up the vacancies in them, which had been caused by death. (See page 1055.) The committee therefore proposed, that the trial of commissions of bankruptcy in the country should be put an end to altogether, and that such trials should take place exclusively in London. Such an arrangement might be thought inconvenient, but, on the whole, it would be productive of much less expense and greater justice.—These were the general views of the committee, which they may wish to conceal transactions respecting their own claims, which would be detected by adverse assignees; they may wish to serve the bankrupt: they may be anxious to obtain the bankrupt's customers, which often happens when they are of the same trade as the bankrupt: they may find it convenient to trade with the bankrupt's property: they may contrive to purchase the bankrupt's estate, either directly or in collusion with the bankrupt: they may calculate on retaining unclaimed dividends, which, in commissions where the final dividend has not been made till many years after the bankruptcy, frequently amount to a considerable sum. It is notorious, that the interests of creditors are often materially injured by the maladministration of the bankrupt's estate. Mr. Montagu, in his examination before the committee, says, "I have endeavoured to ascertain the annual loss arising from the mal-administration of bankrupts' estates; and taking any fixed sum, say one hundred pounds on the average under each commission, and if there are upon an average about nine hundred commissions in a year, it will appear that a very large sum is lost, about ninety thousand pounds. An instance proving the necessity of some more vigilance than at present exists, occurred to me only the last week; from very great experience in bankruptcy, and an endeavour as well as I am able to discharge my duty as a commissioner, I certainly am not more likely to be imposed upon than my brother commissioners; I passed an assignee's accounts within ten days from this time, and was perfectly satisfied with the statement; it so happened, that at the meeting for the dividend, an adverse creditor applied to prove his debt, and stated, that his express purpose for so doing was to examine the assignee and his accounts; his proof was admitted, the assignee the day after applied to me voluntarily, and stated that he had made an error in his account, and wished to charge himself with three hundred pounds more. It is impossible for me to state, that this discovery was made by him in consequence of the application of the creditor, but such is my suspicion; it was the last dividend, and I certainly never should have heard any more of it."

* On the subject of certificates, see the opinions of Sir S. Romilly, p. 1047.

had been sitting nearly two years, during which they had applied their utmost industry to the investigation of this subject—a subject which they had found surrounded with legal subtilties, and difficulties of every kind. They had accordingly employed a solicitor, Mr. Freshfield, from whom they had received the most important assistance. In the course of their inquiries they had directed their attention to Ireland, and he understood, that, as the evils of the present system were felt in a greater degree there, it was the intention of that part of the administration which was connected with that country, to adopt such remedial measures as might be found advantageous in England. (Hear, hear.)—The hon. member concluded with moving, "that leave be given to bring in a bill to alter and amend the bankrupt laws."

Sir J. Newport observed, that the effects of the bankrupt laws in Ireland were so mischievous, that if not materially altered, it would soon become necessary to abandon them, as it would be a less evil to live under no law at all, than under a system which in practice was so injurious to the honest trader.

Mr. Wrottesley complained of the present imperfect accommodations provided for commissioners of bankruptcy in the city of London.

Mr. Lockhart said, he was happy to find that the certificate would depend on the good conduct of the bankrupt, and that the commissioners were to be invested with considerable discretion as to the amount of the allowance.

Mr. Finlay said, that nothing could be better than the law for distributing the effects of bankrupts in Scotland, and nothing, he believed, could be worse than the system which existed in Ireland.

Leave was then given to bring in the bill.

REGENCY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.] On the motion of Lord Castlereagh, this bill was read a first time.

LAND-TAX ASSESSMENT.] Mr. Brougham stated, that he had seen in a public journal, the copy of a letter, signed John Thompson, dated Kendal, 9th May, 1818, purporting to be a circular notice to the assessors of the land-tax, not to make out any assessment till they should receive farther instructions. When he considered from what quarter this notice proceeded, that it was given by an officer of the revenue, and that it had a direct tendency to operate against bonâ fide voters, by precluding them from putting their names upon the register of assessment, he was obliged to pronounce it one of the grossest attempts to defraud men of their right of voting, that ever, perhaps, was brought under the consideration of that house. But, before any further proceedings were instituted, he felt it right to move, that a copy be produced forthwith, "of all letters or notices issued by John Thompson, clerk to the commissioners of the land-tax in the town of Kendal, relative to the assessment of that tax during the last two months, together with the names of the commissioners or other persons by whose authority he issued the same."

Mr. Lushington said, that the subject had never been before the treasury, but it appeared, on inquiry at the tax-office, that a reference had been made by Thompson, with regard to some cottages of the value of 40*s*. each, in certain parishes in Westmorland, for the purpose of knowing whether they were assessable or not to the land-tax. The reply of Mr. Lowndes was, that this liability did not depend on the value only, but on the title and other qualities of the estate. This was all that was known upon the subject at the treasury, or the tax-office.

Mr. Brougham said, that whatever might have been the original letter, the notice related to electioneering.

Lord Lowther believed that the letter had been copied from a provincial paper, and that it contained many false and scandalous statements.

Mr. Wynn observed, that the officers of the revenue were the last persons to express an opinion on subjects of election.

Sir J. Graham expressed his belief that no such letter had been written as that bearing, or purporting to bear, the signature of John Thompson. The fact was, that a great deal of property, never assessed for the last hundred years, had lately been offered for that purpose, and he apprehended, that it was the duty of the local commissioners, to give instructions to the collecting officers on such a subject. He wished to see the whole correspondence produced.

The motion was agreed to.

ENGLISH COURTS OF JUSTICE.] Sir J. Newport rose to submit a motion relative to the commission appointed two years ago to inquire into abuses in courts of justice in England. He observed that, contrary to his opinion, the commission included two masters in chancery, Mr. Campbell and Mr. Alexander, besides other gentlemen in the profession, and their salaries amounted to 1200*l*. a-year, while the commissioners appointed for the same purpose in Scotland, had only 800*l*. The Irish commissioners had presented several reports, and the Scotch commissioners had presented four; whereas the English commissioners had presented only one report, and even in that, they had committed so signal a mistake, that they had been obliged afterwards to make a separate appendix, or supplement to correct it. They had sanctioned in their report the payment of a fee of from one guinea to twenty-seven shillings, which it had been usual to pay on the admission of solicitors to practise in the court of Chancery, although an act of parliament expressly declared, that such fee should not, in any case, exceed one shilling. This single instance would enable the house to judge of the superior fitness of masters in Chancery to form a part of such a commission, when they overlooked an act relating to the business of their own offices. Yet this commission had already cost the country 21,000*l.* while the Irish commission, which had done its duty so much more effectually, cost only 16,000*l.*; and the Scotch commission only 10,000*l.* He therefore moved, "That the committee of finance having, in their tenth report, brought under the view of the house the appointment of two masters in Chancery as commissioners to examine into the English courts of justice; and having adverted to the considerable expense incurred, and the tendency to prolong their duration, in commissions of this nature;

"The house does entirely agree with their committee in the opinions there expressed, that no unnecessary delay should be allowed to take place, that frequent returns of the progress of those commissions should be submitted to the house, and that an expeditious and diligent execution of such important examinations can hardly be supposed where any of the commissioners have other official duties to perform."

Mr. Bathurst defended the conduct of the English commissioners. He thought that masters in Chancery were highly proper persons to be in such a commission; for although they were unable to devote their time exclusively to the object of the commission, yet their experience atoned for that inconvenience. They had sat more days, and had laid before the house a larger mass of information than on any former inquiry of a similar description. Upon the whole he did not conceive that sufficient grounds had been laid for the motion of the hon. baronet, and therefore he should move the previous question.

Mr. Courtenay observed, that the hon. baronet had not contented himself with throwing out general insinuations against the two masters in Chancery, but had actually thrown out that they were peculiarly ill-fitted on account of the fees which they received. The fee in question was a fee of 1*l.* which was paid by solicitors on their admission. The instrument of admission was prepared for the Master of the Rolls by the clerk of the public office, and the fee on that occasion was one in which the masters had not the slightest interest. He was persuaded that the duties of the commissioners had been most anxiously and faithfully performed; and with respect to that individual fee, he conceived that the statement was calculated to make an erroneous impression.

Mr. Webber entered into a defence of the Irish commissioners, and contended, that they had been most laborious in the investigation of the business committed to their charge.

Mr. Bathurst said, he did not intend to make any invidious comparison; but the question brought before the house was, that the English commissioners had been very negligent. It appeared to him that they had done as much as any other commissioners.

The Solicitor-General remarked, that the hon. baronet, in drawing a comparison between the Scotch and Irish and the English commissioners, had argued, that the latter had not done enough. He, on the contrary, declared, that the English commissioners had employed as much time, bestowed as much labour, and produced as many materials as the other commissioners. He could not help thinking that the motion was intended to imply an imputation on the conduct of those commissioners; but he put it to the house to say, whether any case had been made out against them.

Sir C. Saxton contended that the Irish commissioners had devoted the utmost attention to the objects of inquiry, and had investigated every fee that came under their notice.

The Attorney-General said, that the gentlemen appointed under the English commission, were persons of great legal knowledge, and had discharged their duties in a manner that entitled them to the highest praise; but it appeared from the statement of the hon. baronet, that they had been guilty of the crying sin of overlooking the fee, in the act of Geo. II., relative to the admission of solicitors. The learned individuals in question, if they were neither too much employed in their other duties, nor accessible to any improper bias, were the fittest persons to inquire into the practice and fees of the court to which they belonged. The masters in Chancery could thus assist with their peculiar knowledge the other members of the commission, who without their assistance must, by a more circuitous way, obtain the information which they could supply. They could best tell what were the fees of their own office, whether sufficient or not, whether warranted by law, or growing out of abuse and other circumstances. The commissioners seemed well selected for their duty, and the commission well calculated to accomplish its object.

Mr. Lockhart thought, that such a passage as that in the act in question, might escape the vigilance of any man. So far from being liable to censure, he conceived that the commissioners were entitled to great praise for their exertions.

Sir J. Newport, in reply, said, that he had from the beginning objected to the appointment of masters in Chancery to inquire into abuses in their own offices. He meant no offence to those learned persons; he did not even know them, and was willing to allow them all the praises which their friends had bestowed upon them; but still he persisted in his former opinion, that they ought not to have been in the commission.

The previous question was then put and agreed to.

MOCK AUCTIONS BILL.] Mr. Alderman Atkins obtained leave to withdraw this bill, and moved for leave to bring in another bill, the object of which he explained to be, to impose a duty on every lot sold at auctions.

On the suggestion of Mr. Speaker, that it was not probable such a bill could pass through its different stages, in both houses, during this session, the hon. alderman withdrew his motion.

CLANDESTINE MARRIAGES BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, May 28.

ROYAL ASSENT.] The royal assent was given by commission to the Bank restriction bill, and the Spanish slave-trade bill.

The commissioners were, the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, and the Earl of Shaftesbury.

CHURCHES IN SCOTLAND BILL.] This bill was brought from the Commons, and read a first time.

CLANDESTINE MARRIAGES BILL.] This bill was brought from the Commons, and read a first time.

PARISH VESTRIES BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

SAVING BANKS BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

FEVER HOSPITALS (IRELAND) BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed*.

Their lordships then adjourned till Saturday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, May 28.

CHURCHES IN SCOTLAND BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

USURY LAWS.] Mr. Serjeant Onslow presented the following Report from the Select Committee appointed to consider of the laws which regulate or restrain the interest of Money.

1. That the laws regulating or restraining the rate of interest have been extensively evaded, and have failed of the effect of imposing a maximum on such rate; and that of late years, from the constant excess of the market rate of interest above the rate limited by law, they have added to the expense incurred by borrowers on real security, and that such borrowers have been compelled to resort to the mode of granting annuities on lives, a mode which has been made a cover for obtaining higher interest than the rate limited by law, and has farther subjected the borrowers to enormous charges, or forced them to make very disadvantageous sales of their estates.

2. That the construction of such laws, as applicable to the transactions of commerce as at present carried on, have been attended with much uncertainty as to the legality of many transactions of frequent occurrence, and consequently been productive of much embarrassment and litigation.

3. That the present period, when the market rate of interest is below the legal rate, affords an opportunity peculiarly proper for the repeal of the said laws.

The report was ordered to be printed, and Mr. Serjeant Onslow gave notice, that, early in the next session, he would bring in a bill to repeal the Usury Laws.

PORTUGAL SLAVE TRADE TREATY BILL.] Lord Castlereagh moved the third reading of this bill.

Dr. Phillimore said, that this was the first time that the legislature had interfered for the purpose of justifying officers in detaining ships belonging to the subjects of a foreign state. He conceived such an enactment to be at least superfluous, as the authority for the object specified emanated from the prerogative of the crown, and the act of the crown was the act of the nation. Should Portuguese ships be brought into this country by virtue of an embargo laid on by the executive government, and should the transaction afterwards terminate amicably, would any enactment be necessary for the justification of the officers who had detained the ships in consequence of the embargo?—He also saw with regret an article in the treaty for the appointment of commissary judges, and commissioners of arbitration, for the adjustment of disputed claims. By this enactment, a ground would be laid for neutral nations to renew the claim of having contested rights tried by the tribunals of the country from whose subjects the property had been captured. Though the principle had been departed from in the case of Spain, he had hoped that Portugal would have had faith enough in the justice of Great Britain, to have abided by the decision of her ordinary tribunals of international law.

Lord Castlereagh said, that the convention had reference to the particular case of the detention of ships having slaves on board, and made no alteration in the law of nations. It did not proceed from the prerogative of the crown, and the right of making war and peace, and consequently would not derive its justification from that prerogative.—By the appointment of a mixed tribunal, a final decision of the cause would be found, which would not be the case should it be sent to the ordinary tribunals. The case was one of special policy, and a general enactment was necessary to cover all the questions that might arise.

The Attorney-General said, that without the enactment in the bill, an action of trespass might be brought against a British officer detaining a Portuguese ship, as had happened in the case of an American vessel detained for a supposed breach of the Navigation act. In the case of prizes alone could the prerogative of the crown avail the captor, as with prizes the courts of law had nothing to do. Courts of prizes were established by nations for adjudication in times of war.—We should certainly not choose that a Portuguese tribunal should judge of matters respecting our vessels taken by them. A mixed jurisdiction had therefore appeared the most satisfactory and proper.

* In a former note (page 1511) some account is given of the origin of hospitals among the Greeks. It may be now added, that among the Romans, Fabiola was the first person who ever erected an hospital for the sick. During her lifetime, she gave every thing she possessed—and her family estates were then very great—entirely to the relief of the poor and afflicted. She was a descendant of Fabius Maximus Verrucosus, the great opponent of Hannibal, but lived many ages after his time.—See the life of Fabiola, written by St. Jerome.

Dr. Phillimore, in reply, observed, that he was not able, from any thing which had been said, to distinguish the seizure of vessels under this treaty, from the case of an embargo.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

POOR LAWS.] Mr. S. Bourne moved to refer a most valuable communication from the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland on the subject of a provision for the poor, to the committee on the poor laws. The document to which he alluded, contained a variety of suggestions of the utmost importance, and reflected the highest credit on the talents and industry of that body from which it emanated. He was sorry that he happened not to be in the house when an hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Brougham) had given notice of his intention to bring forward some propositions upon the subject of the poor laws, as he was naturally anxious to know what plan he had in view, and he regretted, that the hon. and learned gentleman had been unable, from the variety of his avocations, to give his assistance to the committee in the progress of their labours.

Mr. Brougham concurred with the right hon. gentleman, that no communication respecting the poor laws could come from any quarter with greater authority than from the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland; in which country, although there were no poor laws, the poor were not unprovided for; and he joined in the expression of gratitude, due for a production equal to any expectations that could have been formed from the learning and abilities of its authors. With regard to his own views on the subject of the poor laws, he declined to submit them to the house, until they could be accompanied by all the details necessary for their illustration, and he had not yet had time to digest them, in consequence, particularly, of his employment in the committee upon the subject of charitable institutions. When he mentioned the continued sitting of that committee, it might appear somewhat surprising to those who merely understood that a bill for appointing a commission of inquiry by the crown was now in progress. If he thought, indeed, that the bill were likely to pass in the form which had received the approbation of that house, he should see no reason for the production of any further report; but he was sorry to say, that objections had been raised in a quarter whence they were not expected, objections which could not be ascribed to any fellow-feeling with the authors of the abuses in question—any participation in an interest in their continuance—any unfounded or shameful alarm at the corrections and remedies which the bill provided—but to the extraordinary subtilty alone of some men's minds. It was hardly credible that those objections should have been made by the learned person, in whose hand-writing, and at whose suggestion, all the material alterations and provisoes had been introduced, and adopted for the express purpose, if any thing less than a miracle could effect it, of removing and settling his doubts. (Hear, hear.) The bill, however, it now appeared, was to be cut down and emasculated, and its whole virtue withdrawn, and was then to be called a bill for promoting effectual inquiry. If such a bill were to be sent back to them, filled with modifications which had been triumphantly rejected when brought forward in that house, he trusted that they would know how to consult their own dignity, and he, instead of taking any steps respecting it, should direct his attention to the preparation of some other measure. He trusted that a committee of that house would fearlessly pursue its object in spite of all the difficulties with which the timid sceptical legislator, the weak and panic-struck alarmist, the mere—but he would refrain from giving full expression to his thoughts—might attempt to impede its course. He was confident that the house would vindicate its own incontestible rights and privileges, that its committees would not shrink from the performance of their duties, however laborious, and even costly, as compared with the proceedings of a commission, and would ultimately submit a proposition suitable to the exigencies of the case, and satisfactory to the universal and loudly-expressed sense of men of all ranks in the community. Communications poured in upon him from every part of the country, expressive of one common sentiment, that the proceedings of the committee involved the most important interests of the people; (hear, hear) and he now gave notice, that, on Tuesday next, he would submit a motion to the house upon the subject to which his observations referred.

The house then adjourned till Saturday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Saturday, May 30.

ROYAL ASSENT.] The royal assent was given by commission to the Duke of Kent's Annuity bill, the Saving Banks bill, the Fever Hospitals (Ireland) bill, and the Building of Churches bill*. The commissioners were the

* On Tuesday, July 28, a meeting was held at the Privy Council office, for the purpose of opening the commission instituted for the erection of new churches. The following is the list of the distinguished persons who have been appointed to regulate and superintend the execution of the act of parliament:—

Archbishop of Canterbury	Bishop of Winchester
Archbishop of York	Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry
Bishop of London

Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Shaftesbury, and Lord Melville.

GRAND JURY PRESENTMENTS BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

ROCK SALT DUTIES BILL.] This bill was brought from the Commons, and read a first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Saturday, May 30.

ROCK SALT DUTIES BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

COMMISSIONERS OF BANKRUPTS.] On the motion of Mr. J. Smith, the house resolved itself into a committee on the salaries payable to Commissioners of Bankrupts, when the following resolutions were agreed to, and ordered to be reported on Monday next:—1. "That provision be made out of the consolidated fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, for defraying the Salaries of the Commissioners of Bankrupts, in lieu of fees."*—2. "That the Lords Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, be authorized to issue out of the consolidated fund of the said United Kingdom, any sum not exceeding 30,000*l.* for providing a suitable building for holding the public and private meetings of the Commissioners of Bankrupts, and for the transaction of all business in Bankruptcy."

BANKRUPT MEETINGS BILL.] Mr. Wrottesley moved for and obtained leave to bring in a bill "to repeal so much of the Bankrupt Laws as requires creditors to meet for the city of London, and all places within the bills of mortality, at the Guildhall of the said city."—The bill was brought in, and read a first time.

LAND-TAX ASSESSMENT.] Mr. Lushington presented a copy of correspondence between the tax-office and the assessors of land-tax in Westmorland.

Mr. Brougham wished to call the attention of the house to this correspondence, particularly to the letter of Mr. Johnson to the commissioners of taxes, in which he described himself as being the secretary to the committee for ma-

Bishop of Lincoln	Rev. John Headlam
Bishop of Chester	The Lord Chancellor
Rev. Dr. Ireland, (Dean of Westminster)	The Earl of Harrowby
	Earl of Liverpool
Rev. Dr. Pott, (Archdeacon of London)	Earl of Hardwicke
	Viscount Sidmouth
Rev. G. O. Cambridge, (Archdeacon of Middlesex)	Lord Grenville
	Lord Kenyon
	Lord Colchester
Rev. F. J. H. Wollaston, (Archdeacon of Essex)	Right Hon. C. Manners Sutton
Rev. J. Eyre, (Archdeacon of Nottingham)	Right Hon. N. Vansittart
	Right. Hon. C. Bathurst
Rev. E. Outram, (Archdeacon of Derby)	Right Hon. Sir W. Scott
	Right Hon. Sir J. Nicholl
Rev. Dr. Mant	Right Hon. W. Huskisson
Rev. Dr. Wordsworth	Francis Burton, Esq.
Rev. T. D. Whitaker, LL.D.	B. C. Stephenson, Esq.
	Joshua Watson, Esq.

* This appears to be one of the most salutary alterations of the present system of administering the bankrupt laws. Mr. Montagu, in his examination before the Committee, says,—"With respect to the appointment of commissioners, it appears to me to be deserving consideration, whether the small emoluments attendant upon the office are sufficient to secure gentlemen sufficiently acquainted with the law, to prevent that loss of time and consequent expense to the creditors attendant upon long explanations, which would be unnecessary were the gentlemen fully acquainted with the law. In my attendance upon the different lists of commissioners, I see a constant alteration, so that I am now occasionally obliged to argue to new commissioners questions which were settled by the previous board, and which before that previous board, I used to argue for some years ago; litigation, attendant upon petitions to the Lord Chancellor, is a consequence of this. It appears to me, if I am right in my view of this, that it is unavoidable in the present system, from the insufficiency of the emoluments to insure the undivided attention, or the permanent continuance of gentlemen of ability. As to the individual attention of commissioners, it appears to me, that gentlemen of attainment and in considerable practice who are commissioners, are, in proportion to their value, necessarily at different places attendant upon the discharge of different duties, instead of being confined to the discharge of the duty of commissioners; and as to their permanent continuance, it is obvious that the appointment of commissioners is very frequently more as a passage to other situations, than as a permanent situation. I could, if it were necessary, mention many striking instances where, whatever advantages the community may have obtained by the appointment of the gentlemen to different situations, we have to lament the loss of them as commissioners of bankrupt. It appears to me also, that the mode of payment of commissioners is deserving of consideration. At present, in the finding of a bankruptcy, the commissioners have always an interest in declaring that the person is a bankrupt; and it is to be remembered that this declaration is at a private meeting, when all the proceedings are ex-parte. I do not mean to say that this motive warps the minds of gentlemen who act as commissioners, but I submit it to be deserving consideration, whether the legislature should suffer any judge to be placed in a situation where, by possibility, he may be so influenced. It appears to me also, that the payment is objectionable, from its appearing to be wrong; it is by payment in court to the judge, as if he were a counsel. I have repeatedly seen, what I have felt to be very painful, altercations by whom the fees should be paid to the commissioners; and I once heard commissioners refuse to proceed until their fees were paid. It appears to me to be of so much importance in the administration of justice, not only that what is right ought to be done, but that the appearance should be proper also, that I think it right to mention these facts. But it is not apparently objectionable only, for it may be really injurious, sometimes by creating unnecessary expense in meetings, which might be avoided; and sometimes by their declining to do what is just between the parties, to avoid the appearance of injustice, which I have occasionally witnessed."

naging the election of the present members for Westmorland. The writer went on to ask for certain returns of land-tax, in which return, he told the commissioners of taxes that Lord Thanet's property need not be included. Now this was the letter of an electioneering agent to the commissioners of taxes, a person who never ought to have been allowed to approach the tax-office; yet to this letter, Mr. Winter, the secretary to the board of taxes, the next day returned a most courteous answer, recognizing him in his character of secretary to the committee for managing the election of the present members, and informing him, that the returns for which he asked, would be furnished to him by the assessors of the several districts. If, however, any should be wanting there, the tax-office would furnish them. This was a most flagrant breach of the privileges of the house, and if notice were not taken of it by the proper quarter, he should move to bring the parties implicated to the bar of the house.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, the whole of this correspondence was new to him, and he wished to have time to make inquiry before he gave any opinion upon it.

Mr. Brougham said, it appeared to him that there was a system of electioneering policy established in favour of the present members for Westmorland, and that the commissioners of taxes were parties to it. This was one of the grossest attacks upon the freedom of election, that he had ever witnessed; and he trusted that the house would not pass it over without shewing their sense of it by calling its authors to the bar. The letter to which he had on a former night alluded, namely, that of Mr. Thompson, had turned out to be a real document, and not a fabrication.

Lord Lowther declared himself ignorant of the whole transaction.

Illicit Distillation (Ireland).] General Hart rose to call the attention of the house to the several acts relating to distillation of spirits in Ireland. He said that, it was impossible for him to enumerate all the instances which had occurred, of the severity with which the law had been administered. That severity certainly had been great; and the expenses attending the system had been very considerable. In 1814, the expenses incurred in rewards alone, under the present system of preventing illicit distillation, was 8864*l*., while 71,000*l*. had been paid to lawyers. Returns had been produced, stating what had been the exact diminution or increase of illicit distillation; and it was proved to have increased since the late severe penalties with which it had been visited. In former times, it had been sufficient to confiscate the property of the distiller, and to punish him; but now the punishment fell, in fact, on the township. There was no civilized country in the world where a similar system prevailed, and there was hardly any country where similar practices did not occur; in some parts, indeed, the pains of death were not sufficient to prevent them. The hon. general concluded with moving, "That leave be given to bring in a bill to repeal such parts of the act of the 54th of the King, and all former acts relating to distillation of spirits, as authorize the imposing and levying of fines on Town Lands and other districts in Ireland."

Sir G. Hill opposed the motion. He said, that the fines on town lands were enacted by the Irish parliament in 1783, and were amended by the parliament of the United Kingdom in 1803. In 1810, Mr. Wellesley Pole, at that time Chancellor of the Exchequer for Ireland, prevailed on parliament to suspend their operation for two years, and in the year 1812, they were repealed. The immediate consequence was, that though the gaols were crowded with people who had been connected with illicit distillation, the practice increased to a very great extent. In 1813, petitions, signed by the most respectable gentlemen and merchants, were presented from Drogheda, Belfast, Londonderry, and Tyrone, praying for the re-enactment of those laws. A committee was appointed, composed entirely of members for Ireland, and they reported, that it would be highly expedient and beneficial to restore the former system. This report was approved of by the house, and a bill conformable to it was passed. In 1816, another committee was appointed, and they again reported in favour of the town land fines. He contended, therefore, that the house ought not to abrogate the existing laws on this subject; they should hold the principle of town land fines over the country, as severity was essential to abolish illicit distillation, a practice most baneful in its effects. Since the laws had been re-enacted, smuggling had greatly decreased, and he felt persuaded that, if they were continued, it would be at last annihilated.

Lord Compton pressed upon the gallant general the propriety of withdrawing the motion.

Mr. Chichester said, that if the proper powers had been exercised, the practice of illicit distillation would have been put down, and it would not have been necessary to resort to this unconstitutional measure. At least it should not have been resorted to till all other means had been tried in vain.

Mr. Peel said, the first question was, had the measure been efficacious? If not, there was ground for repeal. It might be efficacious and yet unjust, and then there was no reason why it should not be repealed. It might, however, have failed in one district, and have been efficacious in the rest of Ireland. There was not one petition against it, except from the county of Donegal. On the contrary, documents had been presented, proving the system to have been as successful as could have been anticipated. If he compared the number of fines, and found a decrease with the system, then it might be said to be successful. If he examined the rewards to the civil and military power, and found them diminish, then it might be said that it was efficacious. The quantity of illicit spirits increasing, rendered the demand for legal spirits less; but if the latter increased, then he might argue that the system was successful. In five years great alterations had taken place among the fines. In Lent assizes, 1814, there had been 1,327 still fines; in 1815, 1,506; in 1816, 1,058; and in 1818, the amount had diminished to 368. The two last years had diminished by one-fourth. Of rewards in 1813, the sum paid to the military and to the civil power had amounted to 21,000*l.*; in 1815 it was 15,000*l.*; and last year 7,000*l.* Last year, therefore, it was one-third of the sum paid in 1813. With regard to legal spirits, in three years in the county of Derry there had been consumed 18,000 gallons before the operation of this measure, but in the last three years the consumption had been 111,000 gallons, six times the amount of the former. In Strabane, the last three years' consumption had been 90,000, six times the amount of the quantity for three years before. In Ulster, the consumption for the three last years had been 1,510,000 gallons, a quantity greater than what had been consumed in three years before the measure was in operation. In 1817, the fines on the whole of Ireland, except Donegal, were 593, and in that county 619 more than in all Ireland besides. For the last five years in Kilkenny there had been 13 fines, in Cork 12, in Wicklow 5, in Waterford 3, and in Kerry not one. For these 33, there had been in Donegal 3,400; that is, for every one in these parts there had been 100 in the county of Donegal. The question then arose, why could not things be managed differently in that county? There were various causes to be assigned. It was a fact, that, in that county, the tithes amounted in the worst and most remote parts, to 12*s.* per acre. A memorial had been presented by Mr. Robert Young to the Board of Excise, in which he had expressed his surprise that he should have suffered more than those who had employed all their exertions to support illicit distillation, though it had been his constant endeavour to suppress it. By the evidence of a revenue officer, which had not been contradicted, Mr. Lucius Carey had actually imported man-traps, with the avowed intention of catching any revenue officer that might come near them. There seemed to be a particular fondness for illicit spirits in Donegal, which, perhaps, operated as a kind of premium for them. The gallant general on his examination, on one occasion, had been asked what sort of whiskey was most sought after; to which he had replied, "If the people could get any other, they would not drink parliament whiskey." He was asked whether he gave his hay-makers what he called parliament whiskey (meaning legal spirit); to which he replied, "he would not give them that if he could get any other." Many of the inferences that had been drawn on this subject were totally erroneous.

Sir N. Colthurst thought that the system would finally prove effectual in Donegal. Its discontinuance would be the greatest injury to those who had large distilleries.

Mr. Parnell said, that the measure was most vexatious. It was not only operative when a still was found any where, but if a worm or any part of a still were found; and it was known that, if any quarrel or disagreement existed, a man had nothing to do but to go and put a still on the person's ground with whom he had quarrelled.

Mr. V. Fitzgerald said, that the measure by no means justified the strong expressions that had been used against it. He deprecated the mode in which the gallant general had come forward at such a period of the session, without making a single statement in support of his motion. If in Donegal the measure had not operated, the rule should not be ex uno disce omnes.

Mr. Knox said, that if the question came to a division, he should vote for the repeal.

General Hart replied. It had been said, that he had no grounds for his motion. His grounds were—to prevent cruelty and oppression; his arguments—that the law provided punishment enough in fine, imprisonment, and transportation. He defended the conduct of the gentlemen of Donegal, and after giving notice of some further proceeding in the next session, concluded by expressing his willingness to withdraw the motion.

The motion was then put, and negatived without a division*.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, June 1.

STEAM BOATS REGULATION BILL.] Lord Melville moved the order of the day for reading this bill, with the view of postponing it. He observed, that there were in this bill provisions which, in his opinion, ought not to obtain the sanction of parliament. The order being read, it was, on his lordship's motion, postponed.

REWARDS ON CONVICTION BILL.] This bill was committed, and the report received.

PRIVATELY STEALING (IRELAND) BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

SLAVE TRADE.] The Earl of Liverpool laid on the table a copy of the Treaty between his Britannic Majesty and his Majesty the king of the Netherlands, for preventing their Subjects from engaging in any Traffic in Slaves." Signed at the Hague, May 4th, 1818.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Lord King presented a petition from certain inhabitants of

* The Rev. Edw. Chichester, a beneficed clergyman, and a magistrate, resident near Enishowen, in the county of Donegal, has written two pamphlets to expose the grievances arising out of the laws on this subject. He presents a mass of abuses and oppressions, intolerable if they really exist, and absolutely frightful to contemplate.

Westminster, praying for a Reform of Parliament. It referred to an opinion stated to have been given from high authority, that parliament could alter the constitution; and asked, if that were the case, might not it be altered to the despotic constitution of Ferdinand VII. or of the Dey of Algiers? It described lawyers as men of narrow minds, prayed for universal suffrage and annual parliaments, and called upon their lordships to define what was the constitution. It was signed by Major Cartwright, Messrs. Walker, Maclaren, Place, and several other inhabitant householders of the city and liberties of Westminster.

The Lord Chancellor observed, that as the petition stated great lawyers to be men of narrow minds, it was singular enough that the petitioners should have chosen the son of one of those narrow-minded persons to present their remonstrance to their lordships. The ancestor of the noble lord who had presented the petition was a warm advocate of the liberties of his country; and he hoped that a descendant of a Lord Chancellor would always be found ready to bring under the consideration of their lordships the just complaints of the people; but when the absurdity of this petition, and the language in which it was couched, was considered, he trusted that a descendant of Lord Chancellor King would not consider it one which their lordships ought to receive.

Lord Holland did not see why the absurdity of the prayer or the language of a petition should form an argument for not laying it on the table. That it was unintelligible might be a very good reason for not reading it; but as it had been presented and read, he thought it should be received.

The petition was rejected.

ALIEN BILL.] Lord Sidmouth moved that this bill be committed. He observed, that when the events and circumstances of the French Revolution were considered, it was not surprising that the effect of that great convulsion should not yet have subsided. It was true, that many of the persons who had been concerned in the overthrow of the French government, and in the attempt to overthrow the governments of other countries, were dead, but the spirit still existed in many parts of Europe. It was with the view of counteracting the effects which this revolutionary spirit might have in this country that the first alien law had been enacted, and for the same object it was now proposed to continue it for two years longer. It was necessary to keep out, as well as to send out, of this country those persons who should avail themselves of the vicinity of France to foster a spirit menacing to the security of this and the other governments of Europe. He was aware it might be said, that the situation of things was very different now, and at the time when the alien law was first enacted; that the year 1818, with the country at peace, was not at all like 1793, and the country at war: but if their lordships compared those periods, they must also take into their consideration the difference of the two measures. It was by no means accurate or just to assert that this measure resembled that of 1793, for they were, in fact, of a different nature. By the act of 1793, aliens were made subject to very severe regulations, and were exposed to penalties if they violated them. They could not land at any port in the country without a license from the government. The place of their residence was fixed, and they could not travel to a distance of more than 10 miles from it without a special license obtained for that purpose. There were no such provisions in the present bill, which merely proposed to provide for the regular exercise of an authority which, he must contend, belonged to the executive government. It was true that this authority, to the extent to which it had been laid down, was questioned by some; but even those who most objected to the doctrine, admitted that a power for the removal of foreigners, in periods of danger, ought to be lodged somewhere. That power was one of the prerogatives of the crown, and it must be exercised in some way or other, either under proclamation or under a legislative enactment. The present bill merely provided for its prompt exercise, and, in fact, tended only to give effect to the prerogative. He was, however, ready to acknowledge, that such a measure ought not to be adopted without necessity; but the existence of such a necessity was at the present moment unquestionable. At a time when all the governments of Europe deemed it necessary to expel from their territories, or place under particular regulations, obnoxious foreigners, was it to be contended that this country ought to form an exception to that policy? Were we to cherish the revolutionary spirit, and to allow all factious individuals to find an asylum in this country? He would ask, whether the evils of such a course of proceeding would not be infinitely greater than any that could possibly arise from this bill? Before he moved the commitment of the bill, he should briefly state the nature of a clause which he intended to propose, the necessity of which would appear from the circumstances he was about to state. An act of the Scotch parliament passed in 1685, for the establishment of the Bank of Scotland, contained a clause by which all foreigners holding shares in that bank became thereby naturalized subjects of Scotland, and, according to the act of Union, all subjects of Scotland were naturalized in England. It appeared, therefore, that any foreigner, by investing a small sum of money in the Bank of Scotland, might become a naturalized subject of Great Britain. All the pains which their lordships had hitherto taken in framing regulations for naturalization, and all the precautions adopted in passing naturalization bills, might have been superseded by the short process he had described. At the expense of a very inconsiderable sum, any foreigner might become a subject, and all alien bills would be of no avail. His attention had been called to the effect of this act of the Scotch parliament only within these few days. Had the discovery been made at a more early period of the session, he should have proposed a short bill to meet the case. There would not, now, be time for discussing a proposition for the repeal of this act, but he would recommend to their lordships the suspension of its operation during the period in which the present bill should continue in force.

Earl Fitzwilliam said, he had given his assent to this measure when it was originally proposed, because there then appeared to be a reasonable ground for giving such a power to the executive government; and he had not objected to its renewal when the subject was last under consideration, because he believed that the act would have been allowed to expire at the period to which it was limited; but he could not, without pain, see his Majesty's ministers again calling on their lordships to pass a bill of this kind. It was demanding the continuance of a system of arbitrary authority, for which no reason existed, and which they ought not to be permitted to possess. He should therefore give his vote against this measure.

The Duke of Sussex said, he had opposed the former bill on this subject, and he conscientiously felt it to be his duty to oppose the present measure. But, even though he had not felt the strongest objections to the principle of the measure, occurrences which had taken place in the course of the last year, and which proved the improper manner in which the power given to ministers had been executed, would have been sufficient to have induced him to oppose it. With the case of an individual (Baron Eden) against whom the alien act had been enforced his name had been connected; but he sincerely despised all the insinuations that had been made on that subject and he would now state the facts which had come to his knowledge to their lordships. An officer, who held a commission in the British service, had been tried in Portugal for a pretended conspiracy. In consequence of that trial, his name was struck out of the army list, by his Majesty's government. But this was not all: having escaped, he arrived at one of the outports in a ship from Lisbon; upon which, the government immediately ordered the expenses of his passage to be paid, and sent him on board of another vessel to be conveyed out of the country. As to the trial, he firmly believed that this gentleman was perfectly innocent of the charges brought against him; but for his part he had no communication with him at the period of that trial, nor for five or six years preceding it, when he knew him in the family of an illustrious friend. For himself, he felt that he stood clear of all imputation on the subject; but if their lordships knew what the nature of a state trial in Portugal was, he apprehended that they would not regard the circumstance of this officer having been condemned as a point of much consideration. The Portuguese practice was, that immediately upon a conviction in favour of the crown, the judge was promoted. What might be the guilt or innocence of this individual, it was not for their lordships to determine, but there appeared no reason why he should have been deprived of the protection of the laws of this country. It was right that a jealousy of the power of ministers should exist, and he for one could not help strongly entertaining that jealousy, when he found them guilty of such acts, and the more especially when he heard it asserted that this measure was necessary for the tranquillity of other countries. It was proper to pass laws for the tranquillity of England; but to invest ministers with arbitrary power, under the pretence of maintaining the tranquillity of other countries, was what he would always protest against. He also particularly objected to the language of the preamble of the bill, which, contrary to fact, appeared to ground the expediency of the measure on circumstances which had taken place since the last act was passed.

Lord Holland regarded the measure as most unjust and impolitic. The grounds on which it had been attempted to induce their lordships to agree to this bill—namely, that few persons had been sent out of the country under the former act, and that those who were sent were persons of notoriously bad characters—were either totally inconsistent or untrue. The argument which had, he believed, the most effect in reconciling the public mind to this measure, was that which was founded on the small number of persons against whom it had been enforced. The objection, however, was not merely to the number of persons sent out of the country, but to the cruelty with which the act operated on those who were allowed to remain in it. The noble Secretary of State had begged the question, when he inferred that those persons who came to this country must necessarily be of bad character. He had said, "Would you make this country a receptacle for all the persons of bad character whom other governments may think proper to expel from their dominions?" But, was there ever a time when the governments to which he alluded did not possess the power of sending any person they pleased out of their territories? This, however, formed one of the principal objections to the measure. The illustrious person who had just spoken had pointed out a case which shewed the fallacy of taking the exclusion of individuals by foreign governments as a criterion of character. Could their lordships be induced to place any reliance, either on the decisions of foreign courts of justice, or the acts of foreign governments, in such cases? Were such decisions or acts ever regarded by their ancestors? Louis XIV., or any other despot of former times, found no difficulty in saying, that the unfortunate individuals whom they persecuted, and drove into exile, were persons of bad character: but that did not prevent them from obtaining an asylum in England. Their lordships could not, therefore, refer to experience to shew that the power given to ministers had not been unduly exercised, for it was a power of that nature which could not be exercised without abuse. But it was not merely on account of the cruel situation in which this bill placed foreigners, by cutting them off from every refuge, it was the principle of the bill itself that excited the most decided hostility. The noble viscount had contended that this bill did not deny protection to aliens in general; but it did, in effect, deny them all right and all protection; and when he said that the bill had only desperate and abandoned characters for its object, he forgot that the innocent as well as the guilty were equally subject to its operation; he forgot the prejudice it must excite against every alien who came into the country, and how entirely dependent it must render him on the will of every man with whom he had to deal. The noble viscount, too, had laid great stress on the argument, that no abuse had yet been committed. Let their lordships look into this boasted assertion a little. He (Lord Holland) held, that there was no arbitrary power that was unattended with abuse. The persons invested with such power might have the clemency of Titus or Vespasian; they might be endued with the deepest penetration, and the highest qualities of intellectual wisdom, and still the knowledge that they were in possession of arbitrary power might enable others to abuse it. Did not the noble viscount know, that to whatever individual he might shew countenance or favour, that individual was immediately enabled to take undue advantage over any unfortunate alien with whom he might be engaged in any transaction? Would the noble viscount say that he was not himself liable to be deceived? Suppose, while he was walking home that night, he should meet or speak kindly to any individual who owed an alien money, that very circumstance might, perhaps, afford a ground for ill usage. Such an individual, relying perhaps on the noble viscount's good opinion of him, might whisper insinuations to the prejudice of the alien. If there were no alien act, the foreigner might set such wickedness at defiance. Conscious of his own integrity, he might boldly meet his debtor, and rely on the laws of the country. But, at present, insinuations of the slightest nature might intimidate the alien to submit to any injustice. When it was urged that these were imaginary cases, he did not like to mention names, but he knew that such things had happened. The late M. De Boffe had expended large sums on an importation of foreign books; one of them was considered to contain matters not exactly agreeable to certain persons in this country. A hint was given to M. De Boffe, that he should take care what works he sold. This alarmed him so much, that he sent back the whole parcel, and suffered a great loss by the undertaking. Now, if he who had resided so long in this country, who had friends and legal advisers, and knew its customs so well, was put to all this loss and inconvenience, how much worse must the case be with an unprotected stranger? It would be insulting to the house to dwell on all the various possibilities in which such things might happen; but he should relate one instance of the late Mr. Pitt, a man of all others the least disposed to make any ungenerous use of arbitrary power. At the commencement of the late contest, a man waited on Mr. Pitt, saying, that he had a fact of importance to communicate, and begged to speak without witnesses; but Mr. Pitt insisted on having witnesses. The man then stated, that the government of France had hired a person to assassinate him, and added so many circumstances of the notes by which the assassin was to be paid having been transmitted through Ghent, Bruges, and a variety of other towns, that Mr. Pitt was, in the end, induced to believe the account. He wrote to foreign ministers, and they, under the operation of an alien act then existing in Flanders, traced the individuals connected with these notes in the establishments of the Flemish bankers. Two individuals were there thrown into prison, where they remained for five years, to the ruin of themselves and families. (Hear, hear.) At the peace, it was discovered, that these unfortunate individuals, so unluckily connected with the notes in question, were coming to England to discharge a private debt with the money in question, and to recover a demand which they had against Mr. Pitt's informant. These were circumstances, these were facts, that called on their lordships to pause before they subjected aliens to the effect of a mere insinuation made against them. He did not blame Mr. Pitt; but he mentioned the fact, to shew the mischiefs unavoidable in the exercise of arbitrary power. He knew that the present bill contained a provision enabling aliens to appeal to the privy council: but how could a man appeal after he was sent out of the country?—His lordship then referred to the case of Las Casas; who, whether he had offended against the regulations of St. Helena or not, was unnecessarily deprived of his papers when he arrived in this country. The alien act gave no powers for the seizure of papers, and he (Lord Holland) believed such seizure illegal. The papers were afterwards restored; but the loss of them for six or seven months might be ruinous to a literary man, whose subsistence might depend on the observance of his engagements with a bookseller. There was no intention, perhaps, to injure the man, but if he was ill used redress was impossible. As to the prerogative that had been so much insisted on, and the necessity that there must be a power somewhere of sending aliens out of the country, there must be also a power to hang, but the question was, whether a discretionary power should be vested in the ministers of the crown. He thought the prerogative did not exist; the general principles and habits of our government were against any such arbitrary power; but the noble viscount had shewn sufficiently the spirit with which he was actuated, and had set out by ridiculing all laws that opposed the powers he required, though those laws had existed before, and were sanctioned by, the Union. These laws the noble viscount (who set himself to teach mankind how to legislate on new and sweeping principles) was to repeal, without alleging the slightest abuse or inconvenience arising out of them. It had always been the policy of this country to encourage foreigners, and to reap the benefit of their skill and capital; and the best way to effect this had been found to be the extension to such persons of the advantages of the British constitution. Next to Holland, whom we had now compelled to follow the same narrow course as ourselves, this country had always been the most distinguished for a liberal and generous policy. She had always been the subject of panegyric on this account, and her very geographical position considered as having something providential in it—

"Britain! thy land by Heaven was sure design'd
"To be the common refuge of mankind," were the words of Waller, the founder of our parliamentary eloquence, and a man well versed in the knowledge of our best interests. He, it seemed, was in a mistake, and this country was no longer a refuge for the oppressed, but what Gibbon called one of the cells of the great state prisons of Europe, and completely subservient to other states. What was it that had been accomplished by all the measures and system of the war which the noble viscount so highly extolled? If that system had been so successful as he represented it, where was the danger, or the demand for an alien bill? The noble viscount must either say, that after all the efforts of this vaunted system, after all the blood and treasure that had been expended, things remained just where they were, and the same measures must still be returned to; or, that he had put down all the revolutionary spirit of Europe, but was still so fond of power that he could not part with it. It was not to abuses that might be committed against foreigners, that the unconstitutional nature of this measure was confined; the effect of arbitrary power was not confined to those upon whom, but extended to those by whom it was exercised. Was there any man whose disposition remained the same after he had been accustomed to the exercise of arbitrary power? After sending out aliens with such facility, the noble viscount could not help wishing for the convenience of the same power whenever he was thwarted, with whatever justice, in any other quarter. The constitutional doctrine was, to consider the evils arising out of arbitrary power in general, rather than instances of special abuses. He should allude to the case of the Spaniards who had escaped into Gibraltar, and who (as he hoped by mistake) were sent back into Spain, where two of them were condemned to death, and one to twelve years in the gallies. The gallant officer who had returned them into Spain received an account that one of them, Don Diego Correa, had written against the English: it turned out, however, that this was not true, and that a mistake had been made in the name; but the result of this mistake was the loss of all the unfortunate Spaniard's property. This shewed how any secretary of state might, with the best intentions, be entirely misled.—But the greatest objection was the gross impolicy of the measure. We, whose great object had always been to prevent universal monarchy, were now most unwisely lending ourselves to such a system. It was not an imaginary but a real evil, that all Europe should be governed by one will; and if, instead of one, we had five or six, all agreeing together, the effect of this oligarchy of a club of sovereigns would be just the same. Russia would proscribe one man, France another, Austria a third, and no where would any refuge be found from the power of a despot. The effect of such a system, under the Roman empire, had been well pointed out by Gibbon:—"The division of Europe into a number of independent states, connected however with each other, by the general resemblance of religion, language, and manners, is productive of the most beneficial consequences to the liberty of mankind. A modern tyrant, who should find no resistance either in his own breast or in his people, would soon experience a gentle restraint from the example of his equals, the dread of present censure, the advice of his allies, and the apprehension of his enemies. The object of his displeasure escaping from the narrow limits of his dominions, would easily obtain in a happier climate a secure refuge, a new fortune adequate to his merit, the freedom of complaint, and perhaps the means of revenge. But the empire of the Romans filled the world, and when the empire fell into the hands of a single person, the world became a safe and dreary prison for his enemies. The slave of imperial despotism, whether he was condemned to drag his gilded chain in Rome and the senate, or to wear out a life of exile on the barren rock of Seriphus, or the frozen banks of the Danube, expected his fate in silent despair. To resist was fatal, and it was impossible to fly. On every side he was encompassed with a vast extent of sea and land, which he could never hope to traverse without being discovered, seized, and restored to his irritated master. Beyond the frontier his anxious view could discover nothing but the ocean, inhospitable deserts, hostile tribes of barbarians, of fierce manners and unknown language, or dependent kings, who would gladly purchase the emperor's protection by the sacrifice of an obnoxious fugitive. "Ubicunque esses," said Cicero to Marcellus, "cogitare deberes te fore in ejus ipsius quem fugeres potestate." If we followed this example, we should make the world one vast prison, and be perpetually embroiled with foreign powers. Hitherto we had refused to give up to the vengeance of foreign powers those who fled from their injustice; and at what time was it that we took on ourselves to become police officers to the rest of Europe? When it was clear from the state of things, that there must be shortly alterations and convulsions in the state of Spain, and were we to espouse the cause of either party? When it was avowed that this bill was to prevent convulsions in France, how were we to say to the king of Spain that we would not do as much for him? He would reply, "then you espouse the cause of my enemies, you support the standard of revolt against a legitimate sovereign." It was by laws and policy counteracted by the present bill, that England arrived at the pre-eminence she had now attained, and we must not violate that policy or trample on those laws. The operation of the present bill would effect a sacrifice of all the advantages we had enjoyed. It would involve us in perpetual difficulties with foreign states, and, in a constitutional view, be highly dangerous to the liberties of the country. For these reasons, he never voted against any bill with so much determinate hostility as against this.

The Earl of Westmorland said, that the bill should be considered in two points of view: first, as it regarded our internal peace, and secondly, as it enabled us to preserve the relations of amity with foreign states. He thought it perfectly conformable with the 30th chapter of Magna Charta. In the existing state of Europe, it was impossible to maintain the relations of peace and war, without an act like the present. Was there any reason for opposing it from the abuse of the powers granted under similar acts? Were the powers granted by former alien acts misused? No: during the last two years, only four persons were sent out of the country under the powers conferred upon ministers. This surely was a proof that foreigners were not harshly treated, and an argument against those dangers which the noble lord opposite apprehended from this measure.

The Marquis of Lansdowne said, he was decidedly hostile to the principle of the bill, and the grounds on which it had been supported. It had been said, that government had never abused the powers conferred by former bills; but was it not an abuse that persons were prevented from coming into this country with their property and other advantages? The principle avowed by the noble lords on the other side was "pœna ad paucos, metus ad omnes," but what worse principle could a statesman act upon? How was the secretary of state to determine as to the character of foreigners? With all the information which he was able to procure at home with respect to domestic offenders, it was sometimes proved upon trial, that he had been mistaken. And could it be expected that, with regard to foreign countries, he was more likely to obtain accurate information? There appeared in all the arguments on the other side a disposition to undervalue the laws of the country, which were competent to punish guilt wherever it was found. He never could believe that a constitution which had withstood the strongest efforts in violent times, could be destroyed by a few foreigners, towards whom the people of this country entertained a degree of jealousy amounting to repugnance. It was on a connection of the absurdity and injustice of the proceeding, and seeing that no special case was made out to prove that it was called for by any circumstances peculiar to the present times, that he should oppose the motion.

The Earl of Harrowby said, he was willing to admit most of the general propositions of the noble marquis, because they did not apply to the particular circumstances of the present case. He argued, that the bill did not give new powers unknown to the constitution, but merely gave facilities to the exercise of an undoubted right. He put it to the house, whether any honest alien, who wished to reside here for the fair exercise of his art or industry, would be for a moment deterred by the provisions of this measure? Could any cases of the kind be brought forward?

Lord Holland said, across the table, that such cases existed within his knowledge.

The Marquis of Lansdowne made the same statement.

The Earl of Harrowby continued. Then the noble lords had the misfortune to be acquainted with persons of a more nervous temperament than ordinary men. He contended that foreigners might be induced to reside here, not merely to overturn the happy constitution of this country, but for the purpose of wounding France through the sides of England, by availing themselves of her free press and her immediate vicinity. The power of sending them away, like every other power, was exposed to abuse; but the question was, whether, looking at the whole case, it were not better to incur the present, than expose ourselves to other and greater evils?

The house divided:

Contents, 34—Not Contents, 15.

The house then went into a committee, and lord Sidmouth proposed his clause relative to aliens who had bought shares in the bank of Scotland, pursuant to the Scotch act of 1695.

The Earl of Lauderdale moved that the act be read, and the clerk read the title; but the English statute-book did not contain the act itself.

Lord Melville said, that he had a copy of the act in his possession, and he offered it to the house.

The Earl of Lauderdale and Lord Holland urged, that it ought to be brought before the house in a regular manner, and not produced from the pocket of any peer.

The Duke of Sussex professed himself quite in the dark as to this statute: the house ought to have information before it proceeded to a vote.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, that the original act was in the Record-office at Edinburgh, and ought to be laid on the table.

Lord Melville said, that he was ready in his capacity of governor of the Bank of Scotland, to produce the statute as printed by the King's printer, which was generally deemed sufficient evidence of an act.

The Lord Chancellor admitted that, strictly speaking, an authentic copy of the act ought to be produced, but he thought it would be very easy to frame a clause which would steer clear of that act. It might be enacted, that all persons naturalized after the 29th of April except by act of parliament, should be deemed aliens.

Earl Grey observed, that such a clause would go much further than this bill.

The Lord Chancellor said, he had no objection to go further.

Earl Grey did not doubt that the noble and learned lord would go as far as his ministerial friends requested him: he had always shewn himself ready to support the prerogatives of the crown, but never to maintain the rights of the subject. Such a sweeping clause as that alluded to by his lordship would have the effect of doing away all the advantages hitherto derived by aliens under the solemn provisions of the legislature.

The Lord Chancellor said, that, whether he or the noble earl had best defended the liberties of their country, must be left to others to determine; but he rejoiced that the course of his politics had been quite different from that of the noble earl. As the Scotch act had been recited in several British acts, he did not think it necessary to call for that act.

Lord Holland insisted, that what was now suggested was without precedent. What had the house to do with the secret intelligence procured by ministers from the noble governor of the Bank of Scotland? Informing had of late become so much the fashion, that even ministers stooped to it; the noble governor of the Bank of Scotland did not disdain to become an informer against his employers, the proprietors of shares. (Hear, hear.) A short time ago ministers had boasted (how truly was not the question) that they were not dependent on the Bank of England, but at least they were now anxious to shew that the Bank of Scotland was dependent upon them.

The Earl of Liverpool urged that the only object of the clause was, to prevent aliens from secretly introducing themselves into the state, and by an old forgotten law entitling themselves to rights which belonged only to natural-born subjects, or to aliens who might participate in those rights through the provisions of an act of parliament. The clause was to operate only from the 29th of April, which was the day when the notice of the alien bill was first given.

Earl Grey observed, that there were many acts of parliament which, in certain cases, gave the privileges of natural born subjects to foreigners, and it would be gross injustice to deprive aliens of those advantages to which they were entitled under a public act of the Scotch parliament, incorporated at the Union.

The subject was then dropped, and the committee proceeded to the clause relating to the duration of the act.

Earl Grey proposed, that it should be continued only for one year, but the amendment was negatived, without debate, and without a division.

The Earl of Carnarvon proposed a clause, to exempt from the operation of the bill aliens who had married British subjects, or who had been domiciliated here five years before the last peace: but it was immediately negatived.

The Lord Chancellor then moved the following clause: "And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that such persons as may have been naturalized, or claim to have become naturalized, since the 28th day of April last, by the effect of any act of parliament heretofore passed relative to the Bank of Scotland, or who may claim to be naturalized by becoming partners of the Bank of Scotland after the passing of this act, shall be deemed and taken to be aliens, notwithstanding the provisions of any act of the parliament of Scotland, whilst the provisions of this act relative to aliens shall remain in force.

The Marquis of Lansdowne resisted this device, by which the necessity of producing the Scotch statute was avoided, and moved, as an amendment, that the words "28th day of April" be omitted, and the words "from and after the passing of this act," be substituted.

Lord Melville, in reference to what had been said by Lord Holland, denied that he had deserted the interests of the Bank of Scotland, by communicating the intelligence he had given to ministers: the statute had been sent to him from Edinburgh, for the purpose, by persons who, like himself, were concerned in the Bank of Scotland. He thought the accusation brought against him not at all warranted by the facts.

Lord Holland, in explanation, said, that he had not intended to say any thing offensive to the noble lord, but he thought the two offices of Governor of the Bank and Minister of State in some degree incompatible.

The Earl of Lauderdale, Lord Holland, and the Earl of Rosslyn severally observed, that this was not so extraordinary a discovery as the noble viscount imagined. They believed that it was known to the Bank of Scotland, and that it had been an inducement to all aliens, since the Union, to purchase into that Bank. But this might be all conjecture, and, therefore, time should be given to inquire into the state of the Bank, with the view of considering what injury their property might sustain. The right of every stockholder in England rested entirely upon the same foundation; and upon the whole, if the noble and learned lords did not adopt the amendment, they would shake that good faith in the establishments of this country which it was their duty to uphold.

The question was then put, that the words "the 28th day of April" stand part of this clause. Their lordships divided:

Contents, 42—Not-Contents, 20.

Lord Gage then proposed a clause, similar to that proposed by Mr. Brougham in the Commons, to enable aliens to be conveyed to any part, if a ship should be ready to sail to that place, within one month after they received notice to leave the country. On this clause their lordships divided—

Contents, 20—Not-contents, 42.

Lord Sidmouth then gave notice, that he should move to-morrow, that the standing order, No. 26, be taken into consideration, in order that the report of the committee should be received, and the bill be read a third time.

Lord Holland, the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Earl of Lauderdale, and the Earl of Rosslyn protested against that course of proceeding. It would be to suspend the standing orders for no other reason than to afford personal accommodation to ministers.

On the other side, the Earl of Liverpool and Viscount Sidmouth maintained, that the standing orders had been often dispensed with upon occasions by no means so pressing; and that, from the late period of the session, it was necessary to accelerate the progress of this measure, which had been already long enough before the house to afford noble lords an opportunity of understanding it.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR BILL.] On the motion of the Earl of Rosslyn, their lordships proceeded to take into consideration the report on this bill, when several amendments were made. On the question being put, that the bill be read a third time,

The Lord Chancellor rose and said, that this bill had been very much improved since it came up here. With respect to the part which he had taken in it, he felt very strong objections to make any allusion, because, in the first place, it was the duty of every member there, and particularly of the person who held the situation which he filled, not to observe on any thing that passed in another place; and, secondly, because it was often extremely difficult to ascertain what really had passed: but if what he had read as having passed was correct, he felt himself bound to observe to their lordships that his conduct had not been treated with justice or propriety. He left it to the judgment of those who had known him long, both as a judge and as a member of that house, whether he ought to have been treated in that manner. (Hear, hear.) He would now merely add, that whatever effect might have been intended to be produced, it should never operate as a check on his mind to diminish the respect, civility, and attention, with which he had always treated every member of parliament, every gentleman, and particularly every gentleman of his own profession. (Hear, hear, hear.)

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, June 1.

BANKRUPT LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.] The resolutions passed in the committe on Saturday last being reported, and agreed to by the house, an instruction was given to the gentlemen appointed to bring in the Bankrupt Laws Amendment Bill to make provision for the same.—Mr. J. Smith then brought in a bill "to alter and amend the Laws relating to Bankrupts."—It was read a first time.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Mr. Alderman Wood presented the following Petition and Remonstrance of the inhabitant householders in the City and Liberties of Westminster, in public meeting assembled, on the 23d day of March, 1818.—"That on the house, as appears to the petitioners, there doubly rests a legal, constitutional, and moral obligation, promptly to redress the wrongs of the people whenever they are aggrieved, and make their application; inasmuch as it is a house which holds the office of a national representative, and which also claims to be, in respect to certain electoral and legislatorial rights of the commons, a court of judicature having exclusive jurisdiction; in the first place, the very nature of representation requires that the house shall do for the people in all ways, but more especially for redress of grievances, whatever they, if legislating personally, would, for self-preservation, do for themselves; and, in the second place, if the house be an English court of judicature, it must well know that every such court hath of necessity its attributes and its duties, its power and its responsibility; if such a court do not wantonly abandon its functions, it decides causes coming within its jurisdiction, whenever by bill, suit, or petition, regularly brought before it; to try or not to try an issue, it hath no option; to do or not to do its duty, it hath no choice, neither hath it any discretion whereby it can dispense with affording redress; for, in the English constitution, as in the code of nature and reason, it is an eternal principle of equity, emphatically reiterated in the maxims of our law, and shines the brightest gem in Magna Charta, that justice shall neither be denied nor delayed; wherefore, when suitors apply to such a court for redress of intolerable wrongs committed by its own members, it cannot be competent to say, "Go your way for this time, when we have a more convenient season we will send for ye;" in short, touching the house, one of whose offices it is to impeach unjust judges, it is impossible it can enumerate among its privileges, that of being itself an unjust judge; or, among its attributes, that of an authority to pervert equity, and to mock at justice, a shocking impiety, peculiarly offensive to God, and disgusting to man; to deny justice, were to dispense with and to suspend law, treasons for which a king was expelled from the throne, and such a denial by a court that had monopolized all the powers of redress, were an aggravation of the guilt beyond all power of language to express; the house are earnestly requested to observe, that by the law of this land it appears, that whenever by petition of right even a private man empleads the king himself, for that his majesty wrongfully holds an inheritance belonging to that man, the king, as mere matter of official duty, invariably says, in writing, "Let right be done to the party," when a commission as invariably issues to that end; but when last year more, as it is believed, than a million of aggrieved people, speaking as it is believed, the sense of many millions, empleaded by their petitions of right, those members of the house who wrongfully withhold from the whole nation the most valuable and most sacred inheritance, constitutional representation, the empleaders instead of being answered that right should be done, experienced on the contrary a perversion of equity and a mocking of justice, mixed with insult and calumny; and their oppressors had influence enough not only to cause their petitions to be trampled upon, but to procure a suspension of all laws of protection; in consequence of which, virtuous parliamentary reformers were inhumanly hunted by the blood-hounds of false accusation into ruin and misery, chains, dungeon, and exile; the petitioners feel warranted in maintaining, that neither an English assembly of representative legislators, nor an English court of judicature, can be privileged to substitute its own arbitrary will for law, its own capricious pleasure for the constitution; discretionary law, characteristic of despotism, hath ever been peculiarly abhorrent to the free mind of England, nor can discretionary law, which may for any length of time deny, and which, as it appears to the petitioners, hath, in fact, by a contempt of their petitions of right for five and thirty years, denied political liberty to the people of England, be reconciled with that divine principle of her constitution, by virtue of which the very touch of her soil gives freedom to the slave; wherefore the petitioners pray that the house will, as speedily as may with due consideration consist, pass a bill for effectually securing to the people in all time to come, the self-evident right of universal freedom fairly distributed according to population, with annual elections, and in those elections the protection of a ballot."—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

LONDON, &c. PRISONS COMMITTEE.] Mr. Alderman Wood presented the Report of this Committee. It was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

SLAVE TRADE.] Lord Castlereagh presented to the house by the command of the Prince Regent, the "Treaty between his Britannic Majesty and his Majesty the King of the Netherlands, for preventing their subjects from engaging in any traffic in Slaves."—The noble lord observed, that this treaty differed in only two or three points from the treaties concluded with Spain and Portugal. The first point was, that the reciprocal right of search should not extend to the Mediterranean, the North Seas, or the Channel.—The next point was, that the number of ships authorized to search, should be limited on each side, and that each of the contracting parties should give notice to the other, what were the ships so authorized.

Mr. W. Smith congratulated the house on the completion of this treaty. He was fully assured that the Slave Trade was so likely to be short lived, that the exemption of the Mediterranean from the operation of the right of search was a matter of no consequence.

SPANISH PATRIOTS.] Lord Morpeth said, he held in his hand a petition from Don Diego Correa, one of the two Spaniards who were so improperly surrendered to the Spanish government by the governor of Gibraltar, in 1814, in consequence of a communication from the British Consul at Cadiz. The companion of Captain Correa had the good fortune to escape, but he himself was tried by the Spanish authorities. The case was however brought into discussion in that house by a distinguished individual, now no more (Mr. Whitbread); and, in consequence of the interposition of his Majesty's government, Captain Correa was liberated, and sent to Gibraltar, whence he came to this country. In consequence of ill health and inability to subsist in England, he had recently applied to the Spanish consul for a passport to return to Spain; but his application was rejected, on the ground that having been claimed by the British government, he had no title to Spanish protection. The petitioner therefore appealed to the justice and liberality of parliament, for the means of subsistence during his stay in this country.

Lord Castlereagh said, it was not in the power of this government to restrain the conduct of Spain with respect to its own subjects. Captain Correa was furnished with a passage from Gibraltar to this country, but was expressly told that government could not make any provision for him.

Sir J. Macintosh conceived that there was a grievance stated in this petition which was extremely worthy of attention. The British government had thought itself obliged, in point of honour and duty, to obtain the release of the petitioner. Captain Correa then came to this country; and now he was told that, on account of the interference of the British government, he was divested of his national character. The interference of this government for his protection was visited on his head by the officers of his own country: it was now said, that he belonged to no country, he was the subject of no state. They declared that he was divested of all privileges belonging to the character of a Spaniard, if any privilege did belong to that character now. (Hear, hear.) He had, therefore, a good right to claim redress from the government which had placed him in this predicament.

Lord Castlereagh said, that this was not a fair construction of what had been done to Correa. Depriving him of his passport was not stripping him of his national character. The inconvenience he now suffered was the result of the views which his own government took of his conduct.

Mr. Brougham wished to avail himself of this opportunity to ask a question of the noble lord. He should be glad to be informed, whether any remonstrance had been made by this government to the court of Madrid, in behalf of those unhappy persons—those gallant persons, he should say—who, after having fought the battles of Ferdinand, were consigned to a loathsome dungeon, nearly opposite our own garrison at Gibraltar. If any remonstrance had been made, as the noble lord had formerly promised the house that there should, he wished to know in what manner it had been received by the liberal and enlightened policy of the grateful Ferdinand. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh said, that some representations had been made to the Spanish government, but it was a most delicate subject, and there was no particular intelligence which he could lay before the house. He feared, however, that the observations which had been made on the other side of the house, relative to the policy of the Spanish monarch, had tended rather to retard than promote the interests of the individuals in question.

Mr. Brougham said, that he perfectly understood the explanation of the noble lord. It was obvious that all our remonstrances to Ferdinand had been ineffectual; and, therefore, it was a bitter satire to talk of the policy of that prince. (Hear, hear, hear.)

Mr. Bennet said, that with respect to what the noble lord had stated concerning the observations that had occasionally fallen from his side of the house, he was fully convinced that if those observations had not been made, not the smallest interference would have taken place on behalf of those unhappy individuals. (Hear.)

Mr. Speaker then put the question, that this petition be brought up. He wished, however, to state to the house, that it appeared to him to pray for pecuniary relief, and it was not consistent with the practice of the house to receive such petitions, without the previous recommendation of the crown. If any other construction could be put on the phraseology of the prayer, then the house would not, perhaps, reject the petition; but if no other construction could be put upon it, then they might think it proper to adhere to their rules. At all events, he thought it his duty to call the attention of the house to this point.

The petition was then read.—On the question that it do lie on the table,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer objected to its being received, as the prayer directly implied pecuniary relief, which could not be given without the consent of the crown.

Lord Cochrane contended that the petition ought to lie upon the table. He observed, that that ungrateful monarch, Ferdinand, being unable to persecute Correa in his own country, had handed him over to his Majesty's ministers. It was quite certain, that those ministers would never give any relief to those who differed from them. He had heard, however, that this parliament, happily for the public, was about to expire, and he hoped that in another parliament the case of these suffering Spanish patriots would be taken into due consideration.

The petition was then withdrawn.

LAND-TAX ASSESSMENT.] Mr. Brougham rose to call the attention of the house to the subject which he had lately brought before them, relative to the assessment of the land tax in the county of Westmorland. He now held in his hand a paper signed by two commissioners of the land tax, by which it appeared, that instead of holding a first meeting on or before the 30th of April, and a second on the 23d of May, they had issued an order that the assessment should not be made till the 27th of June. Now the house would observe, that until the party were assessed, he could not redeem his land tax. This order was signed by Christopher Wilson, of Kendal, and John Hudson, the minister of that place. The former was a very respectable person, and he thought it very likely that the latter might have been misled on this occasion. He had been informed that Mr. Wilson was the chairman of the principal election committee in that part of the county, for that party whose interests were to be benefited by a delay in the assessments, and that Mr. Wilson was a member of the same committee. Having taken notice of this subject in the way that he had done, and the house having expressed their opinion upon it, and feeling confident that the gentlemen would now adhere to the statutory provisions of the law, he should trust to the effect that might be produced on them, and on their colleagues in that part of the country, without pressing for any further proceedings. He was very far from suspecting the noble lord opposite, or any of his colleagues, of having participated in this business. It was, however, a very weak measure, and he ascribed it to the officious zeal of inferior agents, whose conduct seldom did much good when carried so far. At present he thought it unnecessary to take any further notice of this matter.

Lord Lowther observed, that several persons had lately applied to be taxed, and he thought it a very novel case for persons to apply for that purpose. The commissioners had had several meetings, and it had occupied a considerable time to digest the several acts; but, considering the extent of the district, they had acted with great vigilance and activity.—The noble lord then complained of the unnecessary use that had been made on a former occasion of the name of Mr. Johnson, the solicitor.

Mr. Brougham said, he had not censured Mr. Johnson, who had acted merely as an agent. His observations were directed against the tax-office, and, in his opinion, it exhibited a most indecent appearance to see an election agent corresponding under that name with the board of taxes.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer contended, that the tax-office had only done their duty in giving an answer to the application that was made to them.

Mr. Wynn said, he could not agree with the noble lord that there was any thing very novel or extraordinary in the applications of the freeholders to be assessed. There was a special clause in the act of parliament to give every possible facility under such circumstances, and any delay on the part of the commissioners would be highly criminal, and, if brought before that house, would be visited with punishment. Whether there had been any delay on the present occasion, he would not undertake to say: that was a question that might be decided hereafter by an election committee, should the subject ever be brought before them. As to Mr. Johnson, he was justified in what he had done, but he ought to have applied to the commissioners, instead of the tax-office The latter, he conceived, had only performed their duty.

Sir J. Graham said, that the commissioners in that district had been more vigilant than in any other part of the kingdom. Scarcely any assessment, as gentlemen knew, was delivered in before the end of June, or the beginning of August. He was astonished to hear his hon. and learned friend say, that this subject ought to be inquired into at a future period.

Mr. Waldegrave differed entirely from the hon. baronet: he hoped that the matter would be brought forward in another parliament.

Here the conversation dropped.

REGENCY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.] Lord Castlereagh moved the second reading of this bill. He stated that one object of the measure was, to appoint an additional number of councillors to assist her Majesty in executing the trust confided to her with respect to the care of the king's person; the other object was, to provide for the meeting of parliament, within a limited time, in the event of her Majesty's demise during a prorogation, and before a new parliament had assembled. It appeared to him, that, under existing circumstances, the greatest inconvenience might arise, if these provisions were not adopted by the legislature.

Mr. Tierney observed, that this measure would not have been brought forward, had not ministers thought it a good time to dissolve parliament. But when they were viewing the inconveniences likely to arise from the death of her Majesty, they ought to have considered what was to be done in case of the death of the Regent, when we should have neither king, queen, nor executive government at all. (Hear, hear.) He should be glad to know how the magistrates of the conntry were prepared to act in such an event? There might, to be sure, be some who would take upon themselves the responsibility of assuming authority; but others, from want of nerve, or from other considerations, would decline embarking in that which would certainly be for the time illegal. Here, then, was the house discussing the Regency bill, and leaving out that most important consideration—what was to be done in the event of the Regent's demise? Could there be any doubt that, in that event, the Duke of York would be appointed Regent? Where, then, could be the inconvenience of making that appointment in the bill? Why could not parliament exercise that function now, which, sooner or later, it might be called upon to exercise?—Another point remained to be noticed. Not a word was said in the bill respecting the Windsor establishment. Were he disposed to be very hostile to his Majesty's government at this important moment, and to court popularity, he might expatiate on the unnecessary expenditure of that establishment. He might reply to the question, "Would you destroy his Majesty's comfort?" that his Majesty's comfort did not depend on the shew or splendor which that establishment was calculated to maintain. He would, however, content himself with observing, that the Queen's accommodation might be consulted (which, in the present state of her Majesty's health, it was very desirable to do), and yet that a considerable saving might be effected in that establishment.

Mr. Canning observed, that the bill before the house merely went to alter parts of the Regency Act, and by no means to revise the whole, which ought not to be done without serious consideration. He admitted that in the unfortunate event alluded to by the right hon. gentleman, the Windsor establishment might become a fit subject of discussion; but he was persuaded that the delicacy of the right hon. gentleman, and of every man in the house, would revolt from debating, at present, the ulterior saving that might result from such an event.

Sir S. Romilly remarked, that while there was the least prospect of his Majesty's recovery, no person ever looked to the Windsor establishment as affording the means of reducing the public expenditure; but now it certainly was a subject that ought to be taken into consideration.

Mr. Wynn suggested, that it would be more decorous to introduce some members of the royal family into the council; for thus, in the event of her Majesty's death, the king would still enjoy the protection and care of individuals of his own family.

The bill was then read a second time.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (SCOTLAND) BILL.] Lord Binning, on moving that this bill be read a second time this day three months, said, that there was an immense number of lunatics in Scotland, and that they ought to be provided for; but he could not give any pledge that he would bring forward the subject in the next session. He certainly never could contemplate the carrying of such a measure by a majority in that house against the opposition expressed by the country against it.

The second reading of the bill was then put off for three months.

OBSTRUCTION OF JUSTICE—IONIAN ISLANDS.] Mr. Bennet begged to call the attention of the house to the petition of Count Cladan, of Cephalonia in the Ionian islands, which he presented on the 27th of April last. (See page 1544.)—The hon. member said, that he had carefully examined the contents of the petition, and he was satisfied that a primâ facie was made out by Count Cladan, for the interference of government to afford him redress; and if they refused, for parliament to compel them to do justice to him. The first part of the petition was strictly the complaint of the count, with respect to the injustice and ill-treatment which he had himself suffered. The second part related to the wrongs and injustice suffered by the inhabitants of the Ionian islands, to whom we were bound to afford protection.—It had been said, that the count must seek redress in our courts of justice; but the only case which bore any analogy to the present was, the action brought by Fabrigas, a native of Minorca, against General Mostyn, in 1772. In that case, however, Fabrigas was considered to be the king's subject, as Minorca belonged to Great Britain at the time the transactions, the subject of prosecution, took place; but Count Cladan could not enter any of our courts, as the Ionian islands were not possessions of Great Britain, but merely placed under her protection. Supposing, however, that the count were entitled to sue in this country, the expense would amount to an absolute denial of justice. The witnesses were 101 in number, and were in the Ionian islands. Who was to bring them over, and maintain them here during all the delays of a trial? In the case of General Mostyn, the proceedings lasted three years, and Fabrigas obtained 3000 guineas. But any man who knew the expense at which those proceedings had been carried on, knew that the damages were inadequate to defray it. There could be no question, that to obtain redress against so powerful an individual as General Campbell, for acts committed in the Ionian islands, and which required a number of witnesses from those distant parts, was beyond the means of any private fortune in those islands.—For these reasons, therefore, and in order that the ends of public justice might not be defeated, he moved, "that there be laid before this house a copy of all correspondence that has taken place between his Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonial Department and Count Cladan, relative to the conduct of Lieutenant General Campbell."

Mr. Goulburn said, it could not be expected of him that he should be nicely conversant with the law in this case, but he believed that, if General Campbell had acted in the way which Count Cladan had stated, there were tribunals in this country in which General Campbell could be called to account. He knew of one case which had occurred since he filled his present situation, in which the courts here entertained the cause, and did justice to the aggrieved party. He did not wish to pronounce any opinion with respect to Count Cladan; but this he could say, that, in the opinion of all those persons whom he had consulted on the subject of this accusation since it was last before the house, Count Cladan did not stand on the same ground as General Campbell did, with respect to the credit and estimation to which he was entitled. The hon. member then stated, that many of the most material papers for which the hon. gentleman had moved, had been transmitted by government to the Ionian islands, and concluded with giving his negative to the motion.

Mr. F. Douglas said, that the house of commons ought to be open to complaints of this nature, even though another tribunal should be open. He thought that his hon. friend had made out a complete primâ facie case, and he implored the house to consider the effect which a refusal to inquire into the facts would have on the inhabitants of all those settlements which were in the same situation as the Ionian islands.

Lord Castlereagh said, he must protest against the practice so often adopted, as almost to have grown into a system in that house, of stating calumnies under the form of petitions against the characters of individuals in responsible situations abroad; a practice not more injurious to those individuals than it was delusive to the parties preferring the complaints. He regretted the course pursued by the hon. member, because it appeared to him quite impossible that the house could interfere effectually for the purposes of justice. The only result therefore which could follow the introduction of this subject was the leaving an ex-parte statement to operate on the public mind, to the prejudice of an honourable officer whose case at present could not be fully understood.

Mr. Barham agreed with the noble lord, that nothing could be more improper than to bring under the consideration of that house, cases which might be readidly decided before a competent tribunal in the colony or place where they arose. But from what he understood of the present question, it appeared that the officer to whose conduct it referred, had taken upon himself the authority of revising judicial decrees, and of interfering with the ordinary administration of the law. He had thus set himself above the reach of those tribunals before which the matters in dispute were originally cognizable. He must declare, that he thought the character of General Campbell deeply interested in repelling the charges now preferred against him.

General Thornton said, that from what he knew of General Campbell, he thought it impossible he could have acted in the manner which the petitioner had stated.

Mr. Lockhart was of opinion, that it was a dangerous practice to bring forward in that house the cases of persons in an inferior station of society, but he must protest against the extension of this principle to questions affecting the government and well-being of our foreign possessions. In proportion as they were enlarged, and the number of officers appointed to administer their affairs were increased, it became necessary that the inquisitorial powers of parliament should be extended, and rendered commensurate with the almost sovereign authority which was sometimes delegated to those officers. General Campbell had exercised a supreme authority, and it was no answer in such a case to a person who complained that he had been aggrieved to refer him to the ordinary course of justice.

Captain Waldegrave thought it his duty to protest against the doctrine advanced by the noble lord, which he considered as imposing an unconstitutional restraint upon the freedom and discretion of every member. Here was a case stated, in which the right of appeal (a right always allowed in a neighbouring country) to a second court, after a judgment of death had been invaded, and the appellant executed. Could it be said that this was an allegation which did not call loudly for inquiry? When he first heard the charges mentioned, he certainly had not felt disposed to admit their truth; but he was now of opinion, that a sufficient case had been established for inquiry.

Mr. Money said, he could not believe it possible that General Campbell had been guilty of the charges preferred against him.

Mr. Bennet, in reply, declared that he would spare no pains in the view of procuring such satisfactory evidence from the Ionian islands by the time that parliament should re-assemble as might afford the means of rendering justice to every party aggrieved. Those appeared to him to be no friends to General Campbell who opposed this motion on the ground of legal niceties, or the incredibility of the charges. That officer had been closeted over and over again with his Majesty's ministers, and must have furnished them with explanations on the subject. He had since thought proper to go abroad; but if the facts alleged could have been denied, would not the hon. gentleman opposite have gladly availed himself of the opportunity of triumphantly refuting the charges?

Mr. Goulburn observed, that General Campbell had merely gone to Paris, and was prepared to return if it should be rendered necessary by any proceedings of the house. He thought it right to state this, in order to shew that that officer had not fled from the accusation of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Bennet wished to be understood distinctly as having never declared or imagined that General Campbell had fled from accusation.

The house then divided:—

Ayes, 8—Noes, 46.

HIGH BAILIFF OF WESTMINSTER.] On bringing up the report of the committee of supply, relative to the high bailiff of Westminster, Mr. Bankes renewed his objections to the grant.—After a few words from Mr. Wrottesley and Mr. Lockhart, the question was put, "That the Report be taken into farther consideration." The house divided:

Ayes, 8—Noes, 8.

In consequence, the house immediately adjourned.*

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, June 2.

REWARDS ON CONVICTION BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed. It was then sent to the Commons, with its amendments†.

PURCHASE OF GAME BILL.] This bill having been read a second time,

The Earl of Carnarvon moved that it be now committed. He observed, that the sole object of the measure was, to place the buyer and the seller of game upon the same footing. As the law at present stood, the latter was subject to penalties, whereas the former was safe from all punishment. If their lordships rejected this bill, they would give encouragement to the rich suborners of an offence which the poor were tempted to commit, and which it was thought fit to allow to remain an object of severe penalties. If there existed any principle of law more cruel and unfair than another, it surely was that

* When there are forty members present (which number is necessary to constitute a house), and the votes are equal, it belongs to Mr. Speaker to give a casting vote.—In the House of Lords the Speaker gives his voice, as every other Lord of Parliament does, and if the votes are equal "Semper presumitur pro negante." (2 Hats. 245)—Among the ancients the rule was, that where one judge condemned, and the other acquitted; of two different sentences, the milder ought to take place. The Greeks called this favourable case, Minerva's Vote.

† It will be seen, by the proceedings in the Commons on the 3d instant, that these amendments were agreed to. A Commission has been issued under this act, and the following are the names of the Commissioners:—

HONORARY.	STIPENDIARY.
Rt. Hon. C. M. Sutton	J. W. Warren, Esq.
Rt. Rev. Bishop of St. Asaph, (Dr. Luxmore)	W. Roberts, Esq.
	W. Mathews, Esq.
Rt. Rev. Bishop of Peterborough, (Dr. Parsons)	J. H. Holbeck, Esq.
	W. Grant, Esq.
Rt. Hon. Sir W. Scott	J. M'Mahon, E[illegible]
Rt. Hon. Sir W. Grant	T. Marsham, [illegible]
Rt. Hon. C. Yorke	Hon. D. Fi[illegible]

which punished the poor and acquitted the rich, when equally implicated in criminality. He had taken up this bill as he found it on the table, and he was of opinion that it had come from the Commons in a shape which did not promise that it would prove very effective in its operation. The state of the game laws was altogether objectionable; but, bad as the system was, it became the duty of their lordships to do what they could to improve it, and render it consistent, when their attention was seriously called to it, as it now was, by the bill before them. It was the wish, he understood, of his noble friend (Lord Lauderdale), that game should become the property of those on whose lands it was found, and that the sale of it should be legalized; but in the committee of the house of commons, though great attention had been paid to the subject, it had hitherto been found impossible to carry that principle into effect. To make game property was a proposition environed with numerous difficulties. In order to give it the protection of law, evidence of ownership would then be necessary, and upon what kind of proof that should be decided was not an easy matter to determine. He had considered the subject much, and conversed with proprietors of land in different parts of the country, but had never been able to come to any satisfactory conclusion. The question now before their lordships was, however, one of a practical nature. It was merely whether they would allow a law to remain in force, by which the poor man suffered the infliction of severe penalties, while the rich man was exempt from all punishment.

The Earl of Lauderdale thought there was no person acquainted with the situation of the gaols throughout the country, crowded as they were with persons committed for offences against the game laws, who would not oppose this bill. He was against every sort of tampering with the subject, because he knew that it was impossible for their lordships to go at this time into a consideration of the general system of the game laws; and unless the question were taken up on that large scale, no good could be done. His noble friend had inferred that the seller of game must be a poor man, and had truly stated that it was hard to punish the poor and let the rich escape; but the measure he supported would have another operation, which he completely lost sight of. The bill was so framed, as to render it impossible that any evidence of the commission of the offence should be obtained. How could there be any evidence of the offence, if the buyer and seller were both equally guilty in the eye of the law? But why were the gaols filled with unfortunate men, charged with offences against the game laws? Precisely for the same reason that the public was shocked with so many executions for forgery. An artificial system of paper had been introduced, which formed a temptation to the commission of the crime of forgery. In the same way, the unnatural state of the game laws produced a constant desire to violate them. In legislating, the first thing always to be considered was, whether the measure proposed were practicable. Did not their lordships know, that there was in this country a numerous body of funded proprietors as rich as landed proprietors? These men had no manorial rights, but they possessed wealth which gave them the command of every thing they could desire for their table; and with what they desired they would, doubtless, be supplied, in spite of all the laws which could be enacted. In consequence of the Union with Ireland, many great landed proprietors of that country resided in this, especially during the sitting of parliament, and they must also find it necessary to purchase game. It was absurd to suppose that men of great fortune could be prevented by laws from obtaining any of the luxuries of life. If his noble friend persisted in this bill, he should perhaps feel it his duty, at a subsequent stage, to move for the Lord Steward's accounts, by which their lordships would then see that the table of the Sovereign was served with purchased game. An attempt to amend the game laws by a measure like the present, was, in his opinion, perfectly contemptible; but as at this period of the session it was impossible to go into the general consideration of so important a question, he thought the bill ought to be withdrawn, in order that the subject might be taken up on more enlarged and just principles, in the course of the next session.

Earl Grosvenor reminded their lordships that the question had been very fully discussed in the other house of parliament, and that it had not been found practicable to bring forward any other measure at present. He had strong objections to the existing game laws. Among other things, he considered it a great hardship that the lives of gamekeepers should be exposed in the manner they daily were, by the imperfect state of those laws. He wished that the whole system should be taken into consideration; but when the question was, whether he would in the interim agree to the bill, he must say, yes. This answer he was bound to give, on the maxim that the receiver was as bad as the thief; but in this case there was the additional consideration, that the person proposed to be punished was not only the receiver of the stolen goods, but the encourager of the theft.

The Earl of Limerick felt it impossible for him to add any thing to the unanswerable arguments of the noble earl who had expressed so able an opinion against the bill. It should have his decided opposition. Indeed, it appeared to him that it must be perfectly nugatory, as well on account of the deficiency of evidence alluded to by the noble earl, as of the practices which would be resorted to in selling game. Were their lordships not aware that a turkey might be sold for four times its value, and game given in as a present along with it? Was there any law to prevent this? He thought it very hard that persons who could not procure game from their own estates should be prevented from obtaining it by purchase. The bill was a measure of unnecessary severity, and though he was fond of sporting, he loved the liberties of the people still more than the preservation of game, and should therefore vote for the rejection of the bill.

Lord Holland said, he was not extremely fond of sporting, but he entertained as high a regard for the liberties of the people as the noble earl who had just sat down, and yet he intended to support the present measure. He could not, however, give his vote for the bill without some explanation of the reasons on which that vote was founded, lest it should be supposed that, by the support which he gave to this measure, he in any way approved of the principle of the game laws. To those laws he objected, not merely on the ground of their being founded on an unjust principle, but because they formed a fertile nursery of crimes. He could not help expressing his surprise at the extraordinary view of the question taken by his noble friend, and which the noble lord who spoke last so highly applauded. His noble friend had very ingeniously introduced the paper system into this question, though, for his part, he confessed he could not see the similarity of the cases between the forger and the buyer of game. His noble friend had dwelt on the inconveniences which a great number of wealthy persons would suffer who possessed no manorial rights. But if his noble friend were really desirous of altering the whole of the game laws, ought he not to support a measure which would make all those persons hostile to the system he wished to see changed? On the contrary, instead of making them enemies, he wished to place them in the situation of seducers. His noble friend had said, that the effect of the bill would be to prevent the obtaining of evidence. It appeared then, that, as the law now stood, the purchaser of game might convict the seller; but his noble friend paid a very indifferent compliment to those wealthy persons without manorial rights, for whose comfort he was so anxious to provide when he advanced this argument. Did he mean to say that the rich fundholder, after obtaining a partridge for his table, turned informer against the poor poacher who procured him that luxury? But this was a serious subject, and required the serious consideration of parliament, as soon as the question could be taken up on general principles. He was aware that the proposition of making game property was one of considerable difficulty, but he was not afraid of the consequence of such a measure with respect to violations of that property; for he could not conceive it possible that any law making game property could be the cause of such crimes as were the offspring of the present laws. At all events their lordships were bound to consider the state of the law as it now stood, and render the system as consistent as possible with itself. He should therefore give his vote in favour of the bill.

The Lord Chancellor said, he felt it impossible for him to give his assent to the bill as it now stood. If it were the intention of their lordships to deal out equal justice to the rich and the poor, this bill did not accomplish that object, for it only imposed a fine on the rich purchaser, whereas the poor seller was liable both to fine and imprisonment. A poacher had been committed to Dorchester-gaol for six weeks, for selling game to a man of property, while the purchaser went free. This was in contradiction to their lordships' opinion, that the buyer was worse than the seller. If the proprietor of one estate purchased game poached in his neighbour's, the principle of impartiality on which the bill proceeded would require, that if such a proprietor were the first man in the county, he ought to be sent to gaol as well as the poacher. It was fit, then, if their lordships adopted any measure on this subject, that they should take care to make it one which would deal out equal justice to all.

Earl Bathurst alluded to an opinion which had been entertained, that by this measure qualified persons would be liable to punishment for the sale of game, which, he thought, by no means followed from the enactments of the bill.

The Lord Chancellor said, that to make the measure consistent, the person who purchased game ought, not only to be liable to a fine of 5*l.*, but to imprisonment in the same manner as the poacher.

Lord Holland observed, that it would be very easy to alter the clause in the bill in such a manner as to remove the noble and learned lord's objection.

The house divided:

Contents, 33—Not-contents, 9.

The house then went into the committee, and the bill was reported without amendment.

ALIEN-BILL.] The Earl of Lauderdale presented a petition from certain persons who had recently purchased shares in the Bank of Scotland; and who, his lordship observed, were now threatened to be unjustly divested of their rights by an ex-post-facto law, introduced by the noble Secretary of State.—The petition being read, stated, that the petitioners were proprietors of stock in the Bank of Scotland, and were therefore by law naturalized subjects: that they had learned that, in a bill before parliament for continuing the alien act, a clause had been inserted, declaring that all persons who had purchased shares in the Bank of Scotland since the 28th of April last, should be deemed and taken to be aliens; that, under the authority of the existing law, the petitioners and many other persons had purchased stock, and had thereby acquired the rights of natural-born subjects; that they were merchants carrying on their trade in the British dominions, and that many of them were married and had children born to them in this country. Having purchased the stock, on the supposition that nobody in Great Britain could be deprived of the rights they possessed by an ex-post-facto law, they prayed that the clause might not pass, and that they might be heard by counsel against it.—The noble earl moved, that the petitioners be heard by counsel.

Lord Sidmouth submitted to their lordships, whether, after the discussion which the clause in question had undergone, it could be considered necessary to hear council on the part of the petitioners. He saw no ground for such a proceeding, and should oppose the motion.

Earl Grey was astonished to hear the noble Secretary of State, without assigning any good reason, or giving any statement of the grounds of his opinion, recommend it to their lordships to pay no attention to the application which had been made to them. All that he had offered was an assertion that the clause had already been discussed. But what was the real state of the case? A certain number of individuals who, under the sanction of the laws and constitution of the country, had acquired rights and property, prayed to be heard by counsel against a measure which proposed to deprive them of the advantages they had fairly and justly acquired. They had stated, that they were merchants, and most of them the parents of natural-born subjects. In this situation, they complained of the violation of a public right, and asked to be heard in defence of their property and the rights which belonged to it. Could their lordships be prevailed on to refuse to hear them? Their petition was respectfully expressed; no objection could be made to receiving it; and yet the noble Secretary of State expected their lordships to reject its prayer, though he had used no argument to induce them to adopt so extraordinary and so unjust a course. Their lordships would recollect that they were judges on all questions of property in the last resort, and that it was in a peculiar manner their duty to guard against the violation of those rights on which the security of property depended. The liberal principles of government which had hitherto prevailed in this country had formed the foundation of its power and glory; and, if their lordships permitted all the rights derived from these principles to be taken away, it was not reasonable to expect that power and glory could continue.

The Earl of Liverpool trusted that he felt as sacred a regard for the principles of the constitution as any other person could do, but he did not think that the noble lord could state any ground against the introduction of the clause. That clause was introduced on public grounds and for public objects, and in such a case the claims of individuals must yield to the public good, though, perhaps, they might be heard with a view to compensation. Whether those who claimed redress under the measure were entitled to it or not, he would not say; but he could produce many precedents, where, in cases of state necessity, it had been the duty of parliament to legislate, without any regard to the claims of individuals. Compensation had indeed been attended to, but that did not affect the principle he had stated. He very well recollected, that when the question of the slave trade was agitated, one of the objections against its abolition was, the effect it would have on interests vested by act of parliament. He had agreed in the weight of those objections, and admitted that, if a case of injury were proved, compensation ought to be made: but if ever there was a question that stood upon unanswerable grounds of public policy, it was the present measure of the alien bill, (hear, hear, from noble lords), it was the policy pursued by this country with respect to foreigners; and what was that policy? He never heard the greatest latitudinarian contend, on the subject of qualification, that any man could become a naturalized subject except by taking the oath of allegiance; and now to contend, that the investment of so small a sum as 80*l.* in a banking company should confer that high privilege, was a most unheard-of assumption. Indeed, the clause in the act relating to the Bank of Scotland had been virtually repealed by several subsequent acts. By the 14th of the king it was declared, that no person should thereafter be naturalized unless he conformed with various requisites. The clause said that no one should thereafter be naturalized, which expression repealed the clause in the Bank act, by implication; and yet, because that clause had never been expressly repealed, the noble earl would infer that it was still in force; and it had now been conjured up for a particular purpose to be enforced in violation of all the sacred principles of the constitution, of all the principles of allegiance to the crown and the government. A proposition so monstrous, so unheard of, he believed had never before been made in that house; and if their lordships acceded to it, they would render of no effect, a bill, which after all that had been said, he deemed of the most vital expediency to the interests and existence of Great Britain.

Lord Holland complained that the noble earl had not stated the question fairly. He had said, that the question turned on the repeal of the Scotch act, and the public expediency of the alien act. The question was not, however, whether the Scotch act should be repealed, but whether their lordships would hear, at their bar, parties who complained that their persons and property were affected by the operation of a retrospective law; and whether that law, which seemed to make the noble earl so impatient, should be repealed in a single day, without any regard to the interests or vested rights of individuals. However, as the noble earl had dwelt so much, and with such vehemence, on this alleged preposterous law, he could not help observing, that he had fallen into a mistake from the hurry with which this clause had been brought forward. It was, indeed, but natural, that any one should be taken by surprize in a question that could not be at once understood in all its bearings. The noble earl would find, if he examined the subject, that this clause in the Bank act did not creep by the Union unnoticed, but that the framers of that measure had it distinctly in view; for they, in speaking of the effect of the Bank act on the question of naturalization, included all those already naturalized by any Scotch law. The question, however, was, not the propriety or impropriety of altering that law, but whether their lordships should break down other great principles for the sake of obviating an imaginary danger, or compassing an imaginary convenience. They were told that the alien bill was a balance of inconvenience. Now, the inconvenience apprehended on one side was, that certain persons whom ministers wished to have in their grasp and net, had got out by relying on the laws of the country. Who those persons were, he knew not, except that they had been long domesticated here, and were good subjects of the king. That was the inconvenience on one side: on the other, their lordships broke down all rules and principles of government, and attacked the property and security which they professed to ensure. But the noble earl had argued this as a question of great state policy, in which the interests of individuals must be sacrificed to those of the public; and he had alluded to the abolition of the slave-trade, in which private interests had suffered severely. He (Lord Holland) well remembered the discussion on that question, and he recollected hearing, hour after hour, the counsel who spoke for persons interested in that trade. There was, however, a main difference between their situation and that of the petitioners. The petitioners here did not insist that the bill might injure their future prospects or speculations, but that it did take away from them those rights which they had already purchased under the existing laws of the country. We had told foreigners, that by the same laws which secured to landholders their land, to fundholders their claim on the funds, they might acquire and enjoy the rights of naturalization. And this the noble earl had called preposterous. Preposterous! yes, it was preposterous in the house, after omitting this subject on the first and second reading of the bill, now on the third reading to foist it in for the first time! And then the noble viscount said, that after the ample discussion of that night, he must refuse to hear counsel. Why, if the bill had been discussed in the first, second, and every stage of its reading, it would still be accordant to usual practice to hear counsel before it was passed. If the noble viscount's doctrine were to be admitted, there was an end of hearing counsel altogether: it was only to say, that the occasion on which petitioners requested to be heard was one of great public convenience, and their request might at once be refused. But he had known counsel heard on a third reading. The house was a tribunal of the last resort to all who were aggrieved, and it behoved them to hear the petitioners even with a view to the very measure which they complained of. Let the house know who these petitioners were; with what view they bought the shares in question, and to what amount. After all the pretence that had been set up about the balance of inconveniences, this was the principle, if any, on which their lordships ought to legislate. Say what they would, if they refused the prayer of these petitioners, they would sanction a great and flagrant injustice. Sure he was that this sacrifice to ministerial convenience would lead to a suspicion that more important rights would next be attacked. He had spoken last night of the ill effects of arbitrary power, and had shewn that those who were pampered by the high food of despotism, would acquire a disrelish for the homely establishment of a limited government. There could be no greater proof of this, than that the noble viscount, so celebrated for his mildness of character, after having been pampered with the suspension of the habeas corpus, the bill of indemnity, and the alien act, would not now condescend to hear the counsel of petitioners whose rights and property were sacrificed to an ex post facto law.

The house then divided on the question, whether counsel should be heard or not.

Contents 12—Not Contents, 22.

LIBEL LAW.] Lord Erskine, in moving the second reading of his bill "to prevent Arrests on the charge of Libel before Indictment found," stated, that there were two distinct questions for the consideration of the house. First, whether justices of the peace had jurisdiction to commit and hold to bail on the charge of a libel, before indictment found; and secondly, whether, supposing that jurisdiction existed, it should be suffered to continue. As to the first question, it could be supported only by the common law, or by express statute; and, on a former occasion, a noble friend of his (Earl Grey) had most correctly stated, (See Vol. I. p. 1005.) that the common law must be found in the decisions of the judges, in the writings of lawyers, or in universal practice. In one or in all of these authorities the proof of this jurisdiction must, if it did exist, be found; and if it were not to be found in any of these, it would not be denied to him, that it could not be the law of the land; for it was not within either the letter or the spirit of the commission to the justices, which was settled by the judges in the reign of Queen Elizabeth.—The noble and learned lord then went into an argument, for the purpose of shewing, that in the time of Henry VIII. there was no jurisdiction in justices of the peace to arrest even for felony, before indictment found. This was the unanimous judgment of the whole court in the 14th of Hen. VIII. (See the Year Book, Hil. Term, fo. 16. pl. 3.) Of the judges who decided that case, Broke was one, and he inserted the decision in his Abridgment, than which there could be no better legal authority, under the heads "Peace and Surety of Peace," and "False Imprisonment." At the distance of 90 years, lord Coke referred to this case, and said, he held the resolution of the court to be law. (4 Inst. pp. 177-8.) Lord Hale, in his Pleas of the Crown, (Vol. II. p. 108.) had laid down a proposition which, at first sight, might appear to support a power of arrest, before indictment by justices in all cases within the jurisdiction of sessions; but, in three pages afterwards, he declared, that this was "doubtful"—nay, not merely doubtful—for he said, "these things make against it: 1st, because some acts of parliament do particularly and expressly authorize them to it, which they would not have done if it had been otherwise lawful; 2dly, because, in most cases of this nature, though the party were indicted, or an information were preferred, yet the capias was not the first process, but a venire facias and distringas; and, in cases of information, no process of outlawry at all (8 Hen. VI. 9 B.), until the statute of 21 Jac. I. cap. 4. gave process of outlawry in actions popular, as in actions of trespass vi et armis." Lord Hale, then, merely meant, that, since the time of lord Coke, justices might, by universal practice, arrest for felony, and in all misdemeanors against the peace;—he did not mean, that they could commit or hold to bail, in cases of libel, because, as lord Camden had decided in Wilkes's case, a libel was not an actual breach of the peace, and in no case whatever, except that of the Seven Bishops, which was not law, had a libeller been bound to find surety for the peace. (Hear, hear.) The next writer was, Mr. Justice Hawkins; and the same construction must be put upon what he had said (Pleas of the Crown, B. II. p. 84.) in treating of felony, as had been applied to the work of Lord Hale. Hawkins said, that "constant and universal practice, since the time of Lord Coke, had altered the law as to the power of justices in felonies and misdemeanors against the peace; and that "the practice of justices had now also became law, in granting a warrant for the apprehension of any person, upon strong grounds of suspicion, for a felony, or other misdemeanor, before indictment found." By the words "other misdemeanors," he meant misdemeanors against the peace; and, even as to those he said, "yet as justices of the peace claim this power rather by connivance than any express warrant of the law, and since the execution of it may prove highly prejudicial to the reputation as well as the liberty of the party, a justice of peace cannot well be too tender in his proceedings of this kind? (hear, hear,) Then came the authority of Lord Chief Justice Holt, in the case of Roe, Kendall, and others, (7th Wm. III. Modern Reports, Vol. V. p. 80.), and also in the case of the Queen against Tracy, (3d of Queen Anne, Modern Rep. Vol. VI. p. 179.) It was evident from what that excellent judge said in those cases, that he understood the power of justices to commit before indictment found, to be confined to actual breaches of the peace. The next authority was that of Chief Justice Parker, afterwards Lord Macclesfield, in the case of the Queen against Derby. (10th Anne, Fortescue's Reports, p. 140.) In that case, the learned judge asked, "whether justices had not power to commit in cases of felony?" In asking that question, he could not have supposed them to possess that power in cases of libel, which are not breaches of the peace. Then came the decision of Lord Camden, in the celebrated case of Mr. Wilkes. (2 Wilson's Reports, p. 151.) In that case it was laid down by the court, that a libel was not a breach of the peace, and that it was absurd to require surety of the peace or bail in the case of a libeller. The last authority was that of Mr. Justice Blackstone; and from what he had written on this subject, it was evident that the power of justices to commit before indictment found, was confined to treasons, felonies, and breaches of the peace, and such offences as they have power to punish by statute. (Comm. Vol. IV. p. 290.)—Having thus shewn that, anciently, justices had not power to commit, even in cases of felony, before indictment found; and that the law on that point was afterwards altered, not by any express enactment, not by any decision of the courts, but by constant and universal practice*; the noble lord proceeded to shew, that the power of justices to commit, or hold to bail, for libel, before indictment found, was not supported by such practice. It appeared, by the return which had been made to his motion of the 23d of May, in the last session, that, since the year 1640, there had been many instances of arrests by justices, and also by secretaries of state, to answer ex-officio informations, (which were afterwards filed) in the reigns of Queen Anne, George I. and George II.; but the power of the secretary of state had been exercised only three times in the three first years of his present Majesty, and not again until the 43d year, and only thrice afterwards. It appeared also, that the whole of these cases of arrest for libel, both by the justices and by the secretaries, were confined to London and Westminster. (Hear, hear.) Could this be called a constant and universal practice? Had it prevailed at all times? Had it extended to all parts of the country? A usage, to grow into a law, ought to be a general usage, communiter usitata et approbata: but it was evident that that was not the case here. It was not such a usage as would supersede and repeal the ancient law of the land. (Hear, hear.)—If justices had the power in question, why did the legislature pass the act of the 48th of the King? That act gave to the judges of the Court of King's Bench, and to them only, the power of arresting for libel, upon the information of the attorney-general; but, if all justices of the peace possessed the power of holding to bail for libel, upon the information of any person whatsoever, that act was idle and useless, for the judges of the Court of King's Bench were already justices of the peace throughout the whole country; so that, in fact, it gave them less authority than they had without it. Let their lordships recollect, that that act was drawn up by Sir Vicary Gibbs, a most accurate and precise reasoner—a man so learned and acute in his profession, that, if an angel were to declare that he was ignorant of the common law when he framed that statute, he (Lord Erskine) should say, that he must be some fallen angel, and would never ascend to Heaven more. That statute furnished the most complete and satisfactory evidence, that Sir Vicary Gibbs did not believe that justices were entitled to exercise the power of holding to bail for libel, before indictment found. (Hear.) He now came to the second question, namely, whether, supposing the justices to have obtained, through practice, that power, their lordships would suffer it to continue. The libel act of 1792—Mr. Fox's act—declared, that the jurisdiction which the judges of the land had exercised of pronouncing what was and what was not a libel, was from the very beginning an usurpation; and would their lordships then, in the face of that excellent statute, suffer the lower magistrates to grant warrants upon their own judgments over libels? If their lordships would suffer this, the libel act might be cast into the fire. (Hear, hear.) He was convinced that many evils had followed from encouraging the magistrates to exercise this power, and that the government had not derived from it any additional security or respect. Many persons had been arrested, and after a long confinement discharged without trial. (Hear, hear.) Persons who were selling the parodies which a jury had found to be not criminal, were loaded with irons and torn from their families. Scholes, who had made an affidavit stating that he knew the iniquities of Oliver, was arrested on a warrant from the Secretary of State, and discharged long after, without the benefit of a trial. He should never justify blasphemy; but what was the enormity of which these men were really guilty? Not blasphemy, but an intention to ridicule ministers; and yet no notice whatever was taken of this offence: ministers were reviled, the House of Commons called a borough-mongering faction and no legislature, and yet, for all this offence, there was not a single count. He would not trouble their lordships with any farther observations. He was sure that every magistrate would gladly relinquish so invidious a power, even if it were legal; and he therefore confidently moved the second reading of the bill as a declaratory law, which was only intended to remove doubt, and not to establish any new enactment *.

* It will be seen that the arguments of the noble lord on this branch of the subject, and the authorities which he quotes in support of them, are the same as those stated by Earl Grey, in his speech on the 12th May, 1817. (See these Reports, vol. i. p. 1004.) The authorities, however, are adduced in chronological order, which was not done by the noble earl.

The Lord Chancellor said, that their lordships would do well to consider seriously before they agreed to any enactment on this subject. Would that house, which was the dernier resort in all cases of law, proceed to determine what was the law, and to declare it, without first having some question argued in the courts below, in which they might have the opinion of the judges to assist them? When their lordships found that, between the time of Queen Anne and the present period, there had been 128 cases in which the judges of the Court of King's Bench, as magistrates, had held to bail in cases of libel, would they at once pronounce the practice illegal, and proceed to declare against it? It had been said, that Sir Vicary Gibbs, in bringing in a bill to allow the judges to commit after information, had proceeded on the idea that they did not possess this power. His bill was right, as the judges could not, without it, commit upon information; they could only commit upon affidavit as justices of the peace. That justices of the peace could commit for misdemeanours there was no doubt: and the only question was, were libels in that character of misdemeanours which warranted them in committing? The libels, to which his noble and learned friend had referred, were certainly against the government of the country; for, as Lord Hale had said, the Christian religion was part of the law of the land; and any offence against it was an offence against the government. Had he been in the situation of the Attorney-general, he would have acted as he did. Upon the whole, he thought that it would not be right to put a negative, without further examination, on a practice which had been sanctioned by all the judges since the Revolution.

Earl Grey wished to make only a few observations. The little interest attached to this measure excited his surprise, as it was one of the most important that could be introduced to the attention of the house, affecting as it did the liberty of the subject, the liberty of the press,

* The bill was as follows: "Whereas doubts have arisen whether it be lawful for any justice or justices of the peace to apprehend, commit, or hold to bail any person or persons upon the charge of being the author or authors, publisher or publishers of any writing, before indictment found, or due presentment of the same as a libel: Be it therefore declared and enacted, that it shall not be lawful for any justice or justices of the peace to apprehend, commit, or hold to bail any person or persons upon the charge of being the author or authors, publisher or publishers of any writing, until after indictment found, or due presentment of the same as a libel: Provided always that nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend to any of his Majesty's Secretaries of State, nor to any judge of the King's Bench, acting under the authority of an act passed in the 48th year of the reign of his present Majesty."

and all those rights most highly valued by Englishmen. The power of magistrates to commit for felony, and for breaches of the peace, could not be denied; but he had formerly contended, and would still contend, that offences tending to a breach of the peace could not come under that character. The 128 instances of committal mentioned by the noble and learned lord on the woolsack had occurred in the metropolis, and there had been no returns from other parts of the country, which convinced him that there were no such instances recorded. Even in the metropolis, there had been no committals since the American war. But he would even go farther, and say, that although the practice had been general, that was no argument that it was legal. General warrants had continued for a long time; and yet, upon examination, they were found to be contrary to law. He would again quote to their lordships, on this point, the judgment of Lord Camden, in the case of Entick against Carrington, not only to shew the opinion of that great judge as to the sort of usage which would be required to establish a practice of this nature, but to rebut the inference, which might be drawn from the acquiescence of the courts in such cases. "I come now to the practice since the Revolution, which had been strongly urged, with the emphatical addition, that an usage, tolerated from the æra of liberty, and continued downwards to this time, through the best ages of the Constitution, must necessarily have a legal commencement. Now that pretence can have no place in the question made by this plea, because no such practice is there alleged; yet I will permit the defendant, for the present, to borrow a fact from the special verdict, for the sake of giving it an answer. If the practice began then, it began much too late to be law now. If it was more ancient, the Revolution is not to answer for it; and I could have wished, that, upon this occasion, the Revolution had not been considered as the only basis of our liberty. The Revolution restored this Constitution to its first principles: it did no more. It did not enlarge the liberty of the subject; but gave it a better security. It neither widened nor contracted the foundation; but repaired, and perhaps added a buttress or two to the fabric: and if any ministers of state have since deviated from the principles at that time recognised, all that I can say is, that, so far from being sanctioned, they are condemned by the Revolution. With respect to the practice itself, if it goes no higher, every lawyer will tell you, it is much too modern to be evidence of the common law; and if it should be added, that these warrants ought to acquire some strength by the silence of the courts, which have heard them read so often upon returns, without censure or animadversion, I am able to borrow my answer from the Court of King's Bench, which lately declared, with great unanimity, in the case of general warrants, that as no objection was taken to them upon the returns, and the matter passed sub silentio, the precedent was of no weight. I most heartily concur in that opinion; and that reason is more pertinent here, because the court had no authority in the present case to determine against the seizure of papers, which was not before them: whereas in the other they might, if they had thought fit, have declared the warrant void, and discharged the prisoner, ex officio. But still it is insisted, that there has been a general submission, and no action brought to try the right. I answer, there has been a submission of guilt and poverty to power and the terror of punishment. But it would be strange doctrine to assert, that all the people of this land are bound to acknowledge that to be universal law, which a few criminal booksellers have been afraid to dispute." When a magistate committed in other crimes, there was always a corpus delicti; but, in cases of libel, the corpus delicti was the only thing to be tried. The noble and learned lord had said, that the publications prosecuted in the last year were the worst he had ever seen, being against the Christian religion; but three successive juries had declared the contrary. Happily for the country, and to their own immortal honour, they came to this decision because an attempt was made by government to give a character to the publications which they were not warranted in attributing to them. Had he been on the jury, he would have given the same verdict. The object of the publications was, to serve a political purpose, not to degrade religion; and the publisher, (Mr. Hone) as he contended in his ingenious and able defence, had shewn instances in which ministers themselves had written parodies on religion to answer their own political purposes. (Hear, hear, hear.) For all these reasons, he should vote for the second reading of the bill of his noble and learned friend, by which the unconstitutional power now exercised by justices would be removed.

The Earl of Liverpool said, that in the case of the libel bill, the opinion of the judges was pronounced before parliament thought fit to pass a declaratory law; and although that opinion was different from that which parliament thought proper to adopt, yet the discussion carried on before lawyers had greatly assisted parliament in coming to a decision. He thought it was not too much to ask, that their lordships should adopt the same course, and avail themselves of the same advantage, in a case of so much importance as the present. The only question was, whether cases of libel should not stand precisely on the same footing as other offences, and be put in a course of inquiry by magistrates, in the same manner as any other misdemeanour. There could be no hardship in the party charged upon oath being called upon to provide security to answer for the offence. (Hear, hear, from Lords Erskine and Grey.) Great stress had been laid on the decision of three juries in London; but were there not decisions elsewhere which declared the same publications libellous? From every view of the proposed measure he must give it his decided opposition. It was said, that other libels had been published with impunity. So far as the general argument went, he was ready to admit the fact. He knew that in Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, it would not be difficult to find a blasphemous libel. But, was there no difference between an invidious attack on the Christian religion, in a work, generally speaking, accessible only to literary men, and in a pamphlet circulated for two-pence; and the style of which was adapted to the most ordinary understanding? He thought that justices ought to have the jurisdiction of committing for libel, and he should therefore oppose the bill.

Lord Holland said, that he had never heard of a verdict of a jury against the parodies which Mr. Hone had published; the only case to which the noble earl could refer, was one in which judgment was allowed to go by default. (The case of James Williams—see the note, p. 29.) If Mr. Hone's parodies had been directed against any other body than his Majesty's ministers—if they had been written against reformers, or even against the character of that house—their lordships would not have had the benefit of the Attorney-general's eloquence, of the moving appeal of the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, or of the pious horror which had issued from a member of the right reverend bench opposite, (the bishop of Exeter—see page 759) against their blasphemy and immorality. (Hear, hear.) Parodies had been previously published, north and south, east and west, but never before had they been encountered by so much devout and forensic eloquence.—He could not enter into the refined legislative system of the noble earl, as to the distinction to be drawn between the influence of works like Gibbon's, and that of cheaper and more popular publications. He could not see why a law should be made for cheap publications, which did not equally apply to those of a higher price.—In every view he was decidedly in favour of this bill. Why should the lower magistrates possess the power of deciding in cases of libel, when Mr. Fox's act declared, that such power should not belong to the judges of the land, but be committed to the judgment of twelve sworn men? In the case of the Bishop of St. Asaph, it was truly asserted by his noble and learned friend (Lord Erskine), respecting the petition of the Seven Bishops, that "if the King's judges could have decided the petition to be a libel, the Stuarts might yet have been upon the throne;" and he (Lord Holland) would say, that if the jurisdiction in question were suffered to remain in the hands of the justices, there was no security for the liberty of the press, and the freedom of the subject.—He would vote for the bill, as he thought it merely declared the present law: and if the present law were not as it declared, it ought to be altered.

Lord Erskine, in reply, observed, that nothing had been established contradictory of Lord Coke and the other authorities he had quoted. He was much surprised to hear his noble and learned friend rely on the local practice in London and Westminster. Even that practice had commenced long since the Revolution, and had not been uniformly exercised. It was not a constant and universal practice—it was confined to the metropolis—it was exercised with many and long interruptions—and, therefore, it was not such a practice as could supersede and repeal the ancient law.

The house then divided on the question of the second reading.

Contents, 13—Not-Contents, 31.

Alien Bill.] The order of the day being read for the consideration of this bill,

The Lord Chancellor moved a clause, that aliens who had purchased stock in the Bank of Scotland, since the 28th of April, should be considered as aliens, notwithstanding any former act to the contrary.

This clause, with a slight amendment, proposed by Lord Lauderdale, confining it to the duration of the act, was agreed to.

The third reading was then moved, which being opposed, Lord Sidmouth moved that the standing order, No. 26. should be suspended.

The Marquis of Lansdowne and the Earl of Rosslyn opposed it: the latter moved that the house do adjourn.

A division ensued: for the adjournment,

Contents, present	11;	Proxies 12—23
Not-Contents, present	31;	Proxies 27—58

Lord Sidmouth then moved, that the question for suspending the standing orders be put:

Contents, present	31;	Proxies, 25—56
Not-Contents, present	13;	Proxies, 12—25

The noble viscount then moved, that the standing orders be suspended.

Contents, present	29;	Proxies, 27—56
Not-Contents, present	13;	Proxies, 12—25

The standing orders were accordingly suspended, and the bill was read a third time, and passed.

Protests against the Alien Bill.] The following protests were entered on the Journals.

1st. Because the bill is cruel, for even when not perverted to any improper purposes, it may deter the victims of civil or religious persecution abroad from seeking refuge under the laws of a free country.

2dly. Because the bill is unjust.

It exposes all resident aliens (such even as may have settled here in consequence of such law existing at the time) to actual punishment without trial, and it condemns even the most unsuspected among them to an evil greater than most punishments—a dependence on the arbitrary will of one man.

3dly, Because the bill is unnecessary, there being no unusual resort of strangers to this kingdom, and no apprehension, real or pretended, that individual foreigners either possess the means or harbour the design of disturbing our internal tranquillity.

4thly. Because the bill is unconstitutional. It creates a power liable to abuse, and unknown to our laws; and arbitrary authority has always been thought to degrade those who are the objects of it, and to corrupt those who possess it, and thereby to lead to tyrannical maxims, and practices incompatible with the safety of a free people.

5thly. Because the bill is impolitic.

It discourages the employment of foreign capital, and the exercise of foreign ingenuity, in our country, and obviously tends to embroil us with other courts of Europe, by rendering the residence of any obnoxious individuals among us, an act of the state, and no longer a consequence of the hospitable spirit of our municipal laws.

VASSALL HOLLAND, ROSSLYN, AUGUSTUS FREDERICK, PONSONBY, LEINSTER, GREY,
KING, ILCHESTER.

For the 1st, 2d, and 5th reasons.
LANSDOWN.

For the 1st and 2d reasons.
GAGE.

Because, by this bill, the Secretary of State is authorized to convey an alien to any foreign port, and thus to deliver such alien into the hands of his mortal enemies—to subject him to perpetual imprisonment—to corporal punishment—to torture—or to death.

AUGUSTUS FREDERICK, ROSSLYN, GAGE, LEINSTER, VASSALL HOLLAND, GREY.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, June 2.

REGENCY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.] This bill was committed and reported, read a third time, and passed.

BANKRUPT LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.] This bill was read a second time, and committed; considered in a committee and reported.

Mr. J. Smith then said, that as it was his wish to give ample time for considering this important subject he should move, that the farther proceedings on the bill be put off for three months. Ordered.

INSOLVENT ACT.] The Attorney-General gave notice, that, in the next session, he would move to make some alterations in the law relative to Insolvent Debtors. The present act was made to continue until November next, and thence until the end of the then next session of parliament, and no longer. If that act should be renewed, it would be necessary to make considerable alterations in it for the protection of creditors.

Sir S. Romilly said, he thought that the act might be improved, but he was decidedly a friend to the principles on which it was founded. He considered that the system of a cessio bonorum was just and equitable, and it had been acted upon in Scotland, during many hundred years, with perfect satisfaction to his Majesty's subjects there.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Sir Francis Burdett, after having presented several petitions, praying for annual parliaments and universal suffrage, rose to call the attention of the house to the great question of parliamentary reform. He said, the resolutions which he was then about to propose, were founded on those acknowledged principles of freedom, which, as they were the basis of all rational government, so were they of the laws and constitution of England, the best inheritance of the subject, and the best security for the stability of the throne—those principles which (however imperfectly acted upon) had given to this country whatever of advantage she possessed over the nations of the continent of Europe, where for the most part despotism unhappily prevailed. These acknowledged constitutional principles he had embodied in a series of resolutions, which though he feared they might be considered of the longest, would he hoped, be considered in no less a degree the most important ever submitted to the attention of the house, and of the country: and in the minds of gentlemen, whose imaginations presented to them nothing under the head of reform, but confused notions of wild and visionary projects tending to anarchy and tumult, he hoped it would produce no less conviction than surprise, to find that the whole tenor of what he had to propose, was in strict unison with principles not only professed by our ablest constitutional writers, but recognized even from the throne by every king of England, that had sat upon the throne for the last two hundred years, with the exceptions of Charles I. and James II.: how unfortunate the exceptions for themselves and the country was but too obvious!—His resolutions commenced by advancing the fundamental position, that the only adequate security for good government consisted in, and was proportioned to, the community of interest between the governors and governed. This community of interest was pointedly acknowledged in a long series of speeches from the throne, from the time of James I. to the reign, and during the reign of the present king. Another principle recognized by the same high authority, and for the same length of time, was, that if on any occasion this community of interest ceased to have place, insomuch, that either one or the other must give way, the interest which ought to give way was not that of the many, but that of the few, a proposition in itself incontrovertible, honourable to the throne to acknowledge, and (sanctioned by that high authority) protected and shielded from any possible imputation of temerity, disloyalty, jacobinism, or treason. The preference thus due to the interests of the people, thus solemnly recognized, necessarily implied a grant of all the means requisite to secure so important and indispensable an end, or in other words, recognized a fair, free, and equal representation of the people in parliament, which was necessary on the one hand, to secure the legitimate and due dependence of the representatives of the people upon their constituents, by means of which alone this important object could by possibility be obtained, and on the other hand, to guard against the long experienced evils of a contrary dependence of the representatives of the people on the crown, or on a corrupt and borough-monger oligarchy.—If the panegyrics so frequently bestowed on the English constitution had any foundation in truth, the king and the people had one and the same interest, and there was no sufficient ground for such violent jealousy of the prerogative of the crown as many entertained. But, if he disclaimed any unreasonable apprehension of the power of the crown, he at the same time insisted upon, claimed, and demanded, on behalf of the people, that full, fair, free, and equal representation of them in the commons house of parliament, which was the just and constitutional check to the power of the crown. So checked, prerogative would cease to be dangerous to public liberty —so restrained within constitutional limits, it would be exercised, as it could only be constitutionally exercised, for the public benefit, on sudden emergencies, and in cases for which no legal enactment had made provision. This was the proper field for the beneficial exercise of the crown's prerogative, and from its due exercise, the people had nothing to fear, provided they were in possession of that share in the government which belonged to them of right, and for the establishment of which it was the object of his resolutions to point out provisions. The more he had scrutinized and reflected on the reinstatement of the people in their constitutional rights, the more just and simple, and easy and practicable it appeared. It had, indeed, become so familiar to his own mind from habitual investigation, that he laboured under that sort of difficulty in treating it, which was felt in the attempt to demonstrate an apparently self-evident proposition. There were honest alarmists who, from sheer timidity or imbecility of mind, had raised a senseless clamour against the principles of reform, on account of their imputed tendency to generate wild and visionary theories, leading to anarchy and confusion, and to the subversion of all order and regular government in practice. But the fears and apprehensions of such persons would be allayed; the principles thus stigmatized would be vindicated, on a reflection that they were the same principles upon which our forefathers acted, upon which the English constitution was founded, and which in proportion to their having been observed or neglected, had uniformly been accompanied by a corresponding degree of prosperity on the one hand, or of calamity on the other, to the country. That elections ought to be free, no man was bold enough in terms to deny. "Fiant electiones rite et libere," was a maxim of the common law. Freedom of election was, indeed, the life-blood, the soul of every free state; and no man, he imagined, at all conversant with the history of this or any other country, would dispute, that in proportion as elections were free and frequent, was the security they afforded to the people. Annual parliaments, annually elected, and oftener when it was oftener necessary to convene parliaments, were undeniably proved to have existed, by the concurring testimony of the common law, the statute-book, and our ancient records; and that formerly an extent of suffrage existed so general, that it would be difficult to attempt to fix the limits, was also evident. Whilst he stated this, he was willing to admit, that could it be ever so clearly demonstrated, it would by no means be decisive of the question as to what ought, under the actual circumstances of the country, to be the present limits to which it would be wise, reasonable, and practicable to extend it. This, he agreed, was a question which ought to stand on its own merits; and that the line now to be drawn was to be determined by the actual state of society, the general interest, and public utility. He had himself formerly intimated his intention of proposing a plan of reform, limiting the right of suffrage to such persons as paid direct taxes to the king, the church, and the poor. Had that been agreed to, he had no hesitation in saying, that it would then have satisfied the country. Neither had he any doubt that it would have been effectual to its purpose; that is to say, an efficient control on the executive government, and a complete remedy for all the evils generated by that prolific monster and parent of every grievance, the permanent power of a borough-monger faction, ever ready to usurp and barter the liberties of the people for the patronage of the crown. It would have reunited those interests, which ought never to be separated, of the king and the people, and rescued both from the power of an oligarchy. He was then taunted with not acting up to his own principles, with not going far enough to give general satisfaction, which was so desirable to be obtained, and which was the great end proposed by the measure: but he believed that his former plan would have effected every beneficial purpose, and given ample security to the country. But since that period the question of reform had been much agitated: the ablest men of the age had fully discussed it and sifted it to the bottom. Above all, Mr. Bentham had, with unequalled ability, proved how easy and safe it was to carry the principles of reform into practical effect. The public mind had therefore made rapid advances, and as investigation had diffused knowledge, it had produced conviction of the safety, as well as of the necessity of the most extended system of reform. The principle of the most comprehensive right of voting, which, for shortness, had been called universal suffrage, (though the term was certainly incorrect, because it was clear that some defalcation from it was, in practice, necessary—and it was not perhaps very important where the line was drawn, provided it were sufficiently comprehensive to include the universal interest), had been adopted not only by the majority of the people, but also by the most learned and enlightened men in the kingdom. To protect, however, those who maintained this principle from the charge of being wild, visionary, and dangerous, he not only relied on the clear and satisfactory reasoning by which it was supported, but had thought it necessary to trace back the ancient practice of the constitution to remote periods; so remote indeed, that some of those he was addressing might possibly think it not necessary, or even relevant to the question. He felt, however, that it was necessary in advocating so great a measure to anticipate and guard against, as far as he was able, every possible, as well as probable objection. For although ancient custom and practice did not in the eyes of philosophers, who weighed every thing in the scale of reason, and formed a judgment after accurate investigation and reflection; although antiquity and custom did not offer to such persons any satisfactory proof of the merit of any question in dispute, yet as the bulk of mankind were not philosophers, they were for the most part much influenced in their opinions by considerations drawn from such sources; and it had always been looked upon as a great accession of strength to a popular cause, and to popular rights, to be able to deduce from remote antiquity, the principles and practices upon which they were founded. He did not affirm that because a practice was ancient it was therefore desirable, but was willing on the contrary, to admit, that it could not be desirable, except inasmuch as it was consistent with the actual state of the country; yet, if the people claimed rights anciently possessed by their ancestors, and exercised without any ill consequences having been proved to have resulted from their enjoyment; and if, on the contrary, great mischief had always ensued from their having been neglected or trampled on; if such had been the uniform consequence of any infringement of the right of suffrage, the claim to that right on the part of the people was strengthened by the result of reason and experience; and however the question, as to the expediency of re-adopting such practice and such measures as formerly prevailed with beneficial effect, might be determined upon a fair discussion and after mature deliberation, no objection could be raised against them as being new, visionary, and wild.—The more remote the research into our history, the more plainly were indicated the evidences of our free constitution. That elections ought to be free was part of the common law: that they were also frequent appeared from the ancient law, which ordained, that two parliaments were to be held every year, or oftener, if need were; and this was 'de more,' or common law. William the First, vulgarly called the Conqueror, to whose reign high prerogative lawyers had been in the habit of referring in support of overstrained power in the crown, obtained the crown not by military conquest of the nation, but by compact and agreement. The coronation oath which he took bound him to govern by the old Saxon laws, by which laws parliaments were to be held twice a-year: and although he did not regard his coronation oath, that would be no argument against its validity, and still less against the validity of those rights which he violated, notwithstanding his oath to maintain them. And the history of the country sufficiently shewed, that the violations of the fundamentally free principles of the constitution ever produced trouble and civil war; and it was only by recurring to them that order and satisfaction could be restored: and this also proved the necessity, for the preservation of freedom, of recurring from time to time to first principles, according to the advice of the most eminent political writers.—Subsequent to the time of William I., there could be no doubt that annual or more frequent parliaments were the practice, and that that practice continued through a long period of time; from which practice no inconvenience was ever stated to have arisen. That these frequent parliaments were returned also by fresh elections, besides the testimony of the regular series of writs still extant, was also evidenced by the nature of the thing itself: for what was the object for which parliaments were convened? what but for the purpose of making the king acquainted with the views, feelings, wishes, and interests of the people in every part of his dominions*. Every power was intrusted to the crown for the benefit of the subject: without a parliament, a freely and frequently elected parliament, their interests could not be secured, nor could the king be made acquainted with the wishes and the grievances of the people. Had parliament been a long continued or permanent body, its objects and its uses would entirely have ceased: and as seats in parliament were not in those times objects of profit or emolument, but, on the contrary, both burthensome and dangerous, as they exposed those who held them to the abused prerogative of the crown, for the purpose of intimidating the members, whom there were then no funds to corrupt—as it was of no advantage to the member to be long continued in that situation, nor to those who sent him, that he should so continue, the reason of the thing, and the interest of all parties, concurred to shorten the duration of parliament†.—By far the most

* In discussing this question, it is quite immaterial whether the Wittenagemote of the Saxons were held annually, or whether William the Conqueror kept his oath with the people. There was no House of Commons before the 49th year of Henry III. (see note, p. 879.) and therefore, it is useless to carry our inquiries beyond that period.

† It is certain that, for many ages after the first institution of the House of Commons, parliaments important part of this subject, however, related to the extent and distribution of the suffrage by which the members were elected. Who were those who had the right to appoint representatives? How far did that right or elective franchise extend? The true ground upon which the claim of the people ought to stand, (which he agreed was that of reason and utility, whatever might have been the practice of our ancestors) there could be no better mode of ascertaining than by considering the foundation of the common law, which, taking its rise from common consent, reason, and common sense, was founded upon maxims which neither time, nor place, nor circumstances, could ever materially alter. One of those maxims stated by Chancellor Fortescue, in his book on the laws of England, was, that no man could be taxed without his own consent. This principle was embodied in various statutes in the brilliant reigns of the First and Third Edwards, than which none in our history were more glorious or more prosperous and happy. That every person ought to have a share in making the laws by which he was to be bound, was in itself so reasonable and so necessary, that Sir William Blackstone justified upon that principle alone, the right of the government to inflict death upon offenders. "The lawfulness of punishing criminals," says he, "is founded upon this principle, that the law by which they suffer was made by their own consent." Upon the same principle he justified the scandalous neglect of the due promulgation of laws; of which neglect, however, ancient times were not so guilty as the present. "There is no occasion," says Blackstone, "to promulgate the laws, because every man is in judgment of law a party to making an act of parliament, being present thereat by his representative." This, though a miserable fiction—unfortunately, however, men were not hung in fiction—bore testimony to the principles for which he (Sir F.) was contending: it acknowledged the people's right, and, at the same time, exemplified the necessity of the exercise of that right, as the only means of happiness and safety.—The right of the people was also acknowledged in the ancient coronation oath; the king was asked whether he would govern by the laws which the people chose. The words were "leges quas vulgus elegerit"—Words of larger import no language could afford; and, with a view to the practical effect, the act of Henry IV., passed on the grievous complaint of the people, of the infringement of their constitutional rights by undue interference in their elections, after stating that sheriffs should conduct themselves impartially, proceeded to point out who were required to choose knights of the shire. The words were, "that all they that were present in the county court, as well suitors duly summoned, as others," should attend to the election of their knights for the parliament. Under these words, as universal as well could be imagined, all who were present, which might fairly be interpreted to mean all the inhabitants of the county, appeared to have had votes. Mr. Justice Blackstone, indeed, construed the word "others" to mean other suitors, that is, other freeholders, or freeholders who were not duly summoned. This, however, appeared to him (Sir F.) to be a construction not to be admitted, because all the freeholders were summoned by the sheriff's proclamation: all, therefore, were were held once a year, and even oftener. There are many instances in which annual meetings were not called, but they prove nothing against the general rule, which the statutes of 4 Edw. III. c. 14; 36 Edw. III. c. 10; 1 Ric. II. and 2 Ric. II., were made to enforce. One principal reason of holding annual parliaments was, that the judges did not, in those days, decide difficult questions, but sent them into parliament. Lord Ellesmere says, "in ancient times where the matter was against reason, and the party had no remedy at law, it was the use to sue for remedy in parliament, and the parliaments were holden in course, twice every year; but now, suits are in chancery, and the parliaments are not so often holden." (See Lord Ellesmere on the office of Lord Chancellor, edit. 1651.) In the 5 Edw. II. c. 29, an ordinance was passed, which says, "Forasmuch as many persons are delayed in the King's court of their demands, because that the party allegeth that the demandants ought not to be answered without the King, and also many people be aggrieved by the King's ministers against right, in respect of which grievances no one can recover without a common parliament: We do ordain, that the King shall hold a parliament once in the year, or twice, if need be, and that in a convenient place: And that in the same parliaments, the pleas which are in the aforesaid form delayed, and the pleas whereon the justices are of different opinions, shall be recorded and determined. And, in the like manner, the bills shall be finished, which are delivered in parliament, in such sort as law and reason demand." When the court of Chancery began to entertain suits, frequent meetings of parliament were not thought so necessary; but still, according to the statutes, they ought to have been holden at least once every year, for the public business of the kingdom.

Whether the King were bound by those statutes to call a new parliament every year, is another question. Blackstone and others think that he was not; but many of our county histories prove, that new representatives sat in each of those parliaments, (see Hasted's Hist. of Kent; Blomefield's Hist. of Norwich; also Maitland's Hist. of London;) and the Journals shew, either that a new speaker was always chosen, or the former speaker re-elected.

The great question is, however, whether annual parliaments are suited to the present state of the country. When those parliaments existed, Ireland and Scotland had their respective legislatures; but now, there is only one parliament to legislate for the United Kingdom. In 1817, Mr. Speaker Abbott stated, that the business of the house had increased in a three-fold degree since the Union with Ireland, and five-fold since the year 1771. (See these Reports, Vol. I. p. 691.) Annual parliaments may not be expedient, but annual sessions must be holden, from the necessity ministers are under of applying annually for supplies, and for renewing the mutiny act.

equally summoned and equally duly summoned. To whom then could the word "others" be applied? If not to all the inhabitants of the county, he did not pretend to know; and to him it appeared, that under this act every inhabitant of the county had a right to vote, and this act he conceived to be declaratory of a common law right*. The first restrictive statute, the first infringement upon this right was the act of Henry VI., restraining the right of voting to freeholders of forty shillings a-year, probably equal, if the difference of the value of money was considered, to forty pounds a-year of the present day. The pretences for this great infringement and violation of the rights of the people were upon the face of them evidently false: without alleging any fact of mischief having ever taken place, the act stated, that a great and outrageous concourse of people had attended to give their voice at elections, and that persons of no property pretended to have a voice equal to the most worthy knights and esquires, and that tumults, manslaughters, riots, and batteries, might very likely arise and be; and, on this flimsy and false pretence, it disfranchised all who had not freeholds to the amount of forty shillings a-year. The statute did not state that any manslaughters or riots had actually arisen; but it asserted, what could not be contradicted, that such things might probably arise and be. Nor did he see, unless the construction he put upon the law were correct, how any such outrageous concourse of persons, and persons of no property, as was complained of, could have taken place. If this was a reason for disfranchising any part of the people, it would be a reason for putting an end to all elections. If the fear of riots, before any had ever arisen, was a cause for disfranchising so large a portion of the people of England, what would be said to the present state of elections, to that system, which was all riot, confusion, and disturbance. Elections were now for the most part scenes of drunkenness, perjury, and knavery. Proceedings which had no existence when the extended right of suffrage was exercised, were now witnessed at every election with the almost sole exception of one place where elections were conducted on a very extended scale of suffrage, and which he had the honor to represent. Here indeed the people had managed their own elections without riot, disturbance, perjury, drunkenness, or any of the mal-practices before-mentioned, and which shallow-minded persons were apt to consider as necessarily attendant upon popular elections. The citizens of Westminster, when left to themselves, had elected their representatives as peaceably and as quietly as a parish vestry elected a parish officer; and this was an experiment that went to prove the safety with which the people might be trusted with the exercise of their own rights. That the citizens of Westminster had been able under such disadvantageous circumstances as had existed, under the influence of a rotten borough system, and a septennial act—that under such circumstances they should have had the will and the ability to conduct themselves in so exemplary a manner, was not less honourable to themselves than it was gratifying to the friends of rational reform, and no less useful as an example to the country.—The two simple points upon which, as upon pivots, every thing respecting liberty turned, were security of person and security of property. Security of both was the common law and inalienable right of the people of England. That no man's person should be touched without due process of law;—that no man should undergo punishment without legal trial, or have the fruit of his honest industry taken from him without his own consent, were such rational, equitable, and moderate claims, that no man of common sense or common honesty would be found to deny their justice. In proportion as they had been regarded, the country had always been contented and prosperous. Unfortunately, however, there had been some kings who had resisted them, and misfortune invariably followed. Amongst such kings was Charles I., who, having violated all just principles of government, broken down the barriers of property and personal safety, and wrested the laws by means of venal lawyers to purposes of oppression, filled the cup of national calamity to the brim, and was himself at length compelled to drink it to the very dregs. Charles II., not deterred by the example of his father, nor by the calamities of his country, nor by gratitude for his restoration, pursued the same unconstitutional career, and prepared thereby the downfal of his house. After the expulsion of James II., we came to a new constitutional æra, that of the making of a new Magna Charta—a new declaratory act—the bill of the rights and liberties of the people of England. At that period the security to which the people were acknowledged to be entitled, ought to have been established—but for want of that which could alone give effect to the declaration of popular rights, that bill, together with all the other sham securities and unavailing declaratory acts with which the people have been so repeatedly deluded, failed upon trial. The necessity of a fair, full, and free representation of the people in parliament, was set forth in king William's declaration, upon which the bill of rights ought in honesty to have been framed: but this with many other important provisions was neglected to be enacted, or purposely omitted. So numerous, indeed, were the sins of omission upon that occasion, that Mr. Fawkes had humourously observed, that the people, at the revolution, got a good bill of fare but no dinner. Though the pretence was held out at the revolution, that the steps then taken were not only retrospective but prospective, not only to get rid of evil men, evil counsellors, evil kings, and corrupt judges, but to prevent such counsellors, kings, and judges, from ever again attempting, or assisting, to subvert the freedom of the country—though the bill declared against all unusual and cruel punishments, against packing juries, and packing parliaments, against standing armies in time of peace, against corrupt interference in elections, and that elections ought to be free, yet, no provisions were made to carry these declarations into effect, and to some of them a few words were added, which deprived the people of all the benefit that might have been derived from them. These magical words were "without consent or grant of parliament," or "unless it be with consent of parliament." Behold here the talisman, by the effect of which, the glorious edifice of English liberty, which had been raised up by our ancestors with so much labour, guarded with so much courage, and cemented with so much blood—by the application of these few simple words, as with the touch of a magician's wand, the fabric vanished into air:

* See Mr. Brougham's speech, post, page 2016.

> "into thin air,
> And, like the baseless fabric of a vision,
> Left not a wreck behind."

What was the difference to us, whether we had suspended laws, money illegally raised, and standing armies, and other detestable measures of the most detestable despotic power—what was it to the people of England, whether infamous or tyrannical acts were perpetrated by corrupt lawyers, on pretence of the prerogative of the crown, or by corruption in the hands of the crown, operating upon the venality of parliament. The effect was the same, whether the tyranny were exercised one way or the other, except that it was more mortifying to fall victims to the villany of false guardians, and self-appointed trustees, than it was to be overpowered by force, and submit to inevitable necessity. It was, as if a man were to be robbed by watchmen hired to protect him, to have that which was intended for his security, turned into the means of destroying him: this was an aggravation, not an alleviation, it was an insult not to be patiently endured. Had there been no such body as a corrupt House of Commons, there had still been some constitutional landmarks beyond any other power to remove: and the evil of the present corrupt oligarchy was so great, that he had rather there had been no House of Commons at all, than a House of Commons serving no other purpose than to destroy the liberties it was instituted to protect—a House of Commons to trick, cheat, and delude, but answering no useful purpose of check and control—a House of Commons, that under the mask and sanction of being the representative body of the people, betrayed their freedom, and plundered their wealth. To prevent the continuance of such evils, there was one and only one way, which was by a recurrence to the first principles of the constitution—to make the great body of the people a constituent part of the government—to give them their due weight in the state, and afford them the fair exercise of the inalienable rights to which they were justly intitled. He asserted that the rights of the people were inalienable; the government, so far as it was in other hands, was a trust for the people, and sacred, only, inasmuch as it answered the purpose of preserving the general freedom and security—it was a trust which had been forfeited, and might again be forfeited, by abuse, whereas the rights of the people could neither be forfeited nor destroyed.—In advocating the principles embodied in his resolutions, he would appeal with confidence, not only to ancient but to modern authority. In the year 1780, when the Westminster committee, of which Mr. Fox was chairman, was appointed to inquire into the state of the representation, a sub-committee, at which Mr. Sheridan presided, was instructed to investigate the question of reform, and to make thereon a report. That report, he had reason to think, was the first foundation of the petition presented to the house in the year 1793, by the friends of the people. That petition unanswered and unanswerable, was still lying on the table, and he was inclined to think that it was the real parent of that numerous progeny which had since quite overlaid the house. The report made by Mr. Sheridan having analyzed the composition of the house, gave, amongst others, this striking result, namely, that a majority of the members was returned by about 6000 miserable and dependent voters. These were voters of the precise description of those, the admission of whom to the right of suffrage was the main argument, real or pretended, against the system of radical reform. Under the present system, and at this time, not universal suffrage, but the dregs of universal suffrage, unallayed by any richer matter, returned more than half the members of the house. The suffrages which were pretended to be of so malignant a quality, that they would vitiate the whole mass of wealth and population, even when absorbed by it, and when they would be as a drop in the ocean—the suffrages which were pretended to be so malignant as to poison and contaminate the whole, were nevertheless contended to be, when unrectified by any more wholesome mixture, and exercising alone the whole power, perfectly harmless, and indeed highly beneficial. Such was the result of the argument against comprehensive suffrage, and in favour of the present system. Such the logic by which the one was proved dangerous, the other beneficial. Mr. Sheridan's report concluded with stating the representation to be still more inadequate with respect to property than population; and Mr. Fox, as chairman of the Westminster committee, to whom the sub-committee reported, signed resolutions to the following effect, viz. "That annual parliaments were the undoubted right of the people, and that the act which prolonged their duration was subversive of the constitution, and a violation on the part of the representatives of the sacred trust reposed in them by their constituents;" and

"that the present state of the representation was inadequate to the object, and a departure from the first principles of the constitution." It might be said that Mr. Fox's opinion was different, and that he only signed his name as chairman of the committee. But this could not be acceded to, for though an official chairman of a public body must sign whatever is brought before him, merely to authenticate it: and though a volunteer chairman might sign his name to matters of regulation, in conformity with the principles he adopted, yet no man could be justified in signing his name to principles he believed false, and opinions he thought erroneous. Besides, it was the opinion of Mr. Fox, in 1797, that the people had a right to be well governed —a right to form a constituent part of government, and that the best plan of representation was that which brought forward the greatest number of independent voters. Mr. Fox was therefore for the most comprehensive system of suffrage which could be combined with freedom of suffrage*. Annual parliaments and the most extensive mode of suffrage had been advocated by the late Duke of Richmond, in his famous letter to Colonel Sharman, with a strength of argument quite unanswerable†. The same principles had been investigated and maintained with additional force and acuteness, and philosophical accuracy, accompanied with complete demonstration of the safety with which they might be reduced to practice, by Bentham. If any anti-reformer could answer Mr. Bentham's arguments, he would do more efficacious service to reformers and anti-reformers, than could ever be effected by dealing out false imputations and unsubstantiated slander, these being, with a due portion of misrepresentation and exaggeration, the only intellectual weapons hitherto employed by the enemies against the friends of reform‡. Mr. Pitt had declared the present system to be both the offspring and the parent of corruption, under which no minister could act according to the interest of the country, nor any honest man continue minister—but, tempora mutantur—Mr. Pitt himself became minister, and exemplified the truth of his own doctrine. Mr. Burke also had expressed his abhorrence of the corruption of this house—with a masterly hand depicted its character, and lamented its unnatural want of sympathy with the people: he had declared that it would, among public misfortunes, be more natural and tolerable that the House of Commons should be infected with every epidemical phrenzy of the people, as this would indicate some consanguinity, some sympathy of nature

* With great submission the Editor begs to remark that Mr. Fox was decidedly hostile to universal suffrage. In his speech on Mr. Grey's motion for a reform in parliament, May 26, 1797, he expressed himself as follows:—"I have ALWAYS deprecated universal suffrage, not so much on account of the confusion to which it would lead, but because I think that we should in reality lose the very object which we desire to obtain; because I think it would in its nature embarrass and prevent the deliberative voice of the country from being heard. I do not think that you augment and multiply the deliberative body of the people by counting all the heads, but that in truth you confer on individuals, by this means, the power of drawing forth numbers, who, without deliberation, would implicitly act upon their will. My opinion is, that the best plan of representation is that which will bring into activity the greatest number of independent voters, and that that is defective which would bring forth those whose situation and condition takes from them power of deliberation. I can have no conception of that being a good plan of election which should enable individuals to bring regiments to the poll. I hope gentlemen will not smile if I endeavour to illustrate my position by referring to the example of the other sex. In all the theories and projects of the most absurd speculation, it has never been suggested that it would be advisable to extend the elective suffrage to the female sex; and yet, justly respecting, as we must do, the mental powers, the acquirements, the discrimination, and the talents of the women of England, in the present improved state of society—knowing the opportunities which they have for acquiring knowledge—that they have interests as dear and as important as our own, it must be the genuine feeling of every gentleman who hears me, that all the superior classes of the female sex of England, must be more capable of exercising the elective suffrage with deliberation and propriety, than the uninformed individuals of the lowest class of men to whom the advocates of universal suffrage would extend it; and yet, why has it never been imagined that the right of election should be extended to women? Why, but because by the law of nations, and perhaps also by the law of nature, that sex is dependent on ours; and because, therefore, their voices would be governed by the relation in which they stand in society. Therefore, it is, Sir, that with the exceptions of companies, in which the right of voting merely affects property, it has never been in the contemplation of the most absurd theorists to extend the elective franchise to the other sex. The desideratum to be obtained, is independent voters, and that, I say, would be a defective system that should bring to the poll regiments of soldiers, of servants, and of persons whose low condition necessarily curbed the independence of their mind. That then I take to be the most perfect system which shall include the greatest quantity of independent electors, and exclude the greatest number of those who are necessarily by their condition dependent. I think that the plan of my hon. friend (to extend the right of voting to householders) draws this line as discreetly as it can be drawn, and it by no means approaches to universal suffrage."

† In his speech on Mr. Grey's motion, May 26, 1797, Mr. Sheridan said, that "he remembered at some meetings signing his name with the Duke of Richmond in favour of universal suffrage and annual parliaments. The expediency of such a plan was matter for discussion and deliberation; if any other plan were better, there was no reason why it should not be preferred: he thought this plan (to extend the right of voting to householders) a better one, he thought also that the mass of the people would be satisfied with it."

‡ See the note, post, page 1999.

with their constituents, than that they should be in all cases untouched with the feelings and opinions of the people. "The virtue, spirit, and essence of a House of Commons," said he, "consists in its being the express image of the feelings of the nation. It was not instituted to be a control upon the people, as of late it had been taught by a doctrine of the most pernicious tendency, but as a control of the people." Sir William Jones, whom Dr. Johnson called "the most enlightened of the sons of men," had declared, that if the present representation could be compared to a tree rotten at the heart, he wished to see removed every particle of its rottenness, that a microscopic eye could discern: he derided many of the fashionable doctrines, that of virtual representation he held to be actual folly, as if they were to talk of negative representation, and contend that it involved any positive idea. He said that the right to be represented was an inherent right, and that it was mere banter to call men free who did not possess it*.—It would be easy to go on citing opinions, till it was shewn that almost all the great men whom this country had produced, from the time of the revolution to the present moment, had brought concurrent authority, as well as unanswerable reason, in aid of the great cause of Parliamentary Reform. But he would now address a few words to those gentlemen who might think that he did not act with sufficient caution, or prudence, on the present occasion. To these sincere and honest friends of reform, who agreed with him as to the necessity of reform, though they had not made up their minds to the propriety of the extent to which he now proposed to carry it—to them he would say, that having tried all possible modes of obtaining co-operation short of compromising public principle, to such a degree as to lose all hope of public benefit, from persevering in the same course; having witnessed the result of the motion made a few nights ago, for repealing the Septennial Act—an act so violent and unconstitutional, as to provoke and to justify Dr. Johnson in saying, "That the creation of twelve peers in one day, in Queen Anne's time, in order to maintain a majority in the House of Lords, though violent enough, was still legal, and not to be compared to the contempt of national rights with which the House of Commons some time afterwards, at the instigation of Whiggism, elected themselves for seven years, having been elected for three by their constituents." Having witnessed the fate of the motion to repeal that violation of the law and constitution of the country†, and to put us back only in that one respect to the state we were in at the time of the revolution; having witnessed the fate of the proposals which had been made by himself and others for a more limited reform, he was convinced, and he thought that at length the step by step reformers would be convinced of the utter impracticability and hopelessness of that mode of proceeding, and he therefore no longer thought it prudent to pursue so inefficacious a course, or to withhold the plan, of the propriety of which his own reason was convinced; and which, he had no doubt, examination and experience would confirm. The object was, that elections should be free and frequent, and that suffrage should be equal and comprehensive. The common law maxim, that elections ought to be free, was affirmed by the statute of Westminster 1st, which says, that no great man, or other, shall by force, cunning, or contrivance (such being, according to my Lord Coke, the import of the word malice) disturb the freedom of election. The same thing was declared at the commencement of every parliament, by a resolution of this house; which, at the same time that it declares that it is a high breach of its privileges for any peer of the realm to interfere in the election of a member of the House of Commons, allows a petition to remain unnoticed for years on its table, which asserts and offers to prove, that a large proportion of its members are absolutely the nominees of peers, or returned through the influence of peers. It was high time that these laws and these maxims should cease to stand upon our statute book, and upon our own order book, "like the forfeits in a barber's shop, more in mock than mark;" and that the public should feel, from their observance, some beneficial effects. But the freedom of elections could only be secured by extending and equalizing the right of suffrage, and shortening the duration of parliaments. On a fair distribution and extension of the elective franchise, and on a division of the United Kingdom into electoral districts, he calculated that each district would contain about 4000 voters, a number far too great for any man to bribe or terrify; and accompanied with annual elections, not presenting a sufficient interest to induce any man to attempt it. Some thought that additional security would be afforded by the ballot; and, as it appeared to him that the ballot could do no harm, and might occasionally be a protection, by leaving the voter at liberty to divulge or conceal his vote, he had introduced it into his resolutions, for the purpose of its being fairly discussed. For his own part he confessed that he thought it unnecessary; for where there was no good for which to strive, no strife could grow up there from faction, and it was clear that annual elections would offer no inducement to persons to become candidates for so short-lived a power, sufficient to make them willing to incur any mighty expense. The honour of the station would scarcely be more than a recompense for the trouble. The numbers would be too great to corrupt, and the benefit to be derived would be too small; so that if any one could be supposed to have the will, he would not have the power; and if he could be supposed to have the power, he would not have the will; and there being neither will nor power, nor motive of any kind, it might seem superfluous to guard against actions which, under the supposed circumstances, there would be no temptation to commit.—As to the extent of suffrage, it was evident, that in practice, some line must be drawn; and he had no hesitation in saying, that many were the points at which the limits might be fixed with equal advantage and security to the public; provided always that the extension was sufficient to comprehend the universal interest, and secure freedom of election. But if it could be shewn that the most comprehensive suffrage would produce no inconvenience in practice, it ought not in justice to be withheld. Mr. Bentham had, by incontrovertible argument, demonstrated, that no danger whatever would arise from the most extensive suffrage that could be established*. What sort of power was it that was conferred by the right of voting, if power it was to be called, on the part of the people? that every man should have a fraction, which fraction was a four-thousandth part of a voice in the appointment of a fraction which itself was a six hundred and fifty-eighth part of a voice in the house of commons; so that every man, be his fortune what it might, should have the power of saying who he thought was the best character amongst his neighbours, to whom he would most willingly entrust the guardianship of his rights and liberty; now how

* Sir W. Jones was a great friend to parliamentary reform, but he was by no means an advocate for universal suffrage. In his speech to the assembled inhabitants of the counties of Middlesex and Surrey, the cities of London and Westminster, and the borough of Southwark, 28th of May, 1782, he said, "The spirit of our constitution requires a representation of the people nearly equal and nearly universal. I say nearly universal; for I admit, that our constitution, both in form and spirit, requires some property in electors. I cannot persuade myself that the right of voting originally belonged to such as, having nothing at all, and being unable or unwilling to gain any thing by art or labour, were supported by alms." (See his Works by Lord Teignmouth, 8vo. ed. vol. vii. p. 500.)

† See page 1818.

* Mr. Bentham is the advocate of universal suffrage, and, in order to prove its good effects, he refers to the United States of America, where, he says, the suffrage is universal. Now it is notorious, that, in many of the States, slavery exists by law; in Virginia none but freeholders are entitled to vote; and in the four New England States, the elector must possess 100*l.* in real, or personal, property. So far, then, from being incontrovertible, Mr. Bentham's argument of experience, in favour of universal suffrage, is protestatio contra factum.

The Editor apprehends that it will be much more difficult to answer the arguments of Mr. Horne Tooke against universal suffrage. In a letter to Lord Ashburton, written on the 10th of May, 1782, three days subsequent to Mr. Pitt's first motion in the House of Commons for a reform in parliament, Mr. Tooke, after noticing the debate on that motion, and making some pointed remarks thereon, proceeds to investigate the opinion of his friend Major Cartwright, whom he describes as friendly to universal representation, and as a gentleman who asserts, that "No man can be free who has not a voice in framing those laws by which he is to be governed. He who is not represented has not this voice; therefore, every man has an equal right to representation, or to a share in the government. His final conclusion is, that every man has a right to an equal share in representation." Upon which opinion Mr. Tooke makes the following remarks:—"Now, my Lord, I conceive the error to lie chiefly in the conclusion; for there is very great difference between having an equal right to a share, and a right to an equal share. An estate may be devised by will amongst many persons, in different proportions; to one 5*l.*, to another 500*l.*, &c.; each person will have an equal right to his share, but not a right to an equal share.

"This principle is farther attempted to be enforced by an assertion, that 'the all of one man is as dear to him, as the all of another man is to that other.' But, my Lord, this maxim will not hold by any means; for a small all is not, for very good reasons, so dear as a great all. A small all may be lost and easily regained; it may very often, and with great wisdom, be risked for the chance of a greater; it may be so small, as to be little or not at all worth defending or caring for. Ibit eo qui zonam perdidit. But a large all can never be recovered; it has been amassing and accumulating for many generations; or it has been the product of a long life of industry and talents; or the consequence of some circumstance which will never return. But I am sure I need not dwell upon this, without placing the extremes of fortune in array against each other; every man whose all has varied at different periods of his life can speak for himself, and say, whether the dearness in which he held these different alls was equal. The lowest order of men consume their alls daily, as fast as they acquire it.

"My Lord, justice and policy require that benefit and burden, that the share of power and the share of contribution to that power, should be as nearly proportioned as possible. If aristocracy will have all the power, they are tyrants and unjust to the people, because aristocracy alone does not bear the whole burden. If the smallest individual of the people contends to be equal in power with the greatest individual, he, too, in his turn, is unjust in his demands; for his burden and contribution are not equal.

"Hitherto, my Lord, I have only argued against the equality; I shall now venture to speak against the universality of representation, or of a share in the government; for the terms amount to the same.

"Freedom and security ought surely to be equal and universal; but, my Lord, I am not at all backward to contend, that some of the members of a society may be free and secure, without having a share in the government. The happiness and freedom, and security of the whole, may even be advanced by the exclusion of some, not from freedom and security, but from a share in the government.

"My Lord, extreme misery, extreme dependence, extreme ignorance, extreme selfishness, (I mean that mistaken selfishness which excludes all public sense), all these are just and proper causes of exclusion from a share in the government, as well as extreme criminality, which is admitted to exclude; for thither they all tend, and there they frequently finish."

was any mischief from this cause to be apprehended? First, a man of mischievous intention must be able to persuade the majority of four thousand persons, of equally mischievous intentions of course, to concur in the appointment of the mischievous person: and when so appointed, this mischievous person must have the concurrence of a majority of 657 other mischievous persons also, elected by an equal number of other mischievous constituents; and when all these persons had agreed in the mischief to be committed, they must obtain the concurrence of the House of Lords, and subsequently of the king, before the supposed mischievous act could be carried into effect. To suppose it possible, would be to suppose the possibility of the deliberate perpetration of an act of suicide, by a whole nation; it must be, in fact, a conspiracy of the nation against the nation—a result that could not be anticipated with a reference to any of the known principles of human action; it was to suppose human beings, without any possible motive, uniting to destroy their own happiness.—Some had objected to extending the right of suffrage, on the ground that persons without education, without moral or political rectitude, rank or station in life, would be elected. This was an opinion contradicted by the history of all ages, times, and countries; and he had no hesitation in saying that the very reverse would be, as it always had been, the result, unless history was all a fable, political writers all mistaken, and Machiavelli a beardless boy just come from reading Livy. He tells us in commenting upon that author, after maturely considering and deeply meditating upon the subject, and facts presented to his view, that the voice of the people, in matters of election at least, was not unaptly styled the voice of God—that there was no comparison between the wisdom of the choice of the people, and that of any king or small body of men. Indeed, says he, it is impossible to get the people to advance a worthless or unprincipled character, than which nothing is more easy or common with princes: and such was the modesty and sense of the Romans, that though they had violent struggles with the patricians to obtain an equal right of admission to all the great offices of the state—although they had been insolently, and arrogantly, and unjustly treated by the patricians, yet, having obtained that fair equality for which they contended, and notwithstanding their just causes of enmity on account of the insolence and oppression of the patricians, they still annually elected the great officers of the state from amongst the patrician families. So undeviatingly correct was their instinctive judgment with respect to elections, that, in the course of 400 years, the Romans, who elected annually all the great officers of the state, did not in all that period make above three or four elections of which they had any reason to repent.—The people of this country had also in former times elected, not only members of parliament, but their leaders in war, and officers in peace, with the exception only of the immediate officers of the executive government in the appointment of the king. It was then but asking a little for the people of their ancient freedom, to have a voice in the choice of their representatives in parliament. This would be but a small portion of their ancient birthright restored,

> Nam, qui dabat olim
> Imperium, fasces, legiones, omnia, nunc se > Continet:

He would not continue the quotation, which would be to libel the people of England, who are not like the degenerate Romans, anxious only for bread and public shows, but are hungry for the bread of liberty, for the recovery of the rights of their forefathers*. They asked no bread but that which was earned by the sweat of their own brows, and when they had earned it, they asked nothing but that it should not be wrenched from them and their children by the hand of fiscal rapacity, to feed the profligate and unprincipled, the sons and daughters of corruption. The people of this country were honest, laborious, and high-minded; they asked not alms nor amusements, but demanded freedom—demanded to have check and control over the public purse, which purse was theirs, and security to them and their children for the enjoyment of the fruits, the hard-earned fruits of their at present unrequited industry. Security of person and property was the extent of their claim, and was it not monstrous that a government which exercised a power of taking men by force from their homes and families to be employed for its defence, which by compulsory ballot filled the ranks of its militia, and by violence and coercion manned its fleets, exposing them to all that is most formidable in fire and water combined, destructive and appalling to our common nature, which lavishly shed the blood of the people for its defence, should not only exclude the people from all efficient share in the government, not only from the making of laws, but even from any share in the appointment of those persons who were to determine when and how their blood, bones, and sinews should be disposed of. This was all that was sought for under the most extended right of suffrage, that a man should have the opportunity afforded him of saying with whom he would wish to entrust his liberty, his property, and his life. This surely was not asking too much—surely there was nothing unreasonable in this, nothing to excite apprehensions, cause alarm, or be productive of anarchy and confusion. In every governmennt, in every part of the world, the universal tenor of history bore undeniable testimony to this great truth, that in proportion as the people had had any share in the government, in that proportion had all countries been peaceable, prosperous, and happy. On the contrary, wherever monarchy, aristocracy, and, still more, oligarchy prevailed, in an equal degree had those countries been miserable, discontented, and poor. As the people of England were anciently and ought of right now to be free—as freedom and frequency of election were parts of our constitution, and prevailed without inconvenience in ancient practice—and as security for property, liberty, and life, depended solely in this country on a constitutionally constituted House of Commons, partaking the interests, sympathizing in the feelings, and faithfully representing the wishes of the people, he trusted that the resolutions which embodied those principles would not be rejected without being refuted, either as mistaken in principle or mischievous in practice.—The hon. baronet then moved the following resolutions.

* In a former note, page 879, the Editor has endeavoured to prove, that universal suffrage never existed in this country; and if his arguments and authorities be correct, the people cannot demand universal suffrage as "the right of their forefathers."

1. That no adequate security for good government can have place, but by means of, and in proportion to, a community of interest between governors and governed; and that the truth of this principle has been unequivocally recognized in speeches delivered from the throne by all the kings of this realm (except only King Charles I., and King James II.) from the accession of King James I., down to the present reign, both inclusive; and that in particular, 1st, In a speech delivered by King James I., on the 9th of Nov. 1605, his majesty after speaking of the "weal" of the king of this country, and the weal of the country itself, was pleased to add, "whose weals cannot be separated:" and, 2d, In a speech delivered on the 14th February, 1670, his majesty King Charles II., after speaking of a supply which was then demanded by him, was pleased to say, "consider this seriously and speedily; it is yours and the kingdom's interest as well as mine:" and, 3d, In a speech delivered on the 18th June, 1678, his said majesty King Charles II. after declaring his intention to open his heart freely to his parliament, on some points declared by him to be such as "nearest concern," says he, "both you and me," was pleased to add, "and I hope you will consider them so, because I am sure our interests ought not to be divided; and for me they never shall:" and, 4th, In a speech delivered on the 21st March, 1681, his said majesty King Charles II. was pleased to say, "it is as much my interest, and it shall be as much my care as yours to preserve the liberty of the subject:" and, 5th, In a speech delivered on the 4th Nov. 1692, his majesty King William III., speaking to his parliament, and through his parliament to his people, was pleased to say, "I am sure I can have no interest but what is yours," adding, "for I have no aim but to make you a happy people:" and, 6th, In an answer given to an address of this house on the 22d Nov. 1695, his said majesty King William III. was pleased to say, "our interests are inseparable, and there is nothing I wish so much as the happiness of this country where God has placed me:" and, 7th, In a speech delivered on the 21st Oct. 1702, her majesty Queen Anne was pleased to say, "my interests and yours are inseparable, and my endeavours shall never be wanting to make you all safe and happy:" and, 8th, In a speech delivered on the 29th Oct. 1704, her said majesty speaking of a certain measure of government as being then begun upon, was pleased to say, "I look upon this good beginning to be a sure pledge of your affections for my service, and for our common interest:" and, 9th, In a speech delivered on the 9th April, 1713, her said majesty was pleased to say, "those who would make a merit by separating our interests will never attain their ill ends:" and, 10th, In a speech delivered on the 13th January, 1732, his majesty King George II. was pleased to say, "our safety is mutual, our interests are inseparable:" and, 11th, On the 16th April, 1734, his said majesty King George II., speaking of "sovereign and subject," was pleased to say, "their interest is mutual and inseparable:" and, 12th, On the 17th October, 1754, his said majesty King George II. was pleased to say, "the interest of me and my people is always the same," and therefore he adds, "in this common interest let us all unite:" and, 13th, In a speech delivered on the 10th June, 1772, his present Majesty, after speaking of all ranks of his faithful subjects, was pleased to say, "let it be your constant care to assure them that I consider their interests as inseparably connected with my own:" and, 14th, In a speech delivered on the 10th June, 1791, his present Majesty after the gracious assurance expressed in these words, viz. "my constant endeavours will be directed to the pursuit of such measures as may appear to me best calculated to promote the interests and happiness of my people," was pleased to add, "which are inseparable from my own."

2. That on any occasion upon which this community of interest fails to be entire, the interest of the few, or of the one, ought to give way to the interest of the many; and that the truth of this principle has been recognized in speeches from the throne by the kings of this realm, of every family from the accession of King James I. down to the present reign, both inclusive; and that in particular, 1st, In a speech delivered on the 19th March, 1603, his majesty King James I., was pleased to acknowledge and declare, "when I have done all that I can for you, I do nothing but that which I am bound to do, and am accountable to God for the contrary; for I do acknowledge that the special and greatest point of difference that is between a rightful king and an usurping tyrant, is in this: that whereas the proud and ambitious tyrant doth think his kingdom and people are only ordained for satisfaction of his desires and unreasonable appetites; the righteous king doth, by the contrary, acknowledge himself to be ordained for the procuring of the wealth and prosperity of his people:" and again, "if we will take the whole people as one body and mass, then as the head is ordained for the body, and not the body for the head, so must a righteous king know himself to be ordained for his people, and not his people for him:" and 2d, In a speech delivered on the 3d December, 1697, his majesty King William III., was pleased to say, "That which I most delight in is, that I have all the proofs of my people's affection that a prince can desire; and I take this occasion to give them the most solemn assurance, that as I never had, so I never will nor can have any interest separate from theirs:" and 3d, On the 21st Nov. 1717, his majesty King George I., speaking of certain endeavours used by him on an occasion then mentioned, was pleased to say, "It is your interest that my endeavours should take effect; it is your interest, and therefore I think it mine;" and, 4th, On the 13th January, 1730, his majesty King George II. was pleased to say, "I desire that the affections of my people may be the strength of my government, as their interest has always been the rule of my actions and the object of my wishes:" and, 5th, On the 3d April, 1744, his said majesty King George II. was pleased to say, "I have no interest at heart but yours;" and therefore to add, "and in that common interest let us all unite:" and, 6th, On the 25th June, 1751, his said majesty King George II. was pleased to say, "I have nothing to desire of you but to consult your own true happiness and interest:" and, 7th, On the 15th Nov. 1763, his present majesty was pleased to say, "as the interests and prosperity of my people are the sole objects of my care, I have only to desire now that you will pursue such measures as are conducive to those objects with despatch and unanimity:" and, 8th, On the 13th Nov. 1770, his present majesty was pleased to say, "I have no interest, I can have none, distinct from my people:" and, 9th, On the 8th May, 1771, his majesty was pleased to say, "I have no other object, I can have no other interest than to reign in the hearts of a free and happy people;" and thereupon to add, "the support of our excellent constitution is our common duty and interest:" and, 10th, On the 24th March, 1784, his majesty, speaking of the powers entrusted to him by law, was pleased to say, "I can have no other object but to employ them for the only end for which they were given, the good of my people."

3. That under the government of this country, no such community of interest can have place, but in so far as the persons in whose hands the administration of public affairs is vested, are subject to the superintendence and control or check of the representatives of the people; such representatives speaking and acting in conformity to the sense of the people.

4. That, according to established usage as evidenced by speeches from the throne, and other public acts, the members of this house being in their collective capacity styled representatives of the people, and the powers exercised by them, being on no other ground recognized as constitutional; it is, only in so far as they are really and substantially representatives of the people, that the powers so exercised by them are constitutionally exercised.

5. That it is only in so far as the members of this house are in fact chosen, and from time to time removeable by the free suffrages of the people, that there can be any adequate assurance, that the acts done by them, are in conformity to the sense and wishes of the people; and, therefore, that they can in truth, and without abuse of words, be styled, or declared to be representatives of the people.

6. That no member of this house can, otherwise than by a notorious fiction, be styled a representative of any part of the people, other than of the part composed of such individuals, as have or might have voted on his election. And that, by the general appellation of representatives of the people, is, and ought to be understood, representatives of the whole body of the people.

7. That the sense of the whole body of the people cannot be adequately conformed to, by their representatives, except in so far as the suffrage of each person in the choice of his representative has a force and effect, as equal as may be, to that of the suffrage of every other person. And that such equality of force and effect cannot have place, except in so far as in the case of each representative, the number of persons possessing the right of voting on his election, is (as far as local circumstances will permit) the same as in the case of every other.

8. That on the occasion of electing a representative of the people, no man's suffrage can with truth be said to be free, except in so far as in the delivery of it, he stands unexposed to the hope of eventual good, or the fear of eventual evil to himself and his connexions, from the power or influence of every other individual on account of his suffrage.

9. That the advantage and necessity of comprehensive, equal and free suffrage, has been recognized in divers speeches from the throne; and that in particular, 1st, In a speech delivered on the 8th April, 1614, his majesty King James I., after saying, "But most I desire to meet with you when I might ask you nothing but that we might confer together freely," was pleased to add, "and I may hear out of every corner of my kingdom, the complaint of my subjects; and I will deliver you my advice and assistance, and we will consult only de republica; so shall the world see I love to join with my subjects, and this will breed love, as acquaintance doth amongst honest men, and the contrary amongst knaves:" and, 2d, On the 26th March, 1620, his said majesty King James I., after speaking of certain abuses in the shape of monopoly, of which he says he knew not till discovered by parliament, was pleased to add, " nor could so well be discovered otherwise in regard of the representative body of the people which comes from all parts of the country :" and, 3d, On 12th February, 1623, his said majesty King James I. was pleased to say, " I hope to God I shall clearly see that you are the true representative body of my subjects ; therefore be you true glasses and mirrors of their faces, and be sure you yield the true reflections and representations you ought to do ; and this doing, I hope you shall not only find the blessing of God, but shall also, by these actions, procure the thanks and love of my whole people, for being such true and faithful glasses :" and, 4th, In a speech delivered on the 14th April, 1640, by the Lord Keeper, by the command and in the presence of his majesty King Charles I., his said majesty was pleased to say, " By you as a select choice and abstract, the whole kingdom is presented to his majesty's royal view ; all of you, not only the prelates, nobles, and grandees ; but in your persons that are of the house of commons, every one, even the meanest of his majesty's subjects are graciously allowed to participate and share in the honour of those counsels that concern the great and weighty affairs of the king and kingdom : you come all armed with the votes and suffrages of the whole nation :" and, 5th, In a speech delivered on the 19th March, 1761, his present majesty was pleased to say, " I do with entire confidence rely on the good disposition of my faithful subjects, in the choice of their representatives : and I make no doubt but that they will thereby demonstrate the sincerity of their assurances, which have been so cordially and universally given me in the loyal, affectionate, and unanimous addresses of my people."

10. That the sense of the people can never be truly represented and conformed to by their representatives, otherwise than in so far as those representatives are dependent upon the wishes of their constituents for their continuance in their situation as representatives ; such wishes of the constituents being expressed by their suffrages freely delivered as above.

11. That though to give this dependence the greatest perfection of which, without regard to other objects, it might be susceptible, would require that at all times it should be in the power of every electoral body to remove its representative, in the same manner that it is in the power of every individual, who has granted to another a power of attorney, to revoke the same ; yet forasmuch as in such a state of things, the people, instead of deputing representatives to manage their public concerns, would be in their own persons engaged in the superintendence or management thereof, to the prejudice of the business of private life ; hence it becomes necessary that this same power of removal should not have place otherwise than at certain stated, and more or less distant periods.

12. That forasmuch as the dependence of the representatives upon their constituents will be the greater, the shorter the term is, during which they are exempt from removal ; and as no inconvenience can be apprehended from one election at the least taking place in every year ; and as it appears by divers statutes, and long continued practice in obedience thereto, that the principle of at least annual elections is conformable to the ancient laws and practice of this realm ; it is therefore expedient that the people should be enabled to remove their representatives, and, if necessary, repair the misfortune of having made an improper choice, at least once in every year.

13. That the sense of the people, considered as the standard to which the sense of their rulers ought to conform, is, not the sense entertained by the people in any past period of time, and which may have undergone subsequent change, but on the contrary, is the sense of the people taken in its freshest state ; and that this truth has been repeatedly recognized in speeches delivered from the throne, by his late majesty King George II., and by his present majesty ; and particularly, 1st, In a speech delivered on the 21st April, 1741, his said late majesty, after saying, " I will accordingly give the necessary orders for a new parliament," was pleased to add, " there is not any thing that I set so high a value upon as the love and affection of my people, in which I have so intire a confidence, that it is with great satisfaction I see this opportunity put into their hands of giving me fresh proofs of it, in the choice of their representatives : and, 2d, On the 12th of November, 1747, his late majesty was pleased to say, " One of my principal views in calling this parliament was, that I might receive the most clear and certain information of the sense of my people :" and, 3d, On the 6th November, 1761, his present majesty was pleased to say, " I am glad to have an opportunity of receiving the truest information of the sense of my people by a new choice of their representatives :" and, 4th, On the 8th November, 1768, his majesty was pleased to say, " The opportunity which the late general election gives me of knowing from their representatives in parliament, the more immediate sense of my people, makes me desirous, &c." and, 5th, On the 1st November, 1780, his majesty was pleased to say, " It is with more than ordinary satisfaction that I meet you in parliament at a time when the late elections may afford me an opportunity of receiving the most certain information of the disposition and the wishes of my people, to which I am always inclined to pay the utmost attention and regard :" and, 6th, On the 24th March, 1784, after mentioning the then situation of the country, his majesty was pleased to say, " I feel it a duty I owe to the constitution and to the country, in such a situation to recur as speedily as possible to the sense of my people by calling a new parliament."

14. That by the words sense, disposition, and wishes of the people, employed in the said speeches, nothing less than the sense, disposition, and wishes of the whole body of the people can with propriety be understood; for as much as if it be the interest and duty of his majesty to collect and attend to the sense, disposition, and wishes of any one part of his people, it cannot be so in any less degree in regard to any other part.

15. That except by petitions, and even by those means, no otherwise than occasionally and partially, and therefore inadequately, the sense, disposition, and wishes of the people can be conveyed to his majesty in no other manner than by the choice made by them of persons to sit and serve in this house in the character of representatives; and, that except in the said inadequate manner by petitions, those who have no part in the choice of representatives, cannot at any time make known to his majesty, the part which their sense, disposition, and wishes, has in the sense, disposition, and wishes of the whole body of the people.

16. That forasmuch as no power lodged in the hands of constituents can create or maintain the due dependence of their representatives, unless the good or evil which may be produced by the exercise of such power, be at all times in the expectation of the representatives greater than any that can be made to accrue to them by any other person or persons whose interest or supposed interest it may be to engage them in a violation of their trust; it is therefore necessary, that by all practicable means every representative of the people be rendered as completely exempt as possible from every such external influence.

17. That the offices, commissions, and emoluments, the power, rank, dignities, and other advantages, which are at the disposal of the crown, constitute so many instruments of temptation, by which the members of this house are exposed to be seduced from their duty, and induced to sacrifice the general interest of the people, to the particular interest, or supposed interest of the crown, its servants, and their adherents.

18. That as this house is now constituted, a large proportion of the members thereof obtain their seats by the appointment or favour of particular individuals without being elected, or at least without being freely elected by any part of the people; and that such members are continually exposed to be seduced from their duty, and induced to sacrifice the general interest of the people, to the particular interests of their respective patrons.

19. That forasmuch as the influence of the crown cannot be exercised and made productive of its natural effect, without counteracting and overpowering the influence of the people in the breasts of the members of this house, so as to engage them to make continual sacrifice of the interest of the people to the separate interests of the servants of the crown and their adherents; such influence may with truth and propriety be termed a sinister influence.

20. That parliamentary patronage not only prevents or interrupts comprehensive, free, and equal suffrage, whereby alone the sense of the people can be made known, but operates on the one hand as a perpetual inducement to the servants of the crown to favour the individuals who are possessed thereof, at the expense and to the prejudice of the people; and on the other hand as a perpetual temptation to those individuals to maintain and increase the influence of the crown, from which they may expect to derive benefit for themselves and their connexions.

21. That by a resolution passed on the 6th April, 1780, it was declared by this house, that the influence of the crown had increased, was increasing, and ought to be diminished.

22. That since that time the influence of the crown has been greatly increased, on the one hand by the increase of the public debt in respect of the taxes raised for paying the interest thereof, and the profitable patronage and power exercised in relation to the several offices and commissions necessary for the collection of those taxes; and on the other hand by the increase of the standing army, in respect of the patronage and power exercised in relation to the offices and commissions thereunto belonging, and the means of employing that same power to stifle the voice and destroy the liberties of the people.

23. That forasmuch as no adequate diminution of the influence of the crown can now be effected, the only resource which remains is to correct this influence by a counterforce consisting of the influence of the people.

24. That this house taking into consideration the gracious intentions so often expressed by his majesty, particularly calls to mind the speech delivered on the 5th Dec. 1782, in which his majesty, speaking to both houses of parliament, and after declaring it to be the fixed object of his heart to make the general good, and true spirit of the constitution, the invariable rule of his conduct, was pleased to say, "To insure the full advantage of a government conducted on such principles, depends on your temper, your wisdom, your disinterestedness, collectively and individually,—my people expect those qualifications of you, and I call for them;"—and again, the speech delivered on the 19th May, 1784, in which his majesty was pleased to say, "You will find me always desirous to concur with you in such measures as may be of lasting benefit to my people,—I have no wish but to consult their prosperity;"—and again the speech delivered on the 25th January, 1785, in which his majesty was pleased to say, "You may at all times depend on my hearty concurrence in every measure which can tend to alleviate our national burthens, to secure the true principles of the constitution, and to promote the general welfare of my people."

25. That this house taking also into consideration the gracious disposition of his royal highness the Prince Regent, assures itself with the fullest confidence, that his royal highness, acting in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, will be pleased to vouchsafe his sanction to all such measures as may be necessary for placing the influence of his majesty's people in this house on a firm and unalterable footing.

26. That therefore this house, proceeding on the principles above declared, is resolved to make one great sacrifice of all separate and particular interests, and to proceed to establish a comprehensive and consistent plan of reform; in virtue whereof, the whole people of the United Kingdom, may be fairly and truly represented in this house; and, in order to that end, this house does hereby declare :—

I. That it is expedient and necessary to admit to a participation in the elective suffrage, all such persons as being of the male sex, of mature age, and of sound mind, shall, during a determinate time antecedent to the day of election, have been resident either as householders or inmates, within the district or place in which they are called upon to vote.

II. That the territory of Great Britain and Ireland taken together, ought to be divided into 658 election districts, as nearly equal to each other in population as consistently with local convenience they may be; and, that each such election district ought to return one representative, and no more.

III. That for the prevention of unnecessary delay, vexation, and expense, as well as of fraud, violence, disorder, and void elections, the election in each district, ought to be begun and ended on the same day, and that day ought to be the same for all the districts; and that for this purpose, not only the proof of title, but also every operation requiring more time than is necessary for the delivery of the vote, ought to be accomplished on some day or days, antecedent to the day of election, and that the title to a vote should be the same for every elector, and so simple as not to be subject to dispute.

IV. That for the more effectually securing the attainment of the above objects, the election districts ought to be subdivided into sub-districts, for the reception of votes, in such number and situations as local convenience may require.

V. That for securing the freedom of election the mode of voting ought to be by ballot *.

VI. That for more effectually securing the unity of will and opinion, as between the people and their representatives, a fresh election of the members of this house ought to take place, once in every year at least; saving to the crown its prerogative of dissolving parliaments at any time, and thereupon, after the necessary interval, summoning a fresh parliament.

Lord Cochrane seconded the motion. In what he had to say, he did not presume to think that he could add to the arguments, which his hon. friend had so forcibly adduced, but he wished to discharge that duty which belonged to him as one of the representatives of the people. When he recollected the way in which this important question had been treated by the house, particularly on the recent motion for a repeal of the Septennial Act, he had very little hope of success on the present occasion. This was, perhaps, the last time he should have the honour of addressing them on any subject. (Here the noble lord was so overpowered by his feelings, that he could not proceed for some seconds.) It was now nearly eleven years since he had had the honour of a seat in that house, and since then there had been very few acts of theirs in which he could agree with the opinions of the majority. To say that those acts were contrary to justice would not be parliamentary. But he would appeal to the feelings of the landholders present—he would appeal to those members who were engaged in commerce, and ask them, whether the acts of the legislative body had not been such, that no man in the country knew what to call his own. Before the late war they could affirm that they had a property in the country: now, they were dependent upon financial schemes and measures which they could neither comprehend nor resist. The resolutions now proposed, if carried, would yet save the country, and restore the happiness of the people. One of the greatest men who had ever sat in that house, Lord Chatham, the father of Mr. Pitt, had said, that if that house were not reformed from within, it would be reformed with a vengeance from without. It had not been reformed from within, and he now gave it as his decided opinion that it never would be reformed from within. He appealed to all the members then present, who were only 100, whether any petition from the people complaining of oppression and injustice, and praying for reform, had ever been taken into serious consideration. It was his firm persuasion, that unless some measures were adopted to soften the angry feelings which prevailed in the country; unless some means were taken to restore security and tranquillity to the people, gentlemen opposite, who would that night be quite triumphant in resisting the motion

* Cicero says, that, "by the lex tabellaria, introduced at a late period of the republic, and equivalent to what we call election by ballot, a skulking shelter was provided for corrupt transactions, over which the sense of shame could have no check; and he asserts, that, in no instance was this measure ever proposed by an honest man." Gibbon, (vol. iv. p. 340.) says, "that a new method, of secret ballot, abolished the influence of fear and shame, of honour and interest; and the abuse of freedom accelerated the progress of anarchy and despotism." of his hon. colleague, would hereafter rue their temerity. The house of commons would one day deeply regret their perseverance in measures which would shake the whole frame of society to its foundation. He had sat in that house for eleven years, and he owed that favour to the electors of Westminster. He was truly grateful to them for their support throughout that period. He was grateful to them for having rescued him (Here the noble lord wept, and the house seemed to sympathise in his feelings) from a wicked and desperate conspiracy, which was calculated to effect his irrecoverable ruin. All his services to his country, and his perfect innocence, would not have availed him, but for the liberal and uniform support of his constituents. He forgave those who had plotted his ruin, and he hoped that, ere they should fall into their graves, they would repent of their base and foul machinations. These observations were foreign to the question, but he trusted that they would forgive him. (Hear, hear.) He hoped that his Majesty's ministers would take into their serious consideration the necessity of reform. He had no longer any feelings of hostility against them, and he trusted that they would take his warning, and save the country, by abandoning the present system before it was too late.

Mr. Brougham said, that it had been very far from his intention to be the first to reply to the speech of his hon. friend; but, differing as he did from him on this occasion, and being most averse to that universal suffrage which it was the object of his resolutions to establish, he was anxious to state a few of the reasons on which that aversion was founded. He was at the same time anxious to say, that he felt no manner of disrespect towards those persons in that house —where they were very few in numbers—or towards those out of doors—where they were very numerous—who entertained the same opinions with his hon. friend. Far be it from him to treat with ridicule opinions which were conscientiously held by a great body of people in this country. He considered them to be misled, partly from not having duly weighed the subject, and partly by the writings and speeches of those who themselves had not duly examined it. But to neither the one nor the other did he ascribe any bad motive, and he claimed from them the same charity for himself. He claimed this charity confidently from his hon. friend, as his own opinion upon this question was of a very recent date. (No, no, from Sir F. Burdett.) He found that he was mistaken; but a noble lord who sat near him had thought that he had heard his hon. friend protest against universal suffrage, and, certainly, his own recollection rather favoured that opinion. But, however that might be, he needed only to appeal to the character of the worthy baronet to be assured of a liberal construction of his conduct. He rose then, first, to protest against the conduct of those who treated with contempt every kind of reform, merely because it was reform. On that point of the subject it was only necessary to appeal to the conduct of parliament itself during the last twenty years. To those who argued that all reform whatever would lead to the destruction of the constitution, he would reply, that they themselves had been the greatest of all reformers: they had annihilated the parliament of Ireland by the union of the two kingdoms—a measure for which he was cordially thankful, although he could not approve of the means by which it had been effected. He, therefore, protested against considering all reform as a dangerous innovation, in the sense of a revolution, which put in jeopardy the best interests of the country. He would now make a few remarks on the speech of his hon. friend. If he had come into the house with his mind prejudiced against universal suffrage, the arguments which he had heard in support of it had certainly not removed his prepossessions He had listened to those arguments with attention, and they had struck him as altogether inconclusive. He had confined himself in his elaborately-reasoned resolutions to one kind of authority—an authority not founded on the statute-book, not derived from Magna Charta, which did not rest on the dicta of judges, or on the resolutions of either house of parliament, or even on those learned treatises which his hon. friend had so often referred to, such as Mr. Prynne's and others—but a species of authority which, in his estimation, ranked lower than the least, the speeches from the throne, from the reign of James I., that model of a constitutional monarch, down to the very happy, or, at least, the very long reign of his present Majesty. He had shewn, that all those princes had said, that no adequate security for good government could be obtained, but by means of, and in proportion to, the community of interest between the governors and governed. This was a principle which no man ever doubted. But, because it was said in a speech from the throne that his Majesty was happy to meet the representatives of the people in a new parliament, his hon. friend argued, that this was a proof that the king was a friend of frequent elections. If what was expressed in those speeches recommended short parliaments, how happened it that the same expressions were repeated at the end of every seven years, without any effort to shorten parliaments? The language of the speeches had, to speak in the terms of logicians, been understood by his hon. friend, secundum modum recipientis, according to the sense of the hearer, and not according to the sense of the speaker. Since his hon. friend had quoted the speeches of all our monarchs, from James I. to his present Majesty, excepting Charles I. and James II. he was astonished that the celebrated speech of his present Majesty, on his accession to the throne, had been omitted. In that speech, Lord Chatham put into the mouth of the present king, after the expression that he was born a Briton, " and it shall be my proudest distinction to be the first citizen of a free people." This would not have been of any service to his hon. friend's argument, but he was surprised that he had not mentioned it. It was notorious that speeches from the throne were the speeches of ministers. (Hear.) They had been acknowledged to be so, were always treated as such by parliament, and were always replied to as such. The addresses, which echoed back the tale, were never understood to pledge any member of that house to any particular vote upon the many questions that arose in the course of the session. Mr. Windham had shewn his opinion of such compositions, when he said, "I verily believe that that gentleman," alluding to a gentleman who had been much employed in preparing royal speeches, "could speak a King's speech off-hand." His hon. friend had endeavoured to shew that annual parliaments and universal suffrage were the ancient law of parliament. But even if he had proved this, still the return to them now might be one of the most visionary measures which could enter into the brains of a projector. Suppose he should move, that they should return to the savage state, which was still more ancient. Suppose he should move a return to domestic slavery, to villainage, to that state in which two thirds, if not one half, of the people, were the slaves, the chattels of their several owners. This would have no novelty in it, although it would be contrary to sense and justice. But it would be as much sanctioned by ancient practice as what some visionaries now contended for. His hon. friend had always been fond of quoting Magna Charta, but he was rather unfortunate in the chapter from which he had made his quotation on this occasion. The first word was much to his purpose, but his triumph could be but very short-lived, for the second word was decidedly against his theory. Nullus liber homo—it was not nullus homo, that would have been to his purpose; but the second word, liber, proved, that the rights there obtained were limited to a class of men who held the rest of the people in domestic slavery. If they went back to those pure times of the constitution, when the monarchy was in all its splendour, respected abroad as it was united at home, having recently emerged, by-the-by, from a seven-fold division—if they went back to those days when there were no rotten boroughs, no corrupt elections, no circumscribed suffrages, no long parliaments, but sometimes more than two of them in one year—in that golden age of the constitution (unless it was impaired in its progress from the Heptarchy to the period of Magna Charta) it appeared, that liberty was only allowed to those who were rich enough to have property in men. (Hear, hear.) He mentioned this only to shew, that it was no reason for agreeing to an absurd, visionary, and even detestable measure, that it was not an innovation: for a very ingenious man, a real patriot, Fletcher of Saltoun, had proposed in parliament, at a time when he was running the full career of liberty—for his hon. friend could not be more zealous in that cause than Mr. Fletcher was—yet he had proposed, when the mendicity of the people was most deplorable (the question respected the poor-laws,) to return to the Greek and Roman practice of domestic slavery. He supported his proposition by the same arguments which his hon. friend had urged in support of his doctrine of universal suffrage, namely, that it was an old practice of the country. He did not mean that the hon. baronet was likely to make any proposition quite so extravagant, but it shewed how chimerical his argument was. —But he was at issue with his hon. friend, not merely as to argument, but as to the fact. For his own part, he was an advocate for shortening the duration of parliaments; but he was not for a return to annual new parliaments, even if they ever existed; and, after a careful and attentive investigation of the subject, he was satisfied, that although the practice was to elect annually, it was not the law, and that there was nothing to prevent the same parliament from sitting more than one year, if the king had been so disposed.—But, in arguing for a return to universal suffrage, his hon. friend was rather more pressed for authorities. Vague, flimsy, and steril, as were the royal speeches with which his hon. friend had garnished his resolutions with respect to frequent parliaments, they were not less to his purpose than the ancient laws he had quoted in support of universal suffrage. He had said, that the words of the statute of Henry IV. "all they, who are present at the county court, as well suitors duly summoned, as others," could only be interpreted to mean all persons whatever. This was to charge our ancestors with being as verbose and circumlocutory as our present draughtsmen, who, to avoid every possible ambiguity, must use a great redundancy of terms. According to this reasoning, our ancestors had used seven superfluous words. If they had meant that, "all" persons whatever should vote, why did they add "as well suitors duly summoned, as others" when the single and simple word "all" would have been sufficient. By the words "as others" they meant "other suitors," that is, other freeholders who were not duly summoned. This was the opinion of Blackstone, whose authority in this respect, though unfortunately modern, had at least equal weight with the authority of the royal speeches quoted by his hon. friend. And Blackstone was right; for the courts had laid it down as a maxim, that when in any law there was a particular description followed by a general term, the interpretation should be, not according to the general term, but according to the previous particular description.—His hon. friend then went to the original language of the coronation oath and of the parliamentary writs; and because he there found the words plebs, vulgus, communitas, in Latin, and commonauté in

Norman, he thought he had abundant proof in favour of his argument. "These terms," said the hon. baronet, "surely comprehended all persons, and therefore universal suffrage was the ancient law." But had he taken the word, "commons," and argued that, because this was the house of commons, it ought to be returned by universal suffrage, it would be as much to his purpose, although he could not avail himself of such an argument without begging the question, which he had certainly begged from the beginning to the end of his speech. It would, indeed, have been otherwise, if he had consulted his own learning and been guided by his own ingenuity; had he listened to the suggestions of his own mind, rather than to the notions of others. He would not then have argued that all persons whatever, villeins as well as freemen, were entitled to vote.—Another authority had been attempted to be brought to bear upon the question, one which he should value more than all royal authorities; it was the great and venerable authority of Mr. Fox, whose loss he lamented on all occasions, but on none more than on the present, when the foundations of the constitution were the subject of discussion. If that illustrious person were present, no little man—he and all of them were little men compared with Mr. Fox, therefore he could mean no disrespect—no little man could obtrude his own crude notions on such a subject. His hon. friend could not have ventured to have made such a speech in the hearing of Mr. Fox, and if he had, it would not have existed one minute after that great man had said a few sentences upon it. He grieved that his authority had been brought forward as having once sanctioned what every one knew he had not acted upon*. He was said to have agreed to, or at least to have regarded as not injurious, what he had signed as a chairman. In the name of all chairmen he protested against this doctrine. Every chairman, as matter of courtesy as well as duty, authenticated the resolutions of a meeting over which he presided, and by so doing only said, "I attest this to have been the sense of the meeting." According to the hon. baronet's doctrine, it might as well be said, that Mr. Speaker approved of all the votes and resolutions to which he had to sign his name. And yet, it could not be supposed that, because he sat in the chair, he gave his assent to every measure which passed that house, or that he never listened with weariness and pain to speeches which he was obliged to hear.—This reminded him to hasten to a conclusion; but really so many errors and mistakes were to be found in the speech of his hon. friend, that, to use the old proverb, "he could not see the trees for the wood." His hon. friend had said, that the conduct of the citizens of Westminster in electing their representatives, as peaceably and quietly as a parish vestry elected a parish officer, was an experiment that went to prove the safety with which the people might be trusted with the exercise of their own rights. He (Mr. Brougham) tendered his tribute of applause to the citizens of Westminster, for re-electing the noble lord (Cochrane) after his expulsion from that house. He confined his praise, however, entirely to the motive which he believed influenced them in that proceeding, and which was their resentment at the infamous sentence, including the punishment of the pillory, which the court of King's Bench had passed upon him, and but for which sentence the noble lord would probably not have been re-elected. The hon. baronet had appeared to assume as a fact, that in Westminster the principle of universal suffrage was established, and that no other place enjoyed the same advantage. Now he must deny both the one statement and the other. He denied that there was any thing like universal suffrage in Westminster, or that Westminster enjoyed any advantages which were not equally enjoyed by many other large constituent bodies. The elective franchise was confined in Westminster to inhabitant-householders, an extension of suffrage certainly producing 10,000 voters, a number which some might think erred as much in excess as that in Old Sarum did by its poverty, but to which he had no objection, and in which he saw no danger of turbulence, or those other evils generally apprehended from such causes. But, though he did not apprehend those dangers of tumult and confusion which many anticipated from universal suffrage, yet he thought that the arguments adduced from the case of Westminster were rather defective, for it might well happen that householders should be tranquil in the place which was the seat of government, without its being certain that all persons elsewhere, householders or not, would be equally so.—He now came to the substance of the proposition made by the hon. baronet, and he should only observe on an inconsistency or two, as he did not wish to fatigue the house by going into the detail. The hon. baronet proposed that the suffrage should be extended to all, because no person could be consistently excluded from a share in framing those laws which he was called upon to obey. He admitted that, in rigorous consistency, this was true; but according to his views of reform, it was absolutely necessary to draw a line somewhere*. If the right

* See the note, page 1995.

* Blackstone says that, "if it were probable that every man would give his vote freely and without influence of any kind, then, upon the true theory and genuine principles of liberty, every member of the community, however poor, should have a vote in electing those delegates, to whose charge is committed the disposal of his property, his liberty, and his life. But since that can hardly be expected in persons of indigent fortunes, or such as are under the immediate dominion of others, all popular states have been obliged to establish certain qualifications; whereby some, who are suspected to have no will of their own, are excluded from voting, in order to set other indi-of voting were extended to the payers of direct taxes, or to householders only, or to the voters proposed by Mr. Grey in 1797, a line would be drawn and a distinction made; but the hon. baronet seemed to think that no line should be drawn, as it would have an appearance of inconsistency. But why, then, did the hon. baronet exclude all persons under the age of 21 years? If all persons—tradesmen, journeymen and labourers—ought to vote, why not all infants also? Many great things had been done by individuals before they attained the age of 21. Many excellent speeches had been delivered in that house by minors. A noble friend of his (Lord Milton) made an admirable speech on the Slave Trade before he had reached that age. Sir Isaac Newton had before that period of his life performed wonders in mathematics; and Mr. Fox himself had in that house signalized his powers —powers not falling into sudden decay, as too often happened after a premature disclosure, but sustaining by their ripeness all the brilliant promise of their first expansion—before he arrived at the age of 21. He might produce from the military and naval services the most shining examples of valour and devotion afforded at an early stage of the professional career; but the cases which served to establish the truth of his observation were so various, that he felt himself entitled to complain of the cruel injustice with which the hon. baronet had treated the infants of the nation. If they did not contribute their property, they contributed their abilities and their blood to the service of the state; and, as he could not conceive that they ought to be deprived of the most sacred of all rights, under such circumstances, he must recommend these interesting and interested persons to the hon. baronet's candid consideration. (A laugh.) By limiting the right of suffrage to persons above the age of 21, an irreparable injustice would be done to all the infants of the nation *.—It appeared, however, that his hon. friend would exclude another large class of persons, amiable in their dispositions, of quick faculties, of lively perceptions, and who—though sometimes apt to pervert the benefits of an education but lately extended to them, and like many theorists prone to judge rashly on matters of which they knew little—could not be declared unfit for the elective franchise in the state of which they were in every respect the ornament, and in one sense the prop—he meant females. But, in favour of the political rights of the other sex, and against the hon. baronet, he had to quote the authority of Mr. Bentham. When he mentioned that name, it was with the most sincere respect for his long, useful, laborious, and disinterested life—a life withdrawn from those pursuits of power and gain, in which he must have succeeded, and spent in the most important researches with which the human intellect could be busied. Without, however, suspecting him of defective judgment or information, he might be allowed to say, that his mind was extremely speculative, and that his knowledge was rather of books than of men. He might repeat, as his own sentiment, the observation of the hon. member for Arundel, in the last session—an hon. member (Sir S. Romilly) who respected Mr. Bentham as much as himself—that he was sorry he had published his work on parliamentary reform. (See Vol. I. p. 1217.) But, Mr. Bentham, whether right or wrong, was at least a more sturdy and consistent reformer than the hon. baronet, for he was at once for letting in all women to the elective franchise; he tossed away every scale, he overstepped every limit, and fairly proclaimed, " let in all men, let in all women." (A laugh.) He did not even sanction the exception which the hon. baronet seemed inclined to admit with respect to persons of an unsound mind.—On the contrary, he was the patron of the ballot, and his doctrine was, that all who could ballot might enjoy the elective franchise. The moment a person of either sex had strength enough to drop a pellet into a box, he was qualified to partake of universal snffrage. He agreed, indeed, that idiots and lunatics might not be of much use on such occasions, but he had such an invincible objection to lines of every description, that he could not admit of one, although drawn at the gates of Bedlam. " Let them all vote, therefore," said he, " for they will do no harm." (A laugh.) It was not necessary for him to controvert doctrines of this nature, but they were certainly consistent with each other, and he did not think himself uncharitable in saying, that some of the principles promulgated in that house to-night were nearly as visionary, without being consistent. (Hear, hear.)—He had omitted to mention, in reference to the authority of Mr. Fox on this subject, a saying of the late Mr. Burke, who, when he saw the name of Mr. Fox signed as chairman to the resolutions of the Westminster meeting already alluded to, observed to him, in jest, (so well known was it that Mr.

viduals, whose wills may be supposed independent, more thoroughly upon a level with each other." (Comm. vol. I. p. 171.) The same doctrine has been uniformly maintained by Mr. Fox, Mr. Burke, Sir W. Jones, aud other illustrions characters.

* According to the doctrine that every individual should have a share in making those laws which he is bound to obey, children of the age of 14 years ought to have a vote at elections; for, at that age, they may be capitally punished for any capital offence. Nay, at a much earlier age, an infant, if he can discern between good and evil, may be convicted of an offence and undergo judgment and execution of death. Mr. Justice Foster gives us a recent instance of a boy of 10 years old, who, having been guilty of murder, was held a proper subject for capital punishment, by the opinion of all the judges. (Foster, 72.) At 14, however, an infant is at years of discretion, and may make his testament of his personal estate. Why, then, should not all the children of that age in the kingdom enjoy the elective franchise?

Fox did not favour those sentiments), "I see, at last, you have got to universal suffrage, and annual parliaments, but you will soon be beat by the oftener-if-need-be-ans," alluding to the words "once a year, or oftener if need be," in the statute of Edward III. so much cited by the radical gentlemen. It was melancholy to know the truth which this pleasantry implied, that the only result of yielding to the desire of conciliating popular favour, by proposing measures which discretion did not approve, was, that many would be ready to outbid for that applause by still more extravagant concessions, and the highest bidder would be not the most honest and the most enlightened, but the most servile and submissive, the most mad or dishonest. (Hear, hear.) He agreed with the great man to whom he had just adverted, that it was necessary to make a stand against such wild and chimerical notions; it was the duty of parliament to expose and reprobate them—to try them by its own better judgment—and to exercise with regard to them its own honest and enlightened conscience.—If his own opinions had at all changed on this important subject, it was at least to be ascribed to no personal interest, for the differences which prevailed between him and the dispensers of power, were too wide and too radical to leave any possibility that his approach to it could be at all facilitated by this partial surrender of an opinion which he once entertained. He was still an advocate for parliamentary reform to far too great an extent, to make what he had given up of any consequence. He now, though he did not strongly object to annual parliaments, was of opinion that triennial ones would be preferable, and he was disposed to think that an extension of the right of suffrage to all payers of direct taxes was too large. This opinion was formed conscientiously, and not without laborious investigation. —He should now conclude by referring to some of the hon. baronet's remarks on the scheme of government framed by our ancestors at the Revolution. There the hon. baronet, in the austerity of his criticism, had called in aid the observation of a late member for Yorkshire, who, in speaking of the Bill of Rights, had described it as a bill of fare without a dinner. The hon. baronet regarded it as full of promise, but as attended with no performance. To him (Mr. B.) it appeared that the overthrow of an arbitrary government and a bigotted church was in itself a great good, and made an excellent first part in the banquet of liberty. The patriots of that day, too, recorded their reasons for banishing James II. with the view of deterring future kings from the repetition of similar enormities. They never, any more than their illustrious predecessors, who had hazarded their all for the sake of liberty, aimed at improving the constitution by indulging the senseless wishes of a multitude, which, if they were to attain to-morrow, they would no longer consider of any value. This he felt it due to those illustrious characters to observe, because he thought they had shewn both their wisdom and their patriotism in pointing out to posterity the road to farther improvement, instead of seeking, like rash and ignorant enthusiasts, to realize at once a perfect scheme of liberty*. (Hear, hear, hear.)

Mr. Parnell professed himself a step-by-step

* It should be remembered, that the Revolution was brought about by a coalition of Whigs and Tories, for the Whigs alone could not have succeeded; and therefore, when we consider the contest of parties at that time, and that prejudices and passions of all kinds existed, it may be safely pronounced, that it was impossible to do more for the people than was done.

Mr. Justice Blackstone says, (Comm. 1. p. 212.) that "the proceedings at the Revolution were not altogether so perfect as might have been wished;" but this, he adds, was "owing to the peculiar circumstances of things and persons." This is the proper light in which to view the matter; for though it must be admitted, that the Declaration and Bill of Rights ought to have been more comprehensive and remedial, and should have contained further provisions in behalf of the liberties of the people; yet, as Mr. Maddock justly observes, (Life of Lord Somers, vol. i. p. 247.) we must pay a due regard to the situation of affairs at that time. Mr. Rose (Observations on Fox's Historical Work, p. 19.) supposes, that "there was full leisure for deliberation;" but he is greatly mistaken. The Prince of Orange, on his first meeting of the Convention Parliament, told them, "that next to the danger of unseasonable divisions amongst themselves, nothing could be so fatal as too great delay in their consultations:" (Vide Commons Journal for 22d Jan. 1688-9.) and this he repeated on the next day. Serjeant Maynard (as able a lawyer as Westminster Hall ever saw, and so characterised by Lord Hardwicke in Bagshaw and Spencer, 1 Ves. 149.) in his speech on the memorable 28th of January, 1688-9, in the Convention Parliament, said, "Let us not delay to set the government in motion under whatever fair pretence, lest we give occasion to moles, who work under ground, to destroy the foundations you laid yesterday. This is my fear, dictated by the knowledge and experience of past times, and this, as a true Englishman, who love my country better than my life. The things mentioned are obvious, and, in your present situation, easy to be attained. But it is essential and of immediate necessity there should be a king. The law has so bound the king (whether you declare it anew or not), that he can do no wrong, unless wicked counsellors advise to break it; but in this there can be no mistake for ignorance. You are without power, without justice, without mercy, other things require time and admit of it." Mr. Pollexfen, too, was urgent to the same effect, observing, that to delay supplying the government, would restore the king (James II.); and, therefore, it is clear, that in the Convention Parliament there was not time to discuss proposed improvements. But then, as Mr. Maddock observes, it may be asked, "When the throne was filled, and the Bill of Rights was about to pass, why was not that bill made, not merely declaratory of ancient rights, but also introductive of new rights; since no legal difficulty could then occur, inasmuch as the throne was full? The truth was the Whigs found it, at that period, impossible. In all the improvements in the constireformer, and thought some good might be attained by prudent measures, which could not be expected from one which excited so much opposition, as that now before the house.

Mr. Canning observed, that although he differed in some points from the hon. and learned gentleman, he felt much gratified at finding so powerful an ally in general principles of the first importance in this question. He wished to know when it was that parliament was differently constructed, or acted more effectually for the benefit of the whole community. What order of men was there now which was not virtually represented, and whose interests were not defended when brought in question, with as much skill and ability in that house, as could be collected by any form of election? If the hon. baronet meant that the will of the people had not a sufficiently direct operation on the measures of government, he answered, that government was not a matter of will, and that it was made for the purpose of restraining will, in whatever member of the state it might inhere. He was grateful to the hon. baronet for having fairly stated his views; he apprehended no danger from the disclosure of any specific plan; that danger could only arise from vague declamations, and idle references to periods of history which afforded no points of comparison with the state of things in more modern times. It was said that the people were not fully represented; and if this only meant that the whole force and authority of the nation was not vested in and exercised by that house, he admitted the fact, and trusted he could justify it. The constitution was a monarchy, controlled by two houses of parliament; but if every 4000 men in the country had a delegate or minister acting under their immediate control in the House of Commons, what room would there be for any other power in the state? Against the national will thus exercised all resistance by the Crown or the Lords would be vain. These were not the deductions of mere theory, but were proved to demonstration by that portion of our own eventful history, the year 1648, when the Commons voted the House of Lords useless, and afterwards dethroned the king, and led him to the scaffold. He had said that thanks were due to the hon. baronet for bringing forward the doctrines of the reformers in a tangible shape; for now that they had been produced, a judgment could be formed upon them, and they would no longer rest on vague conjecture. Some peril might certainly arise from the dissemination of these doctrines, but the world would have an opportunity of reading them and judging of their merits. The constitution as established might receive a slight shock, but its effects would be only temporary, for men of sound heads and warm hearts would not be long in deciding whether the existing constitution or that proposed ought to be preferred. For his own part, he was willing to rest satisfied under the shelter of the constitution as established at the Revolution, which had been found hitherto sufficient to secure internal tranquillity and external glory. The hon. baronet had acted quite openly and fairly by the house, and, in courtesy, he would not move that a direct negative be put upon the resolutions, but that the house should proceed to the other orders of the day.

Mr. Lamb supported the amendment. He contended, that universal suffrage never existed in this country; there was no more evidence of all males ever having voted, than of all females. In the counties, the right of voting was confined to freeholders, and, in the boroughs, it belonged to the particular description of persons designated in the charters. As to annual parliaments, he was of opinion, that parliaments, annually holden, never were in practice in the constitution of this country. He admitted that, by virtue of the statute 4 Edward III. c. 14, they ought to have been so; but that statute was soon disregarded. But, with respect to parliaments annually chosen, he contended, that they were never dreamt of in those days; nor did those who lived in the reign of Charles I., who framed the Triennial Act, nor our ancestors at the Revolution, believe that the people were entitled to annual elections*.—He lamented that so large a portion of the community had suffered themselves to be misled on this subject, tution that were afterwards introduced, what struggles did it occasion, and what a load of prejudices was it necessary to clear away?—Every Revolution must be in a degree imperfect; and if we do but consider how much discussion the most reasonable proposals for new laws occasion, even at the present day, in parliament, we shall cease to wonder that more was not effected at the Revolution. Amidst the contest of parties, and where prejudices and passions of all kinds were on tip-toe, it may safely be pronounced, that it was utterly impossible to do more for the people than was then done; to have attempted more would have hazarded the accomplishment of the Revolution."—"When in a subsequent year, 1700, the Act of Settlement was brought forward, another opportunity was afforded for amending the constitution, and accordingly Mr. Harley, (afterwards Earl of Oxford) moved, that some conditions of government might be settled as preliminaries before they should proceed to the nomination of the person, that their security might be complete, yet how little was done at this auspicious moment! Was the supposed omission in the Bill of Rights supplied? By no means."

* It is remarkable, however, that the Duke of Monmouth, when he rose in 1685 against King James, professed his intention, amongst other things, "to have a parliament annually chosen and held, and not prorogued, dissolved, or discontinued within the year, before petitions be first answered and grievances redressed;" (See Declaration of James Duke of Monmouth, &c.) a strong proof this of the popular opinion in these matters at that period. The duke, it is true, does not say that the people were, by law, entitled to those parliaments; but certainly the stream of authorities sets directly in their favour, particularly by an individual, who, upon his own shewing, was utterly ignorant of the history and practice of the constitution. The veteran reformer (Major Cartwright), in consequence of being accused of "elaborate blunders," had published a letter to prove that Prynne was an advocate for annual parliaments; and, to establish that fact, he had cited the title of Prynne's book on Parliamentary Writs, Brevia Parliamentaria Rediviva, as signifying—'Short Parliaments Revived.'* (Loud laughter.)—He had no doubt that the hon. baronet believed that his scheme of universal suffrage was practicable, and that it would be for the advantage of the country; but, for his own part, he considered it to be no less absurd in theory, than it would be dangerous and fatal in practice.

Mr. W. Smith said, he was a decided enemy to the plan of reform proposed, but he vindicated the intentions of the radical reformers, whom he believed to be conscientious and honest men. He observed, that the reasoning of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning) would have precluded all reform, moral, religious, or political, and referred to the petition presented by Mr. Grey in 1792, as indisputably proving the necessity of a reform. He was glad that this subject had been again brought forward, because every new discussion was one more step to the attainment of reform; not, indeed, the reform proposed by the hon. baronet, but rational and discreet reform.

Sir Francis Burdett, in reply, complimented the right honourable gentleman (Mr. Canning) upon the openness and candour with which he had met the question. The right hon. gentleman had indeed been peculiarly unfortunate in referring, for historical illustration, to the early proceedings of the long parliament of Charles I., and seemed to have forgotten, that the arbitrary measures then adopted, were owing to the abandonment of the system which was now recommended. If parliaments had then been annual, the Long Parliament would never have existed, nor perhaps would any of the unhappy consequences have resulted, which the right hon. gentleman, equally with himself, deplored. However, the course taken by the right hon. gentleman was fair and open; he said that no evil existed, and of course no remedy was necessary: and the matter was at issue upon that ground, between the right hon. gentleman and the majority of the nation.—But however fair was the proceeding of the right hon. gentleman, the open and avowed enemy of reform, nothing could be more disingenuous and unfair, than the course pursued by the learned gentleman (Mr. Brougham), the professed friend of reform, whose eloquence might indeed be amusing, but was certainly very far from being convincing. His speech was a sort of salmagundi of sarcasm, panegyric, and verbosity, of exaggeration and misrepresentation, in which the words were more abundant than the ideas, the irony more conspicuous than the argument. It was a great mistake in the learned gentleman, to suppose that he (Sir F.) had ever been otherwise than a defender of the principle of the most extended suffrage. It was true, that he had proposed and defended a more limited suffrage than he now offered to the consideration of the house. Convinced as he was, that a principle unyielding and unbending, that would hear no reason, or take into account the feelings of others, became thereby impracticable, however correct in argument, he had always been willing, as he still was, to stop short of the utmost extent to which the principle might be carried, but he was no new convert to the truth of the principle itself. The learned gentleman had also taken great pains to misrepresent the inferences, which were drawn from the kings' speeches, which formed part of the resolutions then under consideration. He had been either so dull in apprehension, or so expert in misstatement, as to infer that the kings' speeches were employed as legal authorities; whereas nothing could be more plain, than that they were introduced as confessions of a supposed adverse party, not likely to make too great concessions to the principles maintained. The learned gentleman in disputing the sincerity of speeches from the throne, had represented the kings of England either as knaves or fools. If he made them out to be insincere, he would reflect discredit on the kings themselves, but not on the principles which they and their ministers thought it their interest to avow; and the learned gentleman ought to be aware, that it was the truth of the principles, and not the sincerity of the kings, which affected the present argument. The learned gentleman had also commented on the words "Nullus liber homo" in Magna Charta, and had contended, that because the word "liber" was there, the charter was of no avail in this question; and that to have been valuable in argument, the words ought to have been "nullus homo." In fact to us it was so: since at this time there were no villeins, and the learned gentleman would not venture to say, that any man was not "liber homo." Besides, the learned gentleman appeared to be entirely ignorant what the state of villenage was in this country. The villein was much and they might have been better suited to the state of the country at that time, than they would be at present.—This nobleman took up arms professedly in support of the religion and liberties of his country, and his cause and pretensions were nearly equal to those of the Prince of Orange; but his successless efforts were paid for by his life, and a sanguinary persecution of his adherents.

* This letter is addressed to Lord Holland, who is charged with being ignorant of the authors who treat of the constitution—such as Prynne. His Lordship, in his place in parliament, had before accused the writer of "elaborate blunders."

nearer to the state of "liber homo" than the learned gentleman seemed to imagine; he was intitled to the protection of law; he had his article in Magna Charta; and nothing could be more idle than to represent him to have been in the condition of a West Indian slave; the present copyholder was his successor; and between the property of a copyholder and that of a freeholder, there was little more than a technical difference. But, be this as it might, the learned gentleman would not contend, that at present there were any persons in the state of villenage; and therefore, if in ancient times every man, not a villein, was intitled to suffrage, it was not too much to say that every man now was. The learned gentleman in his new zeal for Whiggism had bestowed great praise upon the Revolution. He forgot, that all that was obtained at the Revolution was a declaration, which had proved altogether as inefficient as Magna Charta, and the subsequent act, for better securing the rights and liberties of the subject. The Act of Settlement had provided, that England should be engaged in no war for foreign dominions; that all business, properly cognizable in the Privy Council, should be transacted there, and that all resolutions taken thereupon, should be signed by the persons who consented to the same—that no foreigner should hold an office civil or military—and that no placeman or pensioner should have a seat in this house. In spite of all this, we were now loaded with hundreds of millions of debt, incurred in contending not only for the foreign dominions of the king, but for the dominions of foreign kings—the business which was cognizable, and ought to be transacted in the Privy Council, which the constitution had provided for the security of the subject, was carried on covertly and irresponsibly by a junto, in an unconstitutional new-fangled cabinet, made on the model first framed by the atrocious contrivers of the sanguinary scenes of St. Bartholomew's day in France—Germans had had the command of English districts—and the House of Commons was notoriously crowded with placemen and pensioners. In short, all the wholesome provisions which had been made for the protection of the people, had been violated, set at naught, and buried in the corruption of a House of Commons, neglecting the voice, and not regarding the interests of the people. — The learned gentleman, whilst he professed himself friendly to reform, had, at the same time, attempted to render ridiculous the ablest advocate which reform had ever found—the illustrious and unrivalled Bentham. It was in vain, however, for the learned gentleman to attempt, by stale jokes and misapplied sarcasm, to undervalue the efforts of a mind the most comprehensive, informed, accurate, acute, and philosophical, that had perhaps in any time or in any country been applied to the subject of legislation, and which, fortunately for mankind, had been brought to bear upon reform, the most important of all political subjects. The abilities of Bentham, the learned gentleman could not dispute—his disinterestedness he could not deny—his benevolence he could not but admire—and his unremitted labours he would do well to respect, and not to attempt to disparage. The conviction of such a mind, after mature investigation, overcoming preconceived prejudice, could not be represented as the result of wild and visionary speculation: and the zealous and honest adherents of the cause of reform might be well contented to rest the question on the foundations, broad and deep, upon which Bentham had placed it. The learned gentleman therefore, unless he found himself competent at least to attempt to answer the reasons of Bentham, ought, for his own sake, to be more cautious how he endeavoured to misrepresent those reasons, or to effect, by mis-statement, what he was unable to accomplish by argument. It was in vain to reason with the hon. gentleman who spoke last but one (Mr. Lamb,) as his imagination seemed to conjure up dangers as unsubstantial as those of children frightened at their own ideas of ghosts and hobgoblins; but as to the statement which the hon. gentleman had made, that parliaments had never been annually elected and held, it was altogether erroneous, it being a fact proved by writs, returns, and records, still extant, that parliaments were elected and held annually, or more frequently, from the 22d year of Edward I., to the time of the civil wars between the houses of York and Lancaster, with few exceptions, which might generally be accounted for from temporary circumstances. Notwithstanding occasional prorogations (which indeed were not denied, and did not affect the question) no parliament lasted so long as a year, till the 23d year of Henry VI.; it was not unusual to have two or three new parliaments in one and the same year, and there were instances of a still greater number; and, therefore, if the vote of this night depended on the fact of annual or more frequent parliaments having ever been the practice of the English government, he should rest perfectly satisfied, and be confident of obtaining the vote by that criterion. The hon. gentleman, whilst he arrogated to himself superior knowledge of history, had only shewn how little he was acquainted with it, and, whilst he betrayed his little acquaintance with a subject so material to the question, had attempted to undervalue the labours of his (Sir F.'s) worthy friend, Major Cartwright, because, forsooth, he had misconstrued three words of law Latin—a language which the worthy major, having been bred to the sea-service, never pretended to have learned; and which (whether he knew it or not) was quite immaterial to the question. In fact, however, this apparent disparagement was a compliment paid to the major by the hon. gentleman, who shewed his eagerness to cavil at a trifle, the major's arguments not being easily controverted, though his scholarship might be disputed. He was happy to find that the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning) was gratified by the question having been brought forward so distinctly as it was in the Resolutions now proposed. He trusted that it would prove equally gratifying to the people. At all events he had, to the utmost of his power, performed his duty to the country. That some change in the system of representation was necessary, was, he believed, pretty generally admitted; and he had no doubt that the impression would become still more extensive, and that the time would arrive, when all candid men, of all parties, would call for reform, although he could not hope to make a convert of the right hon. gentleman, who was too well satisfied with the state of things under which he flourished. Corruption in his eyes wore no deformity; he addressed her as a lover addressed his mistress, he saw no defects—what others thought blemishes, he considered as beauties: he seemed to say,

> "I read thee over with a lover's eye,
> Thou hast no faults, or I no fault can spy;
> Thou art all beauty, or all blindness I."

As to the danger to be apprehended from the exercise of what was called universal suffrage, he could see no foundation for it, unless it could be supposed that all the people would go mad when they became free; and would abuse their liberties, for the purpose of destroying their own happiness.

The question being put, "That the order of the day be now read," the house divided.

Ayes, 106—Noes, 0.

Sir F. Burdett and Lord Cochrane were appointed Tellers for the Noes.

Lord Cochrane presented a petition from Mr. William Cobbett, praying for annual parliaments and universal suffrage. It was of great length, and when the clerk had proceeded some way through it,

Mr. Fazakerley moved, that the house be counted, and as only 16 members were present, an adjournment immediately took place.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, June 3.

ROYAL ASSENT.] The royal assent was given by commission to the Lotteries Bill, the Privately Stealing (Ireland) Bill, the Parish Vestries Bill, the Grand Jury Presentments Bill, and the Rewards on Conviction Bill.

The Commissioners were, the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Montrose and Lord Redesdale.

PRIVATELY STEALING IN SHOPS BILL.] Lord Holland moved the second reading of this bill. The subject, he said, had been so much discussed, that it was unnecessary for him to urge any thing in support of the present measure. Many who had originally been adverse to it had altered their opinion.

The Lord Chancellor declared, that he had not changed his opinion. Had he been induced to alter it, he would say so; but as that was not the case, he must oppose the bill.

The question that the bill be now read a second time was then put and negatived.

MARRIAGE OF THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.] The Earl of Liverpool moved an Address of Congratulation to his royal highness the Prince Regent, on the marriage of his royal highness the Duke of Cambridge; also a Message of Congratulation to the Queen and to the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge.—These motions were severally agreed to.

PURCHASE OF GAME BILL.] On the third reading of this bill,

The Earl of Limerick said, he had a clause to propose, to which he could not suppose the slightest objection would be made, and least of all from the noble lords who had supported this measure, on the ground of its rendering the penalties of the law equally applicable to the rich and the poor. The clause which he meant to propose he would copy word for word from the act of the 5th of Queen Anne, and its effect would be, to make the buyer as well as the seller liable to three months' imprisonment for the first offence, and four months for the next.

The Earl of Carnarvon objected to the clause, because, if it were adopted, it would prevent the bill from passing in the present session.

The Earl of Liverpool thought, that the whole system of the game laws ought to be revised, and that it would be right to legalize both the purchase and the sale of game. The amendment was then negatived, and the bill was read a third time and passed.

PORTUGAL SLAVE TRADE TREATY BILL.] This bill was read a third time and passed.

ROCK SALT DUTIES BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

STATE OF THE PRISONS.] The Marquis of Lansdowne, in pursuance of the notice he had given, rose to call the attention of their lordships to the present state of the prisons of the United Kingdom. In calling the attention of the House to this subject, he should have occasion to refer their lordships to important facts stated in the report of the house of commons, a document containing statements which deserved the peculiar and serious consideration of their lordships. From the information contained in that report, it appeared that, in the course of ten years, such had been the progress of crimes, they had increased to three times their former amount. Whether their lordships were to consider this increase with respect to the number of persons charged with committing crimes, or the number convicted, the progress was most alarming within the period he had stated. The number of the former class had been doubled, and that of the latter had increased at least 180 per cent. In 1805, 1806, and 1807, the number of persons convicted amounted to 9,865. In 1815, 1816, and 1817, the number of that class was 19,736. This was a most appalling statement, and one which he was confident their lordships would agree with him could not be allowed to remain on record, without parliament or government instituting an inquiry into the means of applying a remedy to so dangerous an evil. The statement was of a nature which other governments might have thought right to conceal, but it was, happily, the policy of this country to submit to the world every thing connected with its situation. In consequence of this policy, evils soon became the subject of serious consideration, and remedies were applied before they became incurable. In the meantime, it was not to any remote speculation on the cause of this evil, that he meant to direct the attention of the house. Whether it were to the late war, and the poverty and distress which followed it—to the increase of population, as some asserted—to the paper-currency, as was maintained by others—or to all those causes combined, were questions which he should not then discuss. Whatever might be the remote cause of the progressive increase of crimes, the evil was one which could not be indifferent to their lordships, and to which it must be their desire to apply, as speedily as possible, a practical remedy. As to the more immediate causes, it appeared from the statement to which he had referred, that a very obvious one was to be found in the present state of the prisons, in which persons charged with all kinds and degrees of offences were indiscriminately huddled together. In some country prisons persons charged with robbery and every description of felony, with manslaughter, offences against the game laws, against the laws for protecting the woollen and cotton manufactures, profane swearing, breach of contract, assault, &c. were confined in such a manner, that they must necessarily communicate together. The great variety of offences to which he had referred, was in consequence of the state of society in a wealthy and highly civilized country, and that variety of offences had been provided against by a gradation of punishments. But the effect of this state of things was, that according to the present state of gaols a great multitude of persons, whose degrees of criminality were very different, must be confined in the same place, with all the facilities of a communication which could not fail to be attended with pernicious results. It appeared, from the information now before their lordships, that a population amounting to no less than 14,000 persons was annually consigned to these mansions, so unfit for the purpose to which they were destined. Out of that number, it was probable that not less than 13,000 were permitted to return to society, either by being acquitted, or after having undergone the sentence of imprisonment. In what a state of degradation must they under the present system return to the duties, or, he was afraid, rather to the vices of civilized men. Their lordships ought to remember the maxim "Parum est afficere improbos pœna, nisi et contineas probos disciplina." Some attempts had already been made with considerable success to obviate the evil which he had pointed out. Mr. Howard was the first who introduced a plan for the classification of prisoners according to their offences. A prison was built on his plan in Bedfordshire, and other counties soon followed the example, with more or less success. Still, however, the public prisons were in a most deplorable state. In calling the attention of their lordships to the situation of these places of confinement, it would be sufficient to refer them to the statements in some excellent works on the subject lately published, and, in particular, to the works of Mr. Neild and Mr. Buxton. In the former they would find an account of the prison of Bristol, which merited their consideration. But it was not merely to the state of the gaols in distant towns, or the provinces, that their lordships would see reason to direct their inquiries; they would learn that practices, which were the very reverse of what was calculated to promote reform, were continued in the gaols in and about the metropolis. He wished their lordships to read Mr. Buxton's description of the state of the Borough prison; a prison, whose jurisdiction, as he observed, extended over five parishes. "On entrance, you come to the male-felons' ward and yard, in which are both the tried and the untried—those in chains, and those without them—boys and men—persons for petty offences, and for the most atrocious felonies—for simple assault—for being disorderly—for small thefts—for issuing bad notes—for forgery, and for robbery. They were employed in some kind of gaming, and, they said, they had nothing else to do." After this commencement, it could not surprise their lordships to find the author concluding his account of the Borough Compter with this observation:—"The gaoler told me, that in an experience of nine years he had never known an instance of reformation; he thought the prisoners grew worse; and he was sure, if you took the first boy you met with in the streets and placed him in his prison, by the end of the month he would be as bad as the rest." This description, he was afraid, would answer but with too much truth to many other prisons of the metropolis. To the principal prison it was impossible, from the manner in which it was constantly crowded, to apply any general system of regulations. There it was necessary to place several felons in the same cell, and persons guilty of very different descriptions of offences were mixed together. The consequences were such as might be expected, notwithstanding all the efforts of that meritorious individual (Mrs. Fry) who had come like the genius of good into this scene of misery and vice, and had, by her wonderful influence and exertions, produced in a short time a most extraordinary reform among the most abandoned class of prisoners. After this great example of humanity and benevolence, he would leave it to their lordships to judge how much good persons similarly disposed might effect in other prisons, were the mechanism, if he might use the expression, of those places of confinement better adapted to the purposes of reformation. The institution of the Penitentiary-house was likely to be attended with great advantages, though he did not approve of all the regulations. That establishment was a great step taken in the important work of reformation. He was aware there were persons who considered all attempts of this kind as useless; who thought that all that could be done was, to provide for the safe custody of prisoners, and that attempts to reform them were hopeless. Let those who entertained this notion go and see what had been effected by Mrs. Fry, and other benevolent persons, in Newgate. The scenes which passed there would induce them to alter their opinion. There were moments when the hardest hearts could be softened, and disposed to reform. A most profound observer of human nature had made one of his characters say, "I am so steeped in guilt, the smallest wind can shake me:" and these were the moments which could be advantageously seized. The evil effects of the state of this prison were made manifest by the fact, that 40 per cent. of the persons discharged from it returned to it; whereas, the returns to gaols conducted on other principles, and with better accommodation for classifying the prisoners, did not exceed 5 per cent. If, by management and regulation, this difference between 5 and 40 per cent. could in any degree be diminished, such an object would be most desirable. In another session he hoped their lordships would meet the question manfully. If in one system they saw only a nursery for crimes, where the juvenile offender was exposed to temptations, which, because they required ingenuity and boldness, were not the less attractive to youthful minds—while, in another, they saw the example of offenders, corrected and returned with improved characters to society, could they hesitate to choose between them? With a view to promote the application of an effectual remedy to this great malady, he would propose an address to the crown. It had been his wish to obtain the facts most desirable to be known, in a tabular form, but it was not usual to state such an object in an address. He was, however, convinced that the noble secretary of state in whose department it would fall to give orders for making the returns, would not fail to direct the information to be drawn up in the most convenient form for their lordships. He concluded with moving an address to the Prince Regent, to request that his royal highness would be pleased to order to be laid before their lordships, early in the next session, an account of the state of all gaols, houses of correction, and penitentiary houses in the United Kingdom, with an account of the number of prisoners confined therein, during the year 1818, their ages, the number and mode of their classification, their allowance of food and clothing; also an account of all the regulations which had been deviated from, with the reason and occasion of such deviation.

Lord Sidmouth agreed with the noble marquis that he could not propose a subject of greater importance for the consideration of the House, and it had been his intention, in the interval between the close and meeting of Parliament, to make inquiries to the same effect, if the noble marquis had not brought forward the present motion. He was sorry that the noble marquis's statement respecting the increase of crime was but too true. What were the causes of this increase it was not easy to point out with accuracy; but there had lately been some peculiar circumstances which might in some manner account for it. The return from a state of war to a state of peace had occasioned the discharge of a number of individuals, who were for a time destitute of employment, and, on such occasions, there had always been an increase of crime. At the end of the year which succeeded the close of the war before the last, the increase of crimes had been nearly double; but, four years afterwards, the amount was not greater than it had been during the four preceding years. At the close of the last war, there had been a greater discharge of seamen and soldiers than had ever been known at any former period; and, at the same time, he must remark, that the terror of punishment had been very considerably diminished. He must contend that the dread of punishment, by imprisonment especially, was almost done away by the very philanthropy that was endeavouring to render prisons rather places of accommodation than punishment. It was notorious also, that the dread of transportation had almost entirely subsided, and, perhaps, had been succeeded by a desire to emigrate to New South Wales. Indeed, the situation of the convicts there was very different from what it used to be. Formerly, they were placed on their arrival in a state of almost absolute slavery, but now the case was very much altered. As to the state of the prisons themselves, it could not be denied that many of them, while there was such a neglect of labour as at present, were only schools for depravity and crime. Under these circumstances, there were other features, in the returns that had been made, which must make a strong impression on their lordships. While the number of crimes and commitments had very considerably increased, the number of capital punishments had diminished: within the first seven of the last 30 years nearly one-half of the numbers condemned usually suffered death; while in the 7 years from 1798, of 83 who were condemned, only 14 suffered death; and, in the latest period of the returns, it appeared, that not more than 1-8th of those who were condemned were left for execution. The chance of escape must add to the temptation to commit crime. He mentioned the circumstance, because it had been said, that the execution of the laws in this country was a system of sanguinary vengeance; at least this language had been held in a publication which, on many other accounts, he held in high estimation. When we saw, however, that these were the effects of the fear of punishment being diminished, it became necessary either to render punishments so certain and effectual as to produce a wholesome fear of their infliction, or to prevent the increase of crime by improving the system of managing our prisons; by classifying, educating, and employing the prisoners, so as to prevent the necessity of executing the laws in their utmost rigour. He thanked the noble marquis for bringing this subject under the notice of the house. He had no doubt that when the returns were made, their lordships would esteem it their duty to recommend the appointment of a committee, who should consider those returns, examine the subject in detail, and make a report to the house. On that report being laid on their table, he had no doubt that the system would be improved, and he cordially concurred in the motion that had been made.

The motion was then agreed to nem. diss. and their lordships adjourned till Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, June 3.

ALIEN BILL.] This bill was brought from the House of Lords with amendments, which were ordered to be printed, and to be considered on Friday.

PUBLIC BREWERIES.] Mr. Lockhart brought up the report of the committee on Public Breweries, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

SLAVES IN ST. CHRISTOPHER'S.] Sir S. Romilly rose to move for "a copy of the depositions taken before the coroner's inquest which sat upon the body of a slave belonging to Hutchinson's estate, in the island of St. Christopher, of the name of Congo Jack." The facts of the case, he said, were simply these. Congo Jack deserted from an estate, of which the rev. William Henry Rawlins was manager, and of which his brother, Mr. Henry Rawlins, resident at Nevis, was proprietor. The slave deserted on the Tuesday, and, being retaken on Wednesday, was immediately flogged, with a long cart-whip, by order of the manager. After being so flogged, he was chained to another slave, who had been also flogged. Upon the next day both were ordered out to work in their chains; but Congo Jack was unable to work, and he was then severely flogged by two drivers, until he actually died. On the same night he was buried. The affair, however, got abroad, and some time afterwards the body was taken up and submitted to a coroner's inquest. Several marks of violence were visible; two of the teeth were found to have been broken. Witnesses were adduced to prove the two floggings and sudden death, but the verdict of the jury was, "died by the visitation of God." One of the drivers was afterwards tried for the murder, and Creole Jack, who was chained to the deceased when he died, was adduced to swear that the manager was not present when the last punishment had been inflicted. Yet this slave afterwards contradicted himself, and being also contradicted by others, who proved the orders for flogging to have been issued by the manager, the prisoner was acquitted. Rawlins himself was then brought to trial for murder, and notwithstanding the clearest evidence, the jury found him guilty of manslaughter only. He prayed the benefit of the statute, and was sentenced to three months imprisonment in the common gaol, and to pay a fine of 200*l.* current money. Now, if the evidence were true, Rawlins must have been guilty of murder; if it were false, he ought to have been acquitted. Earl Bathurst had written to Governor Probyn on the subject, who had sent home the evidence on the two trials for murder, but had not transmitted the evidence before the coroner, and, therefore, the house ought to pursue the inquiry in the manner which justice demanded. This was not a loose and exaggerated charge against the treatment of slaves, or the administration of justice in the West Indies, but a case which deserved to be thoroughly investigated.

Mr. Marryat said, he was free to admit that there was enough in this case to entitle it to inquiry, and he could certainly have no objection to the motion.

Mr. A. Grant stated, that the circumstances of this case had excited the most marked disapprobation on the spot; and that if the charge of murder could have been brought home to Rawlins, he would have received no mercy. Even his relatives had, since the affair, ceased to speak to him, and representations had been sent to the bishop of London, for the purpose of having him deprived of his gown. As to the cart-whip, it might be used in the smaller islands, but he had never heard of it in Jamaica.

Mr. W. Smith said, that the "cart-whip" was a common expression in all accounts of severity received from the West Indies. He could produce one of those instruments, which had been actually used, and which, if exhibited, could not fail to move the feelings of that house in the highest degree. If every act of atrocity and injustice, of which authentic information was received through private channels, were to be exposed, many who held their heads very high in the colonies, would be driven to hide them, like Rawlins and Huggins, from the infamy and execration which would attach to their names.

Mr. Wilberforce observed, that a case, of a most atrocious description, would, on a future occasion, probably engage the attention of the house, where a female slave, in a state of pregnancy, suffered punishment until she expired. One moral consequence would be derived from these investigations; it would teach those who were delegated to administer justice in those distant colonies, that the British House of Commons would not be discouraged from inquiring into any cases, although some might be exaggerated, or wholly erroneous; it would teach them that inquiry, however it might terminate, was the only sure and effectual means of protecting all persons in the administration of justice. Negroes were now under the protection of law, and consequently were entitled, as much as any subject of this realm, to the notice and attention of that house. (Hear, hear.)

The motion was then put and carried.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR.] Mr. Brougham appeared at the bar, with the Report of the Select Committee on the Education of the Poor. It was brought up, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Mr. Brougham then rose and said, that since he had given notice of a motion to call the attention of the house to the abuses in the administration of charitable donations, certain material changes had taken place elsewhere, which had restored the bill which that house had passed to something like its original vigour and efficacy. In the first proceedings on this measure in another place, it had been reduced to a mere nullity, its essence had been changed, and it had become a mere powerless instrument, in the hands of unknown persons, prohibiting all inquiry. He then considered it as a mere mockery, instead of promoting those objects which its authors, and the house which adopted it, had in view. He was exceedingly happy to find that, in its final state, the most exceptionable amendments had been omitted, and that it had, in some degree, been restored to its pristine vigour. It was yet very far from being that wholesome measure which had been sent up to the other house; but still, when he considered the late period of the session, and more particularly when he recollected the powers which the house of commons yet possessed, he, for one, was disposed to recommend it to the adoption of the house. In the place to which he had alluded, the objects of the bill had been limited to an inquiry into the abuses of education. On what ground that amendment had been made, he was wholly at a loss to ascertain. The object of the bill (and it seemed a very natural measure) was to enable the commissioners to prosecute inquiries into abuses of all charities whatever; but those persons, enjoying a superior degree of rank, and possessing, no doubt, pre-eminent abilities; persons, who saw from a higher eminence, and, of course, were delighted with a more comprehensive view of human affairs, said, that the commissioners should only inquire into the abuses of education, although the witnesses were enabled to give evidence as to other charities, and to bring other abuses before the notice of parliament. (Hear, hear, hear.) The documents were the same, the abuses were equally criminal; nay, in many cases the very same deed which furnished evidence of the one, contained also evidence of the other; but those superior intelligences, to which he had alluded, thought proper to decide otherwise, and at this period of the session, from their judgment there was no appeal. The first object of the bill—a bill which all classes of society had hailed with the utmost gratitude and satisfaction (hear)—was to enable certain commissioners to inquire into the state of the education of the poor generally. "Oh, no!" said their lordships, "no such thing; confine your inquiry into one class only; don't presume to go any farther." (Hear.) This was the opinion and decision of those most able legislators; and when he saw that the consequence was nothing more than this—that a second commission, and (for it must come to that) a third commission must be appointed, (for, of course, as those great personages would not choose to embrace all the objects at once, a third commission must be issued), he could not sufficiently express his surprise, though he felt the necessity of submitting to the result. This extraordinary conduct, this narrow, and illiberal, and imperfect view of the measure, reminded him of the fable of a man, who being seized in fee of two cats, one of a larger size than the other, and wanting to make a communication between them on his premises, ordered that a large hole should be made in one place, and a small hole in another; and, certainly, the two cats passed through the two holes very conveniently, although they might have passed through one hole with much less trouble and expense to the owner. (Loud laughter.) Some persons, however, proceeding in this manner, had not only altered and abridged the powers conferred by this bill, but had entirely defeated them. The commissioners might now call the trustees of charities for education before them, but they had no power to compel the attendance of any one person, or to demand the production of any one document. (Cries of hear! on both sides of the house.) He was much surprised at this, when he recollected that some of the same authorities had passed Lord St. Vincent's bill, for inquiring into certain abuses, with the most ample powers of commitment. Those powers were given to them over all mankind; and he also recollected, that, in the Irish commission respecting education, there was a power of imposing fines to the amount of 20*l.* He should have imagined, that at least similar power would have been granted under the present bill. But as it stood then, neither the power of imprisoning, or of inflicting a fine, was allowed the commissioners. The extent of their authority was to go to different parts of the country, and call for volunteer evidence. (Hear.) He thought from what had been experienced, and even by the committee of that house, that he could throw a little light on the nature of this volunteer evidence; and on the manner in which the invitation of these commissioners would in most cases be met. That experience would prove how little likely an inquiry so restricted was to be effectual. The committee always found, that wherever their attention was directed, was it to a college, a school, or an hospital, the parties called before them uniformly commenced with expressing the greatest deference for the character of that house—their anxious desire to aid the endeavours of the committee; and, indeed, their sincere thankfulness to parliament for having directed its attention to such inquiries. These were uniformly the sentiments with which these persons set out, no doubt with an equal claim to sincerity, as was possessed by the West India proprietors in the progress of another great question, but certainly not more important than the present one, the abolition of the slave trade, when they expressed their heartfelt desire for investigation. But, like other objects of anxious desire, no sooner was this qualification possessed, than satiety was felt, and its appetite began to pall; and, accordingly, when the second or third question was put to them, all the affection for the beloved object was forgotten—the anxiety to afford information altogether disappeared. It was so in the case of the Winchester School. "Produce," said the committee, "your balance sheet of last year, and a copy of your statutes." —"No;" was the answer, "we beg leave to put in a declaration that we have taken an oath not to divulge our statutes."—So that just as the parties were almost in possession of the very object which they professed to hold so dear, they declared themselves precluded by an oath from divulging their secrets. (Hear, hear.) The committee expressed a desire to be acquainted with the terms in which the oath was worded, and it appeared that it was to the effect that none of their statutes should be divulged, except for useful purposes, of which utility the fellows themselves were to be the judges. It appeared also that those statutes were produceable in a court of law, and the result was, that the committee obtained a view of them. Similar would be the obstructions with which these restricted commissioners would have to contend in their endeavours to elicit information from their volunteer evidence. To what, then, had the house to look, as a security for having their object carried into operation? They had it in themselves, even where the difficulty hitched; and seeing as they did, that the original measure was so mangled—that all the powers of the commissioners had been altered, that as the bill now stood, every thing was left to the good will of those who had an interest at variance with the spirit of the inquiry—he had the fullest confidence that the powers which the house possessed would be exercised. (Hear, hear.) To that security he looked as his only hope. The commissioners had only to proceed, and call upon witnesses to attend. They should report occasionally to that house, and make returns of the names of all persons refusing to give the information required, or to produce the documents demanded, without alleging any just cause for such refusal. And as that house would, on its next meeting, re-appoint its committee, it would be enabled to supply the deficiency which the alteration in the present bill occasioned, by empowering that committee to call those persons before them. (Hear, hear.) By these means, notwithstanding all the attempts and the subtilty of others, the house would be enabled to restore sufficient virtue and energy to this measure, and to make it something like what it was in its pristine state. (Loud cheering.)—He now came to another head of the subject. It was not alone to fundamental alterations that the changes which had been made in the bill were limited; they affected even the division which the house of commons had made of the commissioners. The bill had originally appointed eight commissioners, making four boards, each as a check—a rival to the other. This principle was retained at present, but the mode of its operation was altered. The superior nature of the minds, who laughing to scorn the rashness of the original projectors, had perfected, by their grave deliberations, the present model of legislation, thought that the figure 3 was a better divisor of 8 than 2, and afforded a larger quotient of boards (hear, hear, hear.) Now, as the crude scheme of the house of commons was framed, there were 4 boards of 2 each, calculated to proceed in their labours with expedition and emulation. As the bill stood originally amended, as was the phrase, there were 2 boards of 3 each, with 2 useless members over. So much for the arithmetic of those elevated legislators, who scouted the original bill in its rash and imperfect state.—But that was not all:—very far from it. In the original bill the two universities and four great public schools were excepted. When the bill was first discussed, one member rose and moved to except Rugby; another proposed to except Shrewsbury; another Norwich; and, in fact, every member rose to propose an exemption for the school that was situated in the district which he represented. This would have rendered the measure perfectly nugatory, and it being so felt by the house, they rejected all those propositions. In order, however, to give them a salutary reprimand, the upper house had inserted, by way of exemption, not only Harrow and Rugby, but "all charities that have special visitors." (Hear, hear, on both sides.) Now, he would candidly ask the house, whether any abuses could be found in the whole circle of charities equal to those that existed where special visitors had been appointed? (Hear, hear, hear.) The visitor, in many cases, lived at a great distance: he was often an interested party: he was, perhaps, the patron of the school (hear, hear, hear,) he was the heir at law, or the kinsman of the founder: he thought it more convenient to pocket the funds than to apply them to charitable purposes; and, consequently, he did not visit his own sins very heavily on his own head. (Hear.) It had been found above stairs, that the greatest abuses had been committed in those charities of which there were special visitors. Many of them had made no inquiries for more than twenty years; and, until the abuse was found to be most rank and ripe, they never once thought of putting the visitatorial power into execution. Here then, again, was an example of the vigour, the wisdom, and the enlarged and disinterested view that was taken of this subject in another place. (Hear, hear.) But let not the house be disappointed in this way. Let them rely on the appointment of another committee next year. (Hear, hear.) Let that committee report all refusals to appear, or to answer to questions: let them report all demurrers and exceptions in limine, and then the house would turn their attention anew to the subject: they would break through the obstacle which was now opposed to them, and enter upon the visitatorial functions themselves. (Loud cheering.) One objection which had been made to the present bill was, that it gave no hint of any other measure by which it was to be followed. He had heard various objections made to many bills. One objection that he himself had to the present bill, as it came from the other house, was, that it had no penalty clause; another, that it had too many exempting clauses; but who had ever before heard it objected to a bill that it contained no hinting clause—no clause stating what was to come after it (hear!)? Who had ever before heard it objected to a bill that it was one measure and not twenty? The objection was, that the bill was a whole and rounded measure (a description that he was sure would not apply to some of the bills that originated in the place in which that objection was made), that it was confined to actual enactment, and did not contemplate any prospective proceeding; that it had no view to any thing that was to come at the end; that it did not contain an appendix to the reader, telling him what work was to come next. Was it not enough that the bill had suffered in itself, that it had been laughed at and torn to tatters, but it was first to be tortured, and then destroyed, if it did not contain what was to come next in the course of legislation in the ensuing session? The novelty of this objection was such, that he really did not know how to deal with it, and should, therefore, make no farther remark upon it. Of this he was satisfied, that notwithstanding all that had been done to diminish the efficiency of the measure, the knowledge that such an inquiry was going on, and that a half yearly report of its progress was to be made to the house of commons, would do great good in checking abuses, and in holding out a warning to those who were implicated in them, even though the doors of parliament should be shut against any farther proceeding. Many of the objections that had been raised against the bill, were grounded on the confidence which some persons reposed in courts of equity, as affording the means of correcting abuses. He confessed that he himself had not much reliance on courts of equity in that respect, especially with reference to expedition and cheapness. He would allow them all credit for learning without stint, and for copiousness of argument. But in point of speed and cheapness, and of attention to the comfort of the suitor, these were properties which he was not so willing to allow them. If he had had any doubt of the effects of applying to those courts in cases of this description, the evidence that had been produced to the committee two days ago would have furnished satisfactory proof of them; for a more touching scene than was then exhibited, perhaps, had never been before witnessed.—(Here the hon. and learned member detailed the evidence given by the churchwardens of the parish of Yeovil, in Somersetshire. See the note, p. 1715.) Sir G. Paul, a man of the most estimable character, who had devoted a long and useful life to the advancement of all that was calculated to benefit the poor, had, on the discovery of an abuse in a charity of 50*l.* or 60*l.* per annum, betaken himself to the same cheap and expeditious remedy. The house had already heard the general result of such steps, he would now shew them a little of the mechanism by which a man's health and happiness and fortune were ruined. In the month of December, the cause was put in the paper to be heard, but was ordered to stand over—a phrase very well understood in the court of Chancery. (A laugh.) Again it was put in the paper, and again it was ordered to stand over for three days. On the 21st, it was called on, but the court made up its mind that it would not make up its mind. On the 9th of April, when a decree was to be pronounced, the court with its usual promptitude determined that it would not determine. The cause was then postponed till the 13th of May, when the court expressed its opinion that a certain lease was void, but reserved its judgment on other points. To elucidate those points the court took home the papers, and no more was heard of the cause for many months. This was a kind of respite from proceeding which relieved the parties from farther expense for the time. The counsel both for the plaintiff and for the defendant then applied for judgment; but it was postponed till the 20th of January, on which day it was not pronounced. Two days afterwards the same occurrence took place. It was then decided that it should not be decided until another day, on which other day it was again decided that it should not be decided until another day, on which other day the court postponed its judgment till the 29th, mistaking the month, perhaps, for February, in which there was no 29th. (Hear, hear.) On the 25th of February, the case was mentioned to the court. This word "mentioned" was a light and airy word in that house, but in the Court of Chancery it was attended with fees to counsel; fees to agents, fees to short-hand writers—in short, a "mention" was not the most unexpensive and agreeable proceeding that could befal a suitor. Some days after, the court acknowledged that it had mislaid the papers which so many months before it had taken home to peruse, and desired that a brief (attended with considerable expense) might be left with the court. On the 17th of March, the cause was again called on, and at length it was—not decided, for decided it was not up to the present moment—but it was referred to the Master. (Hear, hear.) The history of this suit proved that the expense of proceeding in a court of equity was much greater than could be incurred under a commission—that, in fact, it often absorbed the entire funds of a charity. The cause was sent out of one expensive court into another expensive court—out of the Court of Chancery into the Master's office. Not to the present moment had a day been appointed for judgment. It would have to run the gauntlet of all the proceedings in the office; exceptions would then be taken to the report; those exceptions would be most ably, and learnedly, and elaborately argued by counsel, but, he apprehended, not so concisely and cheaply as they would be by the commissioners. It would then be sent back to the Master for revision, &c. &c.

"And find no end, in wand'ring mazes lost."

The conclusion from all this, in his mind, was, that the Court of Chancery might be excellent for many purposes, but that to those who applied to it for redress it was ruinous. It might be an ornament to the state, but it destroyed those who were so unfortunate as to have any thing to do with it. And here he begged to guard himself against being misunderstood. He unequivocally disavowed the intention of throwing the slightest imputation on the integrity, on the talents, or on the incomparable and unprecedented learning of the noble and learned lord at the head of the Court of Chancery. He sincerely believed, that from the day when English law and equity were separated to the present time, there never had been any individual in that situation more anxious to do justice to all parties. He believed he might say with equal confidence, that that noble and learned lord's unrivalled sagacity and subtlety were unanimously acknowledged by the whole profession, and that he was by far the greatest lawyer that had for ages appeared in any of our courts. This was not merely the expression of his own unfeigned reverence and admiration of the great qualities by which that noble and learned lord was distinguished—he knew that he spoke the sentiments of the whole profession from one end of Westminster Hall to the other. He must add, that a more kindly disposed judge to all the professional men who practised in his court never, perhaps, existed. But notwithstanding all these good qualities on the part of the noble lord, it was his duty to say, that there was something in the Court of Chancery that set at defiance all calculations of cost and time; and rendered the celebrated irony of Swift, when he made Gulliver inform his master Hynynhmn, that his father had been wholly ruined by the misfortune of having gained a chancery suit, with full costs, not only not an exaggeration, but a strictly correct description of the fact. Having dwelt at such length on this part of the subject, he should compress what he had to say in as few words as possible. He was convinced that the time was at hand when the unanimous sense of the country would be declared on this subject, and when the most anxious wish would be generally expressed for a full, unsparing, and honest investigation of those notorious and shocking abuses. It belonged to that house, and to that house alone, to confer such a benefit on the community. If they sat supinely, and sent out commissioners without taking effective steps to render the labours of those commissioners effective, their proceedings would be a mockery, and not a real advantage. The commissioners might traverse the country, they might hold their sittings, they might shew a good will in the cause, they might invite persons to attend, they might frame questions to be put to those persons, they might expect answers, but they would solicit them in vain unless they were backed by the house, unless it were universally known, and that night recognized, that the house was resolved to do its duty. (Hear, hear, hear.) Unless it did this, it would occasion the utmost irritation, inflammation and exasperation in every parish from one end of the country to the other. The eyes of all were opened; they were steadily fixed on the object, and, in proportion to its magnitude and importance was the intensity of the interest excited. There was no part of the country so remote; there was no district so trifling in wealth or number of inhabitants, there was no sphere so circumscribed as not to comprehend within it some bequest for charitable purposes. Every where a local, as well as a general feeling, was most strongly entertained. Both from the poor, who were immediately interested, and from the rich, who, if the poor were deprived of their right, would be compelled to maintain them, the cry was gone forth, and they all looked to that house for the means of redressing the evil. It was the duty, and he trusted it would be the pleasure of that house to answer the call, and to institute the required investigation. There was but one way of doing so—it was by resolving to re-appoint the committee in the next session of parliament—to constitute it of the same individuals—to confer on it the same powers as at present. Let that measure be adopted, and he cared not for the mutilations which the bill had suffered elsewhere. The committee would supply all the deficiencies which those mutilations might be found to occasion.—"I cannot sit down," concluded Mr. Brougham, "without once more adverting to a most interesting topic, to which I called the notice of the house when last I had the honour of addressing them. Every day has disclosed to the committee new marks of the piety and benevolence of our ancestors. What I wish you to do is, only to turn with grateful attention to those memorials of the good actions and excellent feelings of the wise and great, and to endeavour to prevent them from being defaced. While we are raising monuments to commemorate our victories, and are anxious to record the names of our brave defenders by sea and land, let us not forget that we have another most sacred duty to perform—namely, to protect from the operation of time, and from the injuries of interested malversation, those monuments of piety and beneficence which constitute the genuine glory of our ancestors. Those monuments celebrate triumphs of far more importance to humanity—triumphs which caused no sorrow, and shed no blood, in their achievement—the triumphs of virtue over ignorance, the worst enemy of the human species, and vice, her detestable progeny. By doing this, we shall render a greater service to the public, we shall contribute more to raise the name and fame of this country than by all other acts, in perpetuation of triumphs, which a grateful nation could perform. Whatever may be attempted to impede the attainment of this desirable object, I trust that, in the next session, we shall so vigilantly protect the commissioners in the execution of their duty, as to prove to all persons, that any efforts to frustrate the views of this house, and to defeat the hopes of the country, are vain. I trust, that all who have hitherto obstructed, or who may yet endeavour to thwart our views, whether from an interested fear, lest their own malversations should be detected, or from a base fellow-feeling for the malversations of others, or from a silly and groundless timidity—that all who, on whatever grounds, hold out a protecting hand to corruption, from the hereditary or mitred patron of abuse, down to the meanest speculator in it, may learn that the time is gone by when the poor could be robbed with impunity." (Loud cheering.) The hon. and learned gentleman then moved—"That an humble address be presented to his royal highness the Prince Regent, praying that he would be graciously pleased to issue a commission to inquire into the state of education of the poor throughout England and Wales, and to report from time to time to his royal highness, and to this house thereupon."

Lord Castlereagh said, that he went along with the hon. and learned gentleman in thinking that the subject was one of those to which, now that the blessings of peace had been happily restored, parliament ought to turn its attention. He was disposed also to admit, that the inquiry was calculated not only to remedy the abuses in question, but to excite additional interest for those charities, respecting which it was instituted, and to call back the attention of the persons connected with them to their proper objects. But if the hon. and learned gentleman looked at the nature of the bill, he could not be surprised, that a measure sent to the other house, so little resembling in scope and character the inquiry out of which it was supposed to have grown, should have there met with difficulties which appeared insurmountable. The committee had been appointed to inquire, not into the charitable institutions of the country, but into the education of the lower orders; and although their reports related to objects beyond that which they were appointed to investigate, the hon. and learned gentleman extended the enactments of his bill beyond even that report, and introduced a provision to authorize the appointment of a commission to continue the inquiry. He could not conceive any hope more illusory than that held out by the hon. and learned gentleman, that the commission would be enabled to execute its task in a short time, or without occasioning those evils, the existence of which in the Court of Chancery the hon. and learned gentleman had described with so much exaggeration. Could that house stand the criterion which the hon. and learned gentleman had applied to the Court of Chancery? Were the Order book taken, and the various delays which the pressure of business might occasion in any particular motion to be noticed, it might, by such a partial view of the subject, be frequently alleged, that the House of Commons postponed for months very wise and important measures. To agree to the address proposed would be to deprive the other house of parliament of the fair exercise of its functions. The hon. and learned gentleman contemplated the probability of a renewal, next session, of the committee. In that event, were the present motion carried, there would be two commissions—the one legislative, the other royal, and a committee of the House of Commons, all inquiring into the same subject. The best course, in his opinion, would be, to let the commissioners proceed with those powers, which, though not so great as the hon. and learned gentleman wished, and intended to make them, were yet very great. At an early period of the next session, the house would receive some report from that commission, which would enable them to judge of its efficiency. A farther range to their operations might then be proposed if it were deemed advisable. Nothing, in his opinion, could be a more imprudent course for the house to pursue, than that which had been recommended by the hon. and learned gentleman, who had called on them to do that by address to the crown, to which the other branch of the legislature had refused to give its sanction as a legislative measure. He considered this attempt calculated to produce such a collision between the two houses, as must detract from the respectability of the proceedings of parliament. Really, when he looked into the extent of the hon. and learned gentleman's bill, as it was sent up to the other house, he was not surprised that the Lords should not be prepared at once to assent to the whole of it. There were eleven thousand parishes in England and Wales, and there could not be less than between forty and fifty thousand Charitable Institutions included in the bill as it originally stood. He thought that in the bill, as it was modified, there was sufficient to occupy the commissioners till another session.—On these grounds he submitted to the house, that a case was not made out, either from necessity or prudence, to justify them in doing that by themselves, by address to the crown, which could not be obtained this session in the shape of a legislative measure. The speech of the hon. and learned gentleman to-night, had disclosed sentiments with regard to the Court of Chancery, which were calculated to degrade it in the eyes of the country; but he trusted that the hon. and learned gentleman opposite (Sir S. Romilly), whose abilities were so well known and appreciated in that court, would resent the attack, and that he would inform the house, whether abuses of charitable trusts could not be effectually redressed by a court of equity.—The noble lord concluded with moving the previous question.

Sir Samuel Romilly said, that having been so directly called on by the noble lord to state his opinion as to the chance there was of obtaining any remedy in cases of abuse of charitable trusts through the Court of Chancery, he felt he should be acting improperly towards the house, if he did not answer that call. He most sincerely thought that, in such a case, the remedy which the Court of Chancery was capable of affording was not an adequate remedy, and that it was impossible, through that court, to obtain redress for the abuses of charitable institutions. (Hear, hear, hear.) There were expedients of delay peculiar to that court, which, if resorted to, as they naturally would be in such a case, would throw such obstacles in the way of obtaining redress as few would be disposed to encounter. And when he considered that an information in the Court of Chancery would be filed by some stranger, who had not, like a suitor in Chancery, an interest in the result of the decision, it could not be expected that such a person would be disposed to put himself to the great expense which this would occasion, for the public benefit. The delay might occasion him to lie out of a great expense for a number of years. If a person hearing of any abuse, should think of having an information filed, he must make up his mind to disburse a considerable sum, with the chance of recovering, if he gained the suit after a great number of years, strictly taxed costs. (Hear, hear.) It would be difficult to find a man so public-spirited as to advance a large sum of money to carry on a cause in which he had no personal interest, imputing gross misconduct to a neighbour, with a chance of recovering part of his expenses after so great a lapse of time. Two years ago a bill had been introduced by an hon. gentleman, to which he proposed an amendment, which afterwards became a separate bill, providing that all stamp duties should be dispensed with, in cases of this description, which would consequently have been a great saving of expense; but it had been decided by the Court of Chancery, that this provision did not extend to actions against persons who had got lands of charities into their possession. With respect to the proceedings in the Court of Chancery, there was no man who practised in that court who must not be convinced, that very great expedients of delay might be resorted to in it, which ought not to exist in any court. His hon. and learned friend had conceived those expedients of delay to belong necessarily to a court of equity; but it was his opinion, that a great part of the abuses in the Court of Chancery might be remedied, (hear, hear, hear,) and might be remedied without any legislative interference. (Hear, hear, hear.) He considered himself at present as giving evidence with respect to the Court of Chancery; and he had no hesitation in saying, that if gentlemen went to vote with an idea that a remedy for abuses of charities might be found in that court, they would be voting under an erroneous impression.

Mr. Bathurst believed, that the mixing of other charitable intitutions with those for education, had not occurred to the hon. and learned gentleman himself till a late stage of the measure.

Mr. Brougham said, he had stated to the house when he first brought in the bill, that he had so drawn it up that this addition might easily be made if the house thought fit, though the committee could not include other charities in it, as they had not been instructed to do so.

Mr. Bathurst proceeded to observe, that the great question was, what were the funds for the education of the poor? Till that were ascertained, they could have no knowledge of what supplementary measures might be necessary for rendering the education of the poor more complete, and the commission would enable them to ascertain that. As to the power of committal, it had been thought that it might have the effect of deterring persons from entering on the discharge of a laborious and honourable duty, if they conceived that they were liable to be committed to Bridewell, if they did not give such an answer to any question put to them respecting a trust, as might happen to please two commissioners. With respect to the inquiry into the general manner in which the poor were educated—whether, for instance, Bell's or Lancaster's were the better mode—that was a wide field of inquiry, and quite of a different nature from what was originally understood to be proposed. Undoubtedly he did not see any objection to such an inquiry; but when the question was, whether they should take it into their own hands or wait till another session, when the concurrence of the other branch of the legislature might, perhaps, be obtained, he thought the latter course ought to be pursued.

Colonel Ellison hoped that parliament would shew that they were an effective parliament. He could not permit his countrymen to be deceived by specious arguments. The house stood on this question between the dead and the living. Charitable and patriotic persons had bequeathed money for the relief of old age, as well as for the education of youth. Would the house, for frivolous and scarcely intelligible reasons, allow such benevolent and useful charities to be misapplied? Was he addressing a British senate or not? He had sat in that house for twenty years, and he had never heard such a monstrous proposition as that it would be improper to inquire into the abuses of all charities. He had heard allusions made to good men who were trustees, but good men might not, perhaps, have done their duty, or the trustees might not, perhaps, be good men. He certainly should vote against the previous question, and against passing the bill in the disgraceful state in which it had been returned to them.

Mr. Abercromby said, the question was, whether, when commissioners were appointed, it would not be a saving both of time and money, if instructions should be given to them when they inquired into the funds for the education of the poor, to inquire at the same time into the general state of the education of the poor. With respect to the proposition, of extending the inquiry to all charities, nobody in the house could doubt that it would be very advantageous to unite this inquiry with the other; indeed, it was scarcely possible to separate them, as charities for education were often closely connected with charities for other purposes. It was said, that to agree to the motion would be to entangle the house in a dispute with the other house; but he could not anticipate any such result from it. He thought such a result was much rather to be expected from the course proposed by the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Bathurst), namely, to go next year and call on them to concur in a measure which they had already rejected.—The lords would be sure to reject such a bill, because there was no part of the bill of his hon. and learned friend to which they had shewn so early and decided a reluctance, as to this part of it. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Lockhart said, that, whatever opinion the gentlemen opposite might have of the measure then before them, the house could not but be obliged to the hon. and learned gentleman for the opportunity he had afforded it of re-asserting its opinion on a subject of the greatest importance. The bill which had been sent up by them to the other house, investing the commissioners to be appointed under it with full powers, was now returned with those powers limited to such a degree as could only serve to mislead both the commissioners and the public. As the bill was now altered, no evidence could be expected but what was voluntary on the one side, and, on the other, what was partial, colourable and delusive. With regard to the objection that the bill would operate to dissuade honourable men from accepting trusts, if this were meant to apply to charities hereafter, he conceived it had very little force; for, unless some security were established against future peculation, no individual would again leave his money to such purposes. If the objection applied to past benefactions, he was afraid that the majority of present trustees were not men of strict honour. There was no doubt that the original trustees were; but, in the lapse of half a century, these trusts frequently fell into strange hands, and had always a tendency to lose their natural guardians. The noble lord had suggested the propriety of making their proceedings harmonize with those of the other house: but he must here call their attention to the failure both of Mr. Gilbert's act in 1780, and his own, 20 years afterwards, in producing adequate returns—a failure that could not have happened if the provisions of the act had been honestly complied with. But what was the fact? Out of 40,000 charities, which were supposed to exist in the country, only 600 had sent in memorials for enrolment, pursuant to the directions of the act. (Hear, hear.) It was obvious, then, that some compulsory power was necessary to correct this disposition to concealment, or the whole intention of the inquiry would be frustrated.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer objected to the motion, as it was an attempt, by way of address to the throne, to take away the power of the other house of parliament to negative a measure. The bill had been sent back to them amended, and the hon. and learned mover, by his address, attempted to destroy those amendments, not by the ordinary mode of negativing them, but by addressing the crown to desire it to act in contravention of them. There were two courses which they might regularly follow—to negative the bill which had been sent back, and to send up another to the lords, or to negative the amendments; but the present proceeding would force the crown to act in contradiction of the wishes of one or other house of parliament. If they agreed to the address, they would not increase the power of the commissioners; they would only extend the field of their inquiry. He thought it would be more advisable to be content with inquiring into the funds devoted to education in the first place, leaving the state of education as a supplementary subject of inquiry hereafter.

Mr. J. Smith expressed his disappointment at the speech which he had just heard, as he had felt assured that the right hon. gentleman would be friendly to the motion, both as it regarded the education of the poor, and the correction of the shameful abuses of charities for promoting that object. He thought it most important to retain the words "all charities" in the bill, because, from long attendance on the committee, he was satisfied that it was not in the power of government, or of any other authority, at present to put an end to those abuses. (Hear, hear.) Several recent voluntary disclosures rendered it impossible for any man to shut his eyes to the imperious necessity of instituting a strict and effectual inquiry into the administration of all charitable funds. With regard to an indisposition on the part of trustees to undertake that office if this bill were to pass, he was quite sure that it was at least not a general feeling. The bill exempted the schools of Quakers, and yet he was authorized to say from that respectable body of men, that they had not only no objection to the examination of their few charitable schools, but that they should rejoice at finding them made the subject of parliamentary inquiry. (Hear, hear.) Whoever knew them, knew that they could have no apprehensions of such an investigation, nor could he conceive how any honest man could entertain any apprehensions. He was sure that inquiry would not be much longer deferred, as many highly respectable persons felt themselves reflected upon in their character of trustees, and were earnest in their wishes for the present inquiry.

Sir F. Burdett said, he could not help thinking that the objections made to this measure in another place, and by an authority however high, proceeded upon reasons such as an honest mind could scarcely suggest to itself. When he considered that the very learned, or, as some called him, the incomparably learned man who advanced them, was himself at the head of the highest court of equity, and the legal guardian of those who had lost their natural protectors, he should have imagined that his great abilities would have been freely and voluntarily exerted to defend the poor from pillage, and preserve those funds which the piety and beneficence of our ancestors had devoted to the most sacred objects. The noble lord (Castlereagh) had spoken with disapprobation of the tone of the speech of the learned mover. He could discover nothing in that speech which could have drawn down the noble lord's dissatisfaction, unless it were the tone of commiseration with the unprotected—the tone of indignation at scandalous malversation—the tone of indignation at plunder of the worst description—the plunder of the poor and defenceless, and at the violation of property consecrated by the best of feelings to the best of purposes. It appeared that the charities in this country, for the support of the aged and the young, and for the instruction of the ignorant, exceeded in amount what those who had not inquired into the subject could have conceived. It appeared also, that the abuses by which they were diverted from their proper purposes kept pace with the efforts of charity. Was it possible to deny, that it was the peculiar duty of the house to inquire into those abuses, and to take effectual measures for remedying them. He was anxious, for his own part, that the investigation should have been carried through by a committee, as he had more confidence in a committee, especially when assisted by persons as vigilant and active as the learned gentleman. He looked to commissions also with jealousy. When he saw the abuses which existed in different departments—in schools, in prisons, in the navy and army, which had extorted from ministers that inquiry which they never conceived to be a part of their duty to originate, and which they even made a merit of suffering to proceed, he could not put much trust in commissions. They had generally ended in baffled inquiry and increased expense. But he thought that the measure which the hon. and learned gentleman had prosecuted with so much zeal and ability should receive that addition which was necessary to render it effectual. The hon. and learned mover had not stated loose facts, but serious abuses. He had stated the condition of the Court of Chancery, which made it doubtful whether that Court were not itself an abuse. To delay justice was to deny it, to make it expensive was to sell it. Yet the unclaimed property in that court amounted to millions, and those who gained their suits were often ruined by the justice of their cause. The king's oath, at his coronation, was, "nulli negabimus, nulli differemus, nulli vendemus justiciam vel rectum;" the answer of the subject was, "negatur, differtur, venditur," not sold in one sense—bribes were not given to the judges, but what mattered it to the individual, whether he were ruined by giving bribes to judges, or by any other unnecessary expense? As there were sister arts, so there were sister abuses, and this abuse was closely connected with the misapplication of charitable funds. Whether this abuse arose from the construction of the court itself, or from the incomparably learned judge (as he was called) who sat there, he could not say—but it was an abuse worthy of serious attention, and one which, he hoped, would be taken up by an hon. and learned gentleman whom he saw below him (Sir Samuel Romilly), who was best qualified to suggest the means of reforming it. The abuses immediately in question appeared to him to be so shameful, and even impious, that he should consider the learned gentleman who had so distinguished himself in bringing them to light as having, if he succeeded in overthrowing them, performed one of the greatest achievements, and conferred as great a benefit as could be bestowed on the community. Much had been said in praise of honourable trustees; but what sort of trustees they were who could object to inquiry, the country would judge after that inquiry had taken place. The house could not take more effectual means to answer the ends of those who were disposed to vilify it, than by sitting quiet while these abuses existed, and refusing to give efficacy to that measure which could alone correct them. (Hear.)

Mr. Canning said, that in the few observations which he had to make to the house on the present motion, he should not enter into any examination of the statements or the reasonings of the hon. baronet, or of those who had spoken earlier in the debate on the same side, not because he wished to shew any disrespect to what they had advanced, but because they did not touch on that view of the question to which he was desirous more particularly to advert. They had argued as if the objection existed to the object of the hon. and learned gentleman's motion, while he opposed, not the object of the motion to which he had always expressed himself friendly, but the proposed mode of carrying it into execution. In order to obviate the imputations which might be cast upon his opposition, by remarks like those in the hon. baronet's speech, he would distinctly state, that he was favourable to the measure of the hon. and learned gentleman, as introduced in his bill; that he had attended the discussions which took place upon it; that he never gave his vote against it, and that he only doubted of the propriety of the means or the mode now proposed to accomplish the object of it. He would, at the present time, frankly say, that if the hon. mover had continued to support his bill as originally introduced, he would have given it his most strenuous opposition in all its stages. The bill as sent up to the lords had his entire concurrence, and he had shewn no unwillingness to support it, and to further its object; but the house was now called upon to consider, whether a measure—introduced at first after a laborious inquiry, and after a speech from the learned gentleman which (if he would accept a compliment from him, which would be allowed to proceed from no undue partiality) brought the subject home to the feelings of every man that heard him—were to be made the occasion of setting aside the powers of the other branch of the legislature, because that other branch could not see all its provisions in the same light as the house, or the hon. and learned mover. He would state a few facts in the history of the bill as it passed through this house, in order to shew that the same opportunities of deliberating, and considering it, had not been allowed to the house of peers. The subject had been introduced on the 17th of March, and the bill on the 8th of April. From the 8th of April to the 20th of May, it had continued under deliberation, and all the parts of it had been carefully examined, digested, and polished. There had been no hostile discussion, but every desire was manifested to accommodate it to its object. On the 20th of May the bill was sent up to the lords, and they were called upon to decide in a fortnight, on the provisions of a complicated measure, which had occupied the House of Commons for the length of time which he had mentioned. When sent up, it was accompanied with the poor laws' bill, and other important measures, which required deliberate consideration. The house of lords adopted the principle of the bill, and most of its details. Out of its three objects, they adopted two: and the other they did not reject, but merely postponed. On this state of facts, the house was now called upon to take a step hazardous and uncommon, it must be admitted, though not, he allowed, unconstitutional, but which, if frequently repeated, would have a tendency to deprive the other branch of the legislature of all power of enacting laws, and to vest it exclusively in the commons. He did not deny the right of the house to proceed by address to the crown, when the lords refused to concur in their measures, but he thought this proceeding should only be resorted to in cases of great importance and urgency.—In the present case, there was no reason for travelling out of the ordinary road. The subject was already in a course of inquiry; and that part of the bill to which the house of lords had agreed, was sufficient to occupy the time of the commissioners until parliament should meet again, when they might proceed to legislate upon the clauses which had been omitted. He also objected to the address, intended to be moved, for an inquiry into other charitable institutions. That was one of the clauses omitted by the lords. It was open to the hon. gentleman, when he first proposed his measure, to determine whether he would proceed by bill or by address; but having chosen, and properly chosen, the former, he was not justified in turning round upon the house of lords, and telling them, they had not done their duty, because they refused to agree to some of the enactments intended. He repeated, that he was by no means hostile to the object of the bill, but he felt it his duty to object to that blind and headlong zeal which, without any adequate necessity, would deviate from the practice of parliament, and even go near to overturn the barriers of the constitution.

Mr. Brougham replied. The bill, he said, had been so changed in the lords, that he could scarcely recognize his own offspring. He at first wished to move to negative the lords' amendments, in which he could have succeeded; but he distrusted his own judgment, and though the bill was mutilated, still, as it contained something good, he had resolved to adopt it. The bill could not have been introduced sooner. The long space which the right hon. gentleman had mentioned, as being occupied with deliberating upon it, principally consisted of the adjournment during the Easter holidays. He had tried, during those holidays, with the assistance of a learned friend of the Chancery bar, to make it as perfect as possible. They took for their model the bill for appointing the naval commission of inquiry, which had been unnaturally renounced by some of its parents, because it had been too effective in producing the tenth report. That tenth report, and that bill, were as satisfactory as any of the noble Earl St. Vincent's naval victories, and they had been made the model of the present measure. He denied that he had been actuated by any wish to create a difference between the two houses of parliament. His conduct had been throughout most conciliatory, and he had even taken the pains to communicate with noble lords in another place, in order to learn what were their wishes on the subject. He argued, that what he proposed would not set the two houses at variance, but would be much more conciliatory than if, in the next session, he persisted in renewing a measure which, in this session, the lords had rejected by their amendments. A delay of six months was a serious evil in an inquiry of this kind; and when, in the next session, he should propose a bill, the right hon. gentleman, if he forgot his argument of to-night, which was not impossible, might fairly urge, that he was endeavouring to produce a rupture between the two branches of the legislature. After referring to the Reversion bill, which was rejected by the lords, and upon which the house had afterwards voted an address to the crown, as a precedent in his favour, he concluded by reading an extract from the report of the committee on this subject, as a warrant for the motion with which he had troubled the house.

The house then divided:

For Mr. Brougham's motion, 29
Against it, ... 54

LIST OF THE MAJORITY.

Allan, G.
Arbuthnot, Rt. Hon. C.
Arkwright, R.
Bankes, H.
Bankes, G.
Bathurst, Rt. Hon. B.
Binning, Lord
Bradshaw, R. H.
Calvert, John
Campbell, A.
Canning, Rt. Hon. G.
Canning, G.
Castlereagh, Lord
Clive, H.
Collett, E.
Courtenay, T. P.
Davis, R. H.
Edmonstone, Sir C.
Fane, J.
Findlay, K.
Farquhar, J.
Fitzharris, Viscount
Forbes, C.
Gifford, Sir R.
Gipps, G.
Goulburn, H.
Grant, A. C.
Gurney, H.
Harvey, C.
Hodson, J.
Leigh, J. H.
Long, Rt. Hon. C.
Lowther, Lord
Lowther, Hon. C.
Marryat, J.
Macknaughten, S.
Michel, General
Mitford, W.
Neville, R.
Perring, Sir J.
Protheroe, F.
Robinson, Rt. Hon. F.
Scott, Sir W.
Shaw, B.
Smith, ——
Shepherd, Sir Sam.
Thornton, Gen.
Tomline, W. E.
Trefusis, Hon. W. C.
Vansittart, Rt. Hon. N.
Vyse, W. H. H.
Ward, Robert
Warrender, Sir Geo.
Wilbraham, E. B.
Yarmouth, Earl of

LIST OF THE MINORITY.

Abercromby, Hon. J.
Aubrey, Sir John
Baring, Sir T.
Bolland, John
Brougham, H.
Burdett, Sir F.
Chamberlayne, W.
Duncannon, Visc.
Frankland, T.
Fitzroy, Lord J.
Gaskell, B.
Keck, G. A. L.
Lambton, John G.
Langton, W. G.
Lefevre, C. S.
Macdonald, J.
Macintosh, Sir J.
Martin, J.
Martin, H.
Maitland, J.
Morland, J. B.
Moore, P.
Ord, W.
Ossulston, Lord
Palmer, Colonel
Romilly, Sir S.
Shelley, Sir J.
Smith, J.
Wood, Alderman

TELLERS.

Bennet, Hon. H. G.
Lockhart, John

Mr. Brougham then moved, "That an humble address be presented to his royal highness the Prince Regent, that he would be graciously pleased to instruct any commissioners who may be appointed under a bill, intituled, 'an act for appointing commissioners to inquire of the charities in England and Wales, and of the education of the poor, to inquire into the abuses of charities not connected with education.'"

Whereupon the previous question, "that the question be now put," was moved, and negatived.

Mr. Brougham then said, that before he moved that the house do concur in the amendments of the lords, he wished to give notice, that, early in the next session, he should move for leave to bring in a bill to appoint, if possible, the same commissioners to inquire into all abuses of charities by which the property of the poor had been dilapidated and plundered by those who met with the sanction of some, the fellow-feeling of others, and the protection of many, as was obvious from the vote of this night. That vote would, no doubt, give great satisfaction to persons high in the state, and to many members of both houses, who were unwilling that these abuses should be investigated. He put it to the candour of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Bathurst) whether, after what had passed, should the lords' amendment be negatived, he would not support an address to the throne, that the great object might be attained.

Mr. Canning spoke to order. There was no question before the house, though the hon. and learned gentleman, in order to introduce his invectives, had led some members to imagine that he would have concluded with a motion. He apprehended that the hon. and learned gentleman had no right to dictate, either to the house or to any hon. member, what course he ought to pursue.

Mr. R. Ward said, that the hon. and learned gentleman had slandered and defamed many hon. members, in his expression respecting the votes which they had given.

Mr. Robinson and others here rose to order.

Mr. Brougham denied that he entertained any wish to dictate to, or to slander, the house; it was quite absurd to suppose that such had been his intention. He would not allow any gentlemen of the Ordnance, or of the Board of Trade, to debar him from the ordinary courtesy of putting a question. (Order.)

Mr. Lambton moved, that the house do adjourn. He said, he made this motion to give his hon. and learned friend a right to speak.

Mr. Robinson observed, that, as he had been referred to as one of the Board of Trade, he wished to state, that he had interrupted the hon. and learned gentleman, merely to induce him to restrain himself half a minute, while his noble friend moved the concurrence in the lords' amendments, as it did not appear that such a motion was likely to come from the other side of the house. He would not be put down by the hon. and learned gentleman at any time, and certainly not on the present occasion.

Mr. Brougham replied, that, when interrupted, he was only about to put a question, an ordinary courtesy allowed to all members. Before he proceeded, he desired to know what an hon. gentleman opposite meant by asserting that he had slandered and defamed him. He was anxious to give his much injured reputation all the healing balm in his power.

Mr. Ward insisted that the hon. and learned member had only pursued his usual course of running riot against those by whom he had been opposed and defeated. He was one of those who voted in the majority against the hon. and learned gentleman's proposition, and the hon. and learned gentleman had more than insinuated that the object of that majority was to screen the guilty: such statements were defamatory and slanderous.

Mr. Brougham was about to speak, when Mr. Ward asked him, whether he rose to explain. (Confusion.)

Mr. Brougham protested against the conduct of the hon. gentleman, who seemed so anxious to take upon himself duties that belonged only to the Speaker.

The motion for an adjournment was then withdrawn, and, on the motion of Lord Castlereagh, the lords' amendments to the bill were read and agreed to.

Lord Castlereagh then moved, that the house should adjourn over to-morrow, it being his Majesty's birth-day, which was agreed to.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, June 5.

ROYAL ASSENT.] The Royal Assent was given by commission to the Regency Act Amendment Bill; the Rock Salt Duties Bill; the Portugal Slave Trade Treaty Bill, and the Purchase of Game Bill. The commissioners were, the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Shaftesbury, and Lord Redesdale.

ELECTION OF CORONERS BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

POOR LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

COTTON FACTORIES BILL.] Lord Kenyon said, that, as several of their lordships had signified a wish for farther evidence on this bill, and as at this period of the session it could not be expected that the committee could sit much longer, he should propose to postpone the measure until the next session, with the view of then moving the re-appointment of the committee.

The Earl of Lauderdale was very glad to hear that the noble lord, who had formerly refused to hear any evidence, now so far concurred with him as to think farther evidence necessary. With regard to the proceedings of the manufacturers who opposed the bill, he could not help stating, that the utmost degree of industry had been exercised by them to inform their lordships on the subject on which they were about to legislate. The evidence they had brought forward went far beyond his utmost expectations, and proved that, in Manchester, the cotton factories were looked to by parents as a means of employment for their weakly children.

Lord Kenyon said, he had not intimated any change of opinion. He had merely, in compliance with the desire of other noble lords, proposed to postpone the proceedings, for the purpose of hearing farther evidence next session. When the inquiry was concluded, then would be the time for giving an opinion on the effect of the information obtained.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, that the evidence taken before the committee had been distributed to their lordships; but that the regular course of proceeding was, to report it from the committee.

Lord Kenyon then brought up the evidence, and laid it on the table as the report of the committee*.

CHURCHES IN SCOTLAND BILL.] The Earl of Lauderdale called the attention of their lordships to this bill. From what had already passed on the subject he hoped the noble Secretary of State would consent to allow the measure to lie over till the next session, when there would be time to inquire into the necessity of applying the public money to the object of the bill.

The Earl of Liverpool said, he was aware of the difficulty of giving full consideration to the measure at the present period; and, in order that there might be sufficient time for that purpose, he had no objection to the delay proposed by the noble earl.

SPANISH PATRIOTS.] Lord Holland presented a petition from Don Diego Correa, praying for

* Since the dissolution of parliament, the master-spinners in Manchester have passed the following resolution, upon which the spinners at Preston are now acting:—"Exchange-buildings, Oct. 10.—We, the undersigned, agree to limit the working of the moving power of our mills to 72 hours per week, and to direct that an account be kept of the time worked during each week at our respective mills, that it may be produced in court if found necessary."

relief. (It was in substance the same as that presented in the Commons on Monday by Lord Morpeth.) The noble lord, in moving that the petition be laid on the table, adverted to the ancient policy of Great Britain in protecting foreigners, and encouraging them to seek refuge in this country against oppression. This policy he was now sorry to see completely abandoned. In support of his opinion respecting the practice and feelings of former times, he quoted the preamble of the act of parliament for the encouragement of refugees, which had been drawn up by the great Lord Somers. The preamble stated, that whereas many Protestants in France might wish, on account of our free constitution, to settle in this country, it was right to induce them to do so.—The petition was laid on the table.

OFFICES IN REVERSION.] Earl Grosvenor rose, and said, he felt a considerable degree of embarrassment in being obliged to trouble their lordships by bringing forward this subject; for, after what had passed in the last session of parliament, he had thought it would have been unnecessary to call their attention to it again. As, however, nothing had been done by his Majesty's ministers to reform the abuses which had been the subject of so much complaint, he considered himself bound to propose some resolutions relative to places in reversion, and all sinecures or useless places of every description. It had been said, that nothing farther was necessary to be done, because certain places, after long consideration, had been abolished; but what had been done in that way was far from being sufficient. There were still several useless places in England, Ireland, Scotland, and the colonies, the abolition of which, and of those places which were entirely or chiefly executed by deputy, might be effected. When their lordships found, upon inquiry, that there was a great number of offices, for the maintaining of which no good reason could be assigned, and that many which had now become perfect sinecures had anciently been efficient offices, they surely could not hesitate in agreeing to a resolution, declaring, that such a state of things ought no longer to exist. The first resolution which he should move, was confined to places in reversion; and, as an illustration of its necessity, he should mention the rangership of Bagshot-park, the reversion of which had been granted to the Duchess of Gloucester. If it were fit that such a system should be permitted to exist, this grant could not be censured: but it was precisely in proportion to the popularity which might be attached to the individuals to whom such grants were made that he objected to them. They paved the way for others of a different nature, and, by little and little, the evil grew to a most mischievous height. His second object was, the abolition of sinecures and useless places. Last session he had been called upon to define what a sinecure was. The task would not have been difficult, but it was rather singular that it should have been required of him, when a bill had passed their lordships' house for the abolition of several places of that description. With regard to what might be called useless places, he certainly did not mean to include under that denomination those which were necessary for supporting the splendour and dignity of the crown, such as the offices of the Lord Chamberlain, the Lord Steward, or even the Lords of the Bedchamber, though, perhaps, there might be too many of them. All offices to which any kind of public utility could be attributed, he would most willingly maintain. But there were several offices connected with the courts of law, which were completely useless. He did not mean to say, however, that even those should be abolished, without taking into consideration the emoluments derived from them by the heads of the courts. A fair compensation ought to be given for those emoluments. The noble earl at the head of the treasury had, in the beginning of the session, pledged himself to introduce a measure for regulating the office of clerk of the parliaments, which was one certainly executed by deputy, but as yet nothing had been done towards that object.—The office of clerk of the pleas in Ireland, had been a subject of litigation for a time; but, though the question had been decided in a court of law, nothing had been done on the subject by ministers. The question respecting the office of Lord Justice General of Scotland remained in the same state. Instead of abolishing it altogether, a bill had been brought into another place, for giving the emoluments to the Lord President of the Court of Session; but the proposition met with so much disapprobation, that the authors of the measure had thought fit to withdraw it. The office of third secretary of state was still maintained, notwithstanding its inutility had been demonstrated; and, in fact, nothing but the voice of parliament, decisively pronounced, would induce ministers to consent to an effectual abolition of sinecures and useless offices. During the whole of the session they had not given a hint of any plan of economy; and, as they opposed all reductions, he anticipated that, in the next session, they would propose the renewal of that odious impost, the income-tax: for, as they adopted no measures of economy, they could only cover the expenditure by making new demands on the pockets of the people. When he, on a former occasion, referred to our army in France as an unnecessary burthen, the noble lord at the head of the treasury asserted, that it did not cost the country a farthing. This was a singular assertion; for he believed it was maintained out of the five millions paid to this country by France, which would of course be applicable to other objects, were it not so disposed of. These five millions constituted our indemnity for the past, which had been one of the objects of the long and ruinous war in which the country had been engaged. As to the other great object—security for the future—he supposed it was to be found in the restoration of the House of Bourbon, and he hoped it would. That army, however, which was retained in France, for the support of the reigning monarch, was paid out of our indemnity. The noble Secretary of State surely would not say that the money thus laid out would not have been saved, had the army been disbanded. Should the troops be now withdrawn, might not what yet remained unpaid of this indemnity be saved to the country, by reducing the military establishment?—To return to the objects of the resolutions which he intended to propose, he must remind their lordships of the mischievous effects of leaving the power of granting sinecures and useless places in the hands of ministers. It gave a most undue and pernicious influence to the Crown. If this power were allowed to remain, its corrupt influence would infallibly increase; and to that influence, morality, and the spirit of independence, would finally give way.—The noble earl concluded by moving the following resolutions:—

1. "That from henceforth no places ought to be granted in reversion by the Crown, as tending to prolong and perpetuate the existence of sinecures and other useless offices, as being a complete bar to regulation, and thus endangering the adequate discharge of offices to which active duties are annexed.

2. "That the practice of granting places in reversion by the crown ought not only to cease and determine, but that the pernicious practice ought to cease generally.

3. "That the utmost attention to economy in all the branches of public expenditure, which is not inconsistent with the interests of the public service, is at all times a great and important duty.

4. "That all sinecures, and other useless offices, in the gift of the Crown, ought to be abolished at the expiration of the subsisting interests. That the salary of other places, not immediately necessary to the service of the state, ought to be abolished, or regulated, with a view to economy.

5. "That if, in the event of certain useless places being abolished in the courts of law, the emoluments of any judge or judges should be thereby diminished, adequate remuneration should be made to persons holding such dignified and laborious situations.

6. "That, in addition to the measures already taken by parliament for the abolition or regulation of certain sinecures or other useless offices, it is expedient to abolish all those that have revenue without employment, and regulate all offices that have revenue extremely disproportionate to employment, excepting only such as are connected with the personal service of his Majesty or his royal family, in the due support of the dignity and proper splendour of the monarchy, regard being always had to the existing interests in any offices so to be regulated or abolished.

7. "That it is expedient to reduce offices of which the effective duties are entirely or principally discharged by deputy, in certain cases, to the salary and emoluments actually received for executing the business of such offices, regard being had to any increase which may appear necessary on account of additional responsibility, and sufficient security being taken for due performance of the service in all cases of trust connected with the public money.

8. "That, at the present time, it is especially the duty of the house to adopt the foregoing Resolutions, on account of the burthened state of the country, and the universal desire for economical reform and reduction of unconstitutional influence, whether originating in the unperceived lapse of time, the effect of accident, or the machination of design."

The Resolutions being put, were negatived without a division.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, June 5.

POLICE OF THE METROPOLIS.] Mr. Bennet presented the Report of the Police Committee. After mentioning the evils that were experienced in consequence of the want of a classification of prisoners in the different gaols of the country —the defects of the present system of transportation—and the abuses arising out of the mode of licensing public-houses—the hon. member moved, that the Report should lie on the table and be printed.—Ordered.

ALIEN BILL.] Sir J. Macintosh presented a petition from George Oppenheimer and others against the clause introduced by the house of lords into the Alien bill. The petition was ordered to be read. It set forth, that the petitioners were proprietors of stock in the Bank of Scotland, and naturalized subjects of the United Kingdom; that they became purchasers of stock since the 28th day of April last, upon information given to them, that by the act of the Scotch parliament in 1695, establishing the Bank of Scotland, which act has been confirmed by five acts of parliament in the reign of his present Majesty, they should thereby acquire the rights and privileges of British subjects;—that they had been long resident in this country, carrying on business as merchants, and most of them have children born in this country;—that they were willing to conform to all regulations prescribed in the case of foreigners who become naturalized by act of parliament; and having purchased stock in the Bank of Scotland upon full and entire faith in the law as it stood when they became proprietors of such stock, and having a confident belief that no person in this country was ever deprived of his rights by a retrospective law, they prayed, that the bill now before parliament might not extend to disfranchise them of their just rights legally acquired since the 28th day of April last.

Mr. Tierney moved, "That the said petition be referred to a committee, to examine and report the matter thereof to the house."

" 6

Lord Castlereagh said, he should oppose the motion. The facts of the case were known, and, therefore, it was unnecessary to enter into an investigation. The petitioners had taken a short cut—they had obtained their rights by a fraud on the law. (Hear, hear.) He repeated, that they had obtained them by fraud of an act of parliament; for the old law had been virtually repealed by the act of Geo. I. and the 13th and 14th of Geo. III. respecting the naturalization of foreigners. Would the legislature suffer itself to be defeated in its object by an obsolete act of the parliament of Scotland, by which all purchasers of stock took themselves out of the class of aliens, and, of course, freed themselves from the operation of the bill? The retrospective nature of the clause had been complained of. But this was a quality by no means uncommon in acts of parliament. When the bill for regulating the residence of the clergy was passed, it had a retrospective effect: and there were various other precedents of the determination of parliament, when it thought any particular object desirable, not to be arrested by any consideration that a retrospective operation in a bill was unfitting. As to the Scotch act, he was not prepared to say what the government might eventually recommend respecting it: its final fate was not at issue: what the house had to determine was, whether or not it should be suspended during the continuance of the Alien bill.

Sir S. Romilly said, he could not conceive it possible that the house, if it had the least regard to principle, would refuse to appoint a committee for the investigation of this subject. Since he had had the honour of a seat in that house, he had never seen a petition of greater importance, considering the nature of it in itself, and considering the extraordinary doctrines which had been just advanced by the noble secretary of state. The noble lord had said, that there was no occasion to refer the petition to a committee, because the house knew all the facts of the case. The house did not know the facts of the case. The noble lord himself did not know the facts of the case. The noble lord had asserted, that if an alien bought and held stock of the Bank of Scotland for 24 hours, he became entitled to all the privileges of a natural born subject. How did the noble lord know that? Had the noble lord the act? If he had it, it was a trick upon the house not to declare so, but he was quite mistaken, if he thought the repeal of only one act necessary. It would be necessary to repeal no less than five acts of parliament. It was a mistake to suppose that the individuals in question were entitled to their claims by the Scotch act merely. They were entitled to them by acts passed by the English parliament. By an act of the Scotch parliament in 1695, the Bank of Scotland was created with a capital of 100,000*l.* The exact terms of that act it was not in his power to state, for it was impossible, such was the haste of the advocates of the present measure, to procure it. In 1774, however, it being thought proper to increase the capital of the Bank of Scotland, an act was passed by the British parliament —the act of the 14th Geo. III. c. 32.—increasing that capital to 200,000*l.*; and, in the 17th section of that act, it was declared, that the act of the Scotch parliament in 1695 should remain in full force as to every particular, except so far as the same was altered by the act then passed, and that the provisions of the act of 1695 should operate with regard to the new stock, as it had operated with regard to the old;—in other words, that all purchasers of the new stock of the Bank of Scotland, as of the old stock, should become naturalized subjects. In the 32d Geo. III. another act was passed, farther increasing the capital of the Bank of Scotland, and in the 34th Geo. III. another; both declaring, that the act of 1695 should remain in full force in the particulars which he had mentioned. And yet, in the teeth of these repeated acts of parliament, the noble lord had asserted, that the individuals in question had obtained their rights by fraud of an act of parliament. A monstrous assertion! Did the noble lord—a minister of the Crown, high in the confidence of the Prince Regent—mean to assert, that it was not perfectly justifiable in those persons to purchase the stock in question, in order to become naturalized? Why, it was the advantage held out in order to induce aliens to become proprietors of Bank of Scotland stock. When the Bank of Scotland was established, which was a year before the establishment by charter of the Bank of England, it was a boon offered to aliens to tempt them to become proprietors. This boon the individuals in question had accepted, and now the noble lord called that acceptance a fraud on an act of parliament! To take it away would be a fraud on the part of parliament. (Hear, hear, hear.) Parliament had offered certain conditions to aliens; and when, relying on the faith of parliament, they accepted them, parliament withdrew its part of the consideration, and put the alien purchaser in the situation of being compelled to sell the stock which he had purchased for a particular purpose, at the reduced price to which it must necessarily be lowered. The noble lord had appealed to precedents and to past times. Did the house recollect what was done in the reign of Queen Anne? In the 7th of Anne, it was enacted, that all Protestants were on landing in this country to become naturalized. (Hear! from Lord Castlereagh.) He knew the meaning of the noble lord's cheer. The act of the 7th of Anne was thought inconvenient, and so it was repealed. But how was it repealed? Did the statesmen of that day dare to take away the privileges which had been already conferred? No. The bill was prospective in its enactments. Its operation was not to commence until after the passing of the act. Three months were allowed to foreign Protestants to come and take the benefit of the law, by rendering themselves entitled to the privileges of natural born subjects. But what was the character of the present measure? A thing so extravagant, so contrary to all law, so completely in violation of all justice was never thought of before the time of the noble lord and his colleagues. And what was worse was, that it emanated from that branch of the legislature which was the supreme court of justice in the country—(Hear, hear,)—that it proceeded from men who filled the highest judicial offices—who took an oath to administer justice with impartiality. (Hear, hear.) Those persons took, indeed, "a short cut," as the noble lord called it. They did not even venture to introduce the proposition in a bill, where it would be repeatedly discussed, but took care that there should be only one question upon it, by making it an addition to a bill already discussed. Much stress was frequently laid on the forms of parliament. Here all forms had been violated. The house of commons sent to the house of lords a bill continuing an existing law; the house of lords returned it with the repeal of an existing law. (Hear, hear.) And this they called an addition to the bill! By this proceeding they told the house of commons, "either the bill to which you have agreed, shall not pass into a law at all, or it shall be accompanied by an amendment which we have added to it, and which is wholly alien to its original object." And this was done on the presumption, that the hurry at the close of a session would prevent the house of commons from having any alterations. A monstrous proceeding! (Hear, hear.) There was another view of the case which was most important. He did not profess to be very learned in the law of parliament, but unless he utterly mistook that law, he conceived that the house of commons could not, consistently with its privileges, agree to this amendment. For let them observe what was its effect. To subject a large description of persons to the alien duties. This was one part of its injustice. Another was, the forfeiture of estates. Suppose among the 49 persons who had availed themselves of the Scotch act, there were some who had done so for the purpose of purchasing estates. Was the house aware, that the effect of this clause would be to make those persons forfeit the estates so purchased? If aware, would it be so regardless of every principle of law and justice as to consent to the proposition?—Reverting, however, to the law of parliament, the hon. and learned gentleman observed, that he had been looking into authorities to see how that law stood with respect to the circumstance which he had mentioned; and he found, that the House of Commons had rejected amendments made by the House of Lords, that were much more remotely connected with the privileges of the Commons with respect to money regulations than this clause by which alien duties were imposed. The last precedent in Mr. Hatsell's work, was in 1791, when the House of Commons threw out a bill returned to them by the House of Lords, for regulating the distribution of rewards in cases of felony, because the House of Lords had diminished one of the rewards of 40*l*. The House of Commons rejected this as an interference with their privileges. But how inferior an interference was it to the present, in which the House of Lords proposed to tax individuals? In 1787, the House of Lords made an amendment to a bill sent up to them from the House of Commons respecting Horsham gaol, which amendment was to the effect, that Horsham gaol should be repaired in the same manner as other gaols. On this, the bill was thrown out by the House of Commons, because the amendment imposed on individuals the payment of money. It was one of the most important privileges of the House of Commons, and one which ought to be vigilantly guarded, to originate money bills, and he conceived that the present was a case in which that privilege ought to be strongly asserted. The act respecting the stock of the Bank of Scotland, was only one of many acts in which parliament had held out to aliens the advantage of becoming naturalized. Service by aliens in the fleet and army, residence of aliens in the colonies for various periods, were, by acts of parliament, rewarded by conferring on them the privileges of natural born subjects. The noble lord, in justification of the retrospective character of the clause, had referred to the act by which actions against the clergy for non-residence were suspended. He (Sir S. R.) did not conceive that that act was altogether justifiable, although there were circumstances which lessened the objections to it; but, at any rate, it ought to be remembered, that it was not passed without hearing the individual who was to be affected by it. He was sure that it little occurred to many hon. members, who agreed to that act, that it would be adduced as a precedent in a case like the present. Thus it was, that availing themselves of precedent after precedent, the noble lord and his colleagues proceeded, step by step, to invade and destroy the liberties of the people. (Hear, hear.)—"Sir," said the hon. and learned gentleman, "I do not know what course the house is about to take on this subject, although I cannot help suspecting what that course will be—a course utterly unwarrantable to the individuals more immediately concerned, and wholly repugnant to the spirit of all parliamentary proceeding. Deeply involved as our privileges are in this question, yet as this parliament will be, in all probability, dissolved in a very short period, I fear its last act will be an act of signal injustice. Such will be a fit close of the greater part of our proceedings. Apprehending that we are within a few hours of the termination of our political existence, let us recollect for what deeds we have to account. Let us recollect, that we are the parliament which, for the first time in the history of this country, twice suspended the habeas corpus act in a period of profound peace. Let us recollect, that we are the confiding parliament which intrusted his Majesty's ministers with the authority emanating from that suspension, in expectation that when it was no longer wanted, they would call parliament together to surrender it into their hands—which those ministers did not do, although they subsequently acknowledged that the necessity of retaining that power had long ceased to exist. Let us recollect, that we are the same parliament which consented to indemnify his Majesty's ministers for those abuses and violations of the law of which they had been guilty, in the exercise of the authority vested in them. Let us recollect, that we are the same parliament which refused to inquire into the grievances stated in the numerous petitions under which our table groaned—that we turned a deaf ear to the complaints of the oppressed—that we even amused ourselves with their sufferings. (Hear, hear, hear.) Let us recollect, that we are the same parliament which sanctioned the employment of spies and informers by the British government,—debasing that government, once so celebrated for good faith and honour, into a condition lower in character than that of the ancient French police. Let us recollect, that we are the same parliament which sanctioned the issuing of a circular letter to the magistrates of the country, by a secretary of state, urging them to hold persons to bail for libel, before indictment found. Let us recollect, that we are the same parliament which sanctioned the sending out of the opinions of the king's attorney-general and the king's solicitor-general, as the law of the land. Let us recollect, that we are the same parliament which sanctioned the shutting of the ports of this once hospitable nation to unfortunate foreigners flying from persecution in their own country. This, Sir, is what we have done; and we are about to crown the whole by the present most violent and unjustifiable act. Who our successors may be, I know not; but God grant that this country may never see another parliament as regardless of the liberties and rights of the people, and of the principles of general justice, as this parliament has been. (Loud and continued cheering.)

The Attorney-General said, he denied the position of the hon. and learned gentleman, that because the capital of the Bank of Scotland had at various times been increased by acts of the British parliament, aliens derived the rights in question from the English acts, and not from the Scotch act. With respect to the law itself, the Scotch act of 1695 was contrary to the general principle of all naturalization bills adopted in this country; for it was without any restriction with reference either to religion, or to country, or to any other circumstance. The naturalization acts for aliens serving for certain periods in our fleets and armies, residing in our infant colonies, &c. required, first, that those aliens should be Protestants; secondly, that they should undergo certain ceremonies. That respecting aliens in the colonies, required a previous residence of seven years, and the taking of the oath of allegiance. Not so the Scotch act. Any foreigner, of whatever religion, from whatever quarter of the world he might come, might, by the purchase of a certain quantity of Bank of Scotland stock, become naturalized. In the seven years' war an act of parliament passed to naturalize aliens who had served three years on board his Majesty's ships, but a special proclamation from the king was necessary for that purpose. Even the statute of Queen Anne required certain qualifications. Let the house look at the preamble of the statute by which that act was repealed, and they would see the acknowledgment of the mistake into which the legislature found they had been betrayed by their liberality. By the 7th of Anne, c. 5. it was enacted, that all foreigners taking certain oaths should be deemed natural born subjects, they consenting to receive the sacrament of the Protestant church. In so short a period as three years after, another act was passed, repealing the act of the 7th of Anne, the preamble of which recited the mischiefs and inconveniences of the latter. It was true that this repealing act was not retrospective, nor was it to operate immediately on the passing of the bill. But why? Because the 7th of Anne was an invitation to certain persons to come to this country, who, in consequence, had immediately come, and taken advantage of the act. (Hear, hear.) Did the gentlemen opposite mean to say, that any thing like this was the case in the present instance? The Scotch act was absolutely found out for the purpose of making that use of it which had been made. From the period of passing the first alien bill in 1793, down to the present time, he would ask those gentlemen, whether they ever heard of this Scotch act? Nobody would state that it was ever thought of till now—it was almost obsolete. There was nothing, therefore, in the present case similar to that cited by the hon. and learned gentleman, in the reign of Queen Anne. Why should the petition be referred to a committee? The facts which were stated were not controverted. What would the committee have to inquire into? As to the merit of the clause, that was a different question, on which he had formed his opinion, but with which he would forbear troubling the house at that time, reserving himself for the occasion when that point should be distinctly brought before them.

Mr. W. Smith apprehended, that the principal argument against the injustice of the clause rested on its ex post facto nature. There was no doubt that the petitioners had acquired the privileges held out to them by the act. That privilege empowered them to import goods into this country at a lower rate than in their prior character of aliens. To deprive them of this right appeared on the face of it to be a gross violation of justice, and an equally gross cession of the privileges of that house in money matters. Such an act could be justified only by necessity. If it could be proved that the 49 persons in question were the greatest traitors in the world, and that the rights they had gained were calculated to produce inconvenience so serious, that it would be better to violate the privileges of that house, and the dictates of common justice, than to allow them to retain those rights, let it be so; but the committee was the only place in which the inquiry could be carried on.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he did not perceive that the introduction of the clause by the House of Lords was any infringement of the privileges of the House of Commons, with reference to money matters. He wished the hon. and learned gentleman would point out what were the alien duties which, in his opinion, gave to the clause that character.

Sir S. Romilly said, that the right hon. gentleman had imposed on him a very singular task, and one which he had not the means of performing. The right hon. gentleman himself, from the situation which he filled, should be able to furnish an answer to his own question. Would the right hon. gentleman say, that there were no alien duties in existence? Could any doubt be entertained, that if any of these aliens had purchased land, they would be considered as holding it merely for the crown? (Hear, hear.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he would not take upon himself to assert, that there were no alien duties. (Loud cries of hear.) What he had said was, that he was not aware of the existence of any. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. F. Douglas wished to make one observation. It appeared, between his hon. and learned friend and the right hon. gentleman, to be perfectly uncertain whether there were alien duties or not. In this uncertainty, how could the house conclude against the motion for inquiry?

Sir A. Piggott said, that this point deserved the most serious attention. Would the right hon. gentleman undertake to affirm that such things as alien duties did not exist? He thought there were some hon. gentlemen near him (Sir A. P.) who were perfectly ready to state that they did. Would his hon. and learned friend opposite (the Attorney-General) deny that there were alien duties in the city of London?* Would he deny, that if an alien purchased land he could not hold it†? When they were acting retrospectively, it became them well to pause, and consider what they were about to enact. When they were changing the situation of any man, and subjecting his property to forfeiture, they ought to know upon what grounds they were proceeding, and what would be the consequence of their measures. Were they then sitting in a House of Commons, which, in former times, had been tenacious of their privileges, even to a degree of pedantry? In addition to the instances quoted by his hon. and learned friend, he would mention a case which occurred in 1807, when an act passed by the House of Lords, merely to relieve an Irish catholic officer from the penalties of the Test Act, which attached to him in this country, although they did not attach to him in Ireland, was rejected by the House of Commons, as an encroachment on their privileges. Were there no other objections than these, it would appear to him astonishing that the house could entertain the clause sent down to them. But what was the bill? He had never before seen a bill purporting to repeal an act of parliament, in which the act it was intended to repeal had not been stated. The alien bill had existed for twenty-five years, during which time no inconvenience had resulted from the point in question. The House of Lords had now thought proper to make this alteration; but, in their impatience of legislation, they were so intolerant of that of which they were ignorant, that they did not know whether it was one act or two acts which they wished to repeal. (Hear.) Now let the house see what this clause was. "And be it further enacted, that such persons as may have been naturalized, or who may have claimed to be naturalized, (two very different positions by the way,) since the 28th of April last, &c." Now why the 28th of April? Righteous and proper as this clause might be, but unrighteous and gross as it appeared to him, why not fix on the 27th of April, or the 25th, or any other day? Why the 28th? The House of Lords had not communicated any thing to that house as a reason for adopting this period; there was no act recited, nor the effect of any act recited. What right had he, sitting there in utter ignorance of any ground for the proceeding, to deprive any persons of property, to which they had as good a claim as he had to his own? (Hear, hear.) The learned Attorney-General had stated a great many instances of alien acts, but, in all those cases, the legislature had proceeded upon competent grounds. They knew what they were doing. Where would be the mighty inconvenience of suffering this matter to stand over for farther discussion? There was no conspiracy in existence, no ground whatever of danger or apprehension; and why was the legislature to be called upon to deprive these persons of their rights? When those five acts of the English parliament had given to those subscribers the same privileges as natural-born subjects, the parliament had done the same thing as if they had enumerated all those privileges in the act. This did not stand on the Scotch act alone; it stood on the act of Union also, by which all these privileges were confirmed to those who subscribed to the Bank of Scotland. They stood secured by all those acts of parliament; and would the house consent to pass this extraordinary clause merely on account of the present period of parliament? If it were only for that clause, he should object most decidedly to this bill, but he objected to it altogether. The house would however remember, that they had the power in their own hands of rejecting this clause: it was, as it seemed to him, an interference with the privileges of that house in money matters, and therefore he must protest against it, and propose to the house to reject this amendment. (Hear.)

* Aliens used to pay a larger proportion of customs than natural subjects, which was what was generally understood by the alien's duty; to be exempted from which was one principal cause for the frequent applications to parliament for acts of naturalization. But the 24 Geo. III. sess. 2. c. 16. repealed this alien duty, saving to the city of London the duties of scavage and packing, which had been granted to them by charter. (Scavage, scevage, or shewage, from the Saxon schenwian, i. e. ostendere, is a duty for wares shewn or exposed to sale.)

† An alien born may purchase lands, or other estates: but not for his own use; for the king is thereupon entitled to them. (Co. Litt. 2.) But an alien may acquire a property in goods, money, and other personal estate, or may hire a house for his habitation. (7 Rep. 17.) He may also bring an action concerning personal property, and may make a will, and dispose of his personal estate. (Lutw. 34.)

Mr. Canning said, he did not intend to follow the hon. and learned gentleman through the whole of his speech. It appeared to him that, in the latter part of it, he had stated a proposition, which, if true, would entirely settle the question at issue. If the clause which the other house of parliament had introduced into the bill would expose those persons to higher penalties than were intended, then it would affect the privileges of this house. He had recently taken a part in a debate in which he had endeavoured to justify the proceedings of the other house, but he would never lose sight of the privileges of the house of which he had the honour to be a member. He should, therefore, now appeal to the chair: and if the Speaker should declare, that there were privileges of that house with which the other house ought not to interfere, but which had been interfered with on the present occasion, he should concur in opinion that this house ought not to agree to the clause. He wished, therefore, before the debate proceeded any farther, to hear the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. Speaker said, "I take the unquestionable rule of this House to have been, not only not to permit any interference of the other House either in imposing duties or taxes, or in enacting penalties or forfeitures, but also not to permit it to meddle in any other way than in correcting verbal or literal mistakes, with the bills on these subjects, sent up to it by this House*. As far as I can collect, there are certain duties attached to aliens in this country, as traders, and a forfeiture, in case aliens should acquire any real property here. On becoming subjects of this country, they are entitled to exemption from those duties, and a remission of the penalty in the way of forfeiture. It appears, then, that the amendments of the other House may, in this way, be considered as interfering with what is the peculiar privilege of this House. But there is one point which excites a doubt in my mind, and that is, that bills of naturalization originate in the House of Lords; and, so far, they may be considered as giving a relief from penalties, and a remission of forfeiture. At the same time, I do not state this as sufficient to counterbalance the arguments on the other side. I have to say, that, but for this difficulty respecting bills of naturalization, the amendment of this bill falls within the general rule, and is, therefore, liable to objection."

Mr. Wynn observed, that an act of naturalization enabled a person to acquire real property in this country; but, by the amendment introduced by the Lords, persons who had acquired such property would be deprived of it. It appeared to him, that the clause was of such a nature as fell within the description of cases in which the house would not suffer any interference by the Lords.

Lord Castlereagh said, that, on considering the opinion which had been pronounced by the Chair, and the information given by the hon. and learned member who spoke last, he felt there was but one course for him to pursue, namely, not to press the amendment introduced by the Lords into the bill. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Brougham said, that nothing could be more gratifying to the house, than to hear the noble lord state his sentiments so candidly on this subject.

Sir J. Macintosh suggested to his right hon. friend to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Tierney then withdrew the motion, and Lord Castlereagh moved, that the Lords' amendments to the Alien bill be taken into consideration.

Sir S. Romilly said, that the Lords had introduced a clause into the bill, which, it appeared to him, the House would feel themselves bound to reject. He believed that, in all cases where the House of Lords had introduced a clause into a money bill, it had been the practice of that house to throw out the bill. He had paid some attention to this point in the course of the morning, and had found several cases to this effect. He quoted three precedents. The first, of a clause added to a corn bill, on the 3d of June, 1772; the second, extending the penalties provided in a game bill, on the same day; and the third, directing that a gaol should be kept in repair by the same means by which other county gaols were repaired, on the 4th of May 1787. These provisions were so directly against the rule, "That the Lords should not impose any rates or taxes upon the people," that upon the

* And even these the House of Commons direct to be entered specially in their journals, that the nature of the amendments may appear; and that no argument, prejudicial to their privileges, may be hereafter drawn from their having agreed to such amendments.

Speaker's stating them to the house, it was unanimously agreed to lay the bills aside. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Bathurst said, he saw no occasion to throw out the bill altogether; it would be enough to get rid of the amendment which involved penalties and forfeitures.

Mr. Brougham said, that as there seemed to be some difficulty in this matter, as regarded the privileges of the house, and the property of individuals, he could not help suggesting that they should not proceed too hastily. There could be no inconvenience in deferring the subject till to-morrow, and, in the mean time, a committee might be appointed to search for precedents.

Lord Castlereagh thought that the amendment furnished no reason for destroying the whole bill. The objectionable part might be removed on a conference with the Lords.

Sir J. Macintosh said, that if there were a long series of precedents, sufficient to establish the opinion of his hon. and learned friend, and if no precedents of an opposite nature could be found on the journals, he should bow to that as the law and usage of the house. Without having any express knowledge on the subject, it appeared to him, that if the Lords were not allowed to introduce any amendment into a money bill, à fortiori they could not introduce a money clause into a bill which had not imposed any forfeitures. If they could not do it in the former case, they could not do it in the latter, which appeared to him to be a much more dangerous encroachment on the privileges of the Commons.

Mr. Speaker said, that some distinction must be made between money bills, and bills that had money clauses. Any alteration whatsoever in money bills, except the correction of verbal or literal mistakes, was fatal. In bills where the Lords had introduced money clauses, some objections might be made to those clauses, but not to the other parts of the bill. The house had always entertained a jealousy with respect to the introduction of any clauses relating to money; and, in cases of the last description, it had been the practice to reject that clause, but not to reject the bill on that account. In 1813, a case had occurred which he conceived to be in point. A militia bill was sent up to the other house; the Lords inserted an entire clause, which was considered as a money clause; the Commons disagreed to it, a conference was held with the Lords, and the Commons stated that the clause was unnecessary; they declined giving any other reason, thinking that reason was sufficient. It appeared to him that this was the usual course. (Hear, hear.)

The Lords' amendments were then disagreed to nem. con. and, on the motion of Lord Castlereagh, a committee was appointed to draw up Reasons.

Shortly afterwards, Mr. Calcraft brought up the report of the committee, and Mr. Bathurst was appointed to go to the Lords to desire the conference.

POOR LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.] Lord Castlereagh rose and said, he regretted that this bill could not be enacted this session, as several amendments had been made by the Lords which would require much consideration. But if he should have the honour of being a member of parliament next year, he would take the earliest opportunity to bring the subject again before the house.

Mr. Wynn expressed much regret that the bill should not be passed this session, and wished that it could be carried with more than the usual rapidity.

Lord Castlereagh said, he could only pledge himself that it should be resumed very early next session.

Mr. Huskisson felt deep regret that the bill had not passed. The amendments, however, might produce considerable discussion, and no instance could be found of a bill of so much importance having been carried through the house with rapidity, otherwise he should have conducted it in the absence of his right hon. friend, great as would be the disadvantage with which he could do so. If the bill had passed into a law, it would have been of great benefit to the country. He regretted that many of its provisions, such as those respecting select vestries, the appointment of overseers, and owners being made liable in some cases, instead of the occupiers of houses, must be postponed even for a few months. Yet, great good would result from the labours of the committee. It was not a radical but a gradual remedy which could be applied to the evils of the poor laws. No fund could be provided which would not create more paupers than it could relieve. The only proper mode of proceeding was, by adopting regulations to check the growth of the system.

COPYRIGHT ACTS.] Mr. Wynn brought up the Report of the committee on the Copyright acts, and moved that it be printed.

Mr. Smyth rose to say, that the resolutions of the committee had been carried by very small majorities, and that he had entirely dissented from those majorities. The first resolution had been carried by a majority only of one, the last by the casting vote of the chairman.

Sir J. Macintosh said, that he had been one of the majority in both instances. His hon. friend behind him had stated, very correctly, that the majorities had been very small. For his hon. friend he entertained the highest respect. On no occasion could any person surpass him in zeal for the claims, real and imaginary, of his constituents. The numbers were, on the first resolution, 6 to 5. Of the 5 who formed the minority, 4 were the representatives of Oxford and Cambridge. For all of them he felt the highest respect, and they filled in that house nearly as respectable a station as it was possible for a representative to hold. But their dissent from those resolutions could not have much authority, considering the interests of their constituents in the question—interests which, for many reasons, and one of considerable force at this time, which he would not mention, more particularly on this occasion, they would pay great attention to. The authority of the 4 members would have great weight where their judgment could be impartially exercised, but, in the present case, it could not be so. The resolutions were, in a technical and parliamentary sense, the resolutions of the committee. Their weight and authority must depend on the reasons which supported them. Neither their justice nor their merits could be decided by the numbers who had dissented from them. Their fate would be determined in the House of Commons upon their own merits.

Lord Palmerston and Mr. Peel hastily rose at once to reply, which occasioned a laugh. The latter gentleman gave way, and the former said, he treated the insinuation that he had not acted with candour and fairness with the contempt which every charge upon the candour and impartiality of members deserved The resolutions had certainly been carried by very small majorities.

Mr. Peel said, he must express his sentiments, notwithstanding the laugh occasioned by his having risen at the same time with the noble lord. He was sorry that the representatives of large and respectable places should be laughed at for defending what they conceived to be the interests of their constituents. He regretted that there was not time this session for some legislative measure on the subject. Great misconception existed. It had been clearly proved, that the Universities had acted with the utmost liberality, and that those very authors who had complained of the act as a grievance, had derived the greatest benefit from it.

Mr. Wynn said, he had not expected any discussion on this subject, and he hoped it would not be persisted in. A very large majority of the committee had been decidedly in favour of the resolutions, but many members had been unavoidably absent. The resolution for restricting the right to five particular bodies had been carried with only one dissenting voice.

Sir J. Macintosh in explanation, said, that his observations had been greatly mistaken, if he had been understood to impute improper motives to any one. As to the remark made by a noble lord, that he treated his insinuations with the contempt they deserved, he begged leave to say, that he did not consider any member who applied such language on such an occasion, as qualified to give him lessons as to his conduct in the house, or in a committee. He had only imputed a partiality which he considered creditable, and which the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Peel) had contended for as his right to exercise. He went farther, and said, that he considered partialities, counteracted by opposite partialities, as the cause of that happy collision of opinions which made that house the most excellent representative assembly that had ever conducted the affairs of a nation.

Lord Palmerston expressed his regret that he had misconceived the hon. and learned gentleman's meaning.

The report was ordered to be printed.

EAST INDIA DOCK COMPANY.] Mr. Benjamin Shaw brought up the report of this committee. It was ordered to be printed.

AMERICAN LOYALISTS.] Mr. W. Smith said, he was desirous of putting a question to the right hon. gentleman opposite, with respect to the old and long contested claims of the American loyalists. He was aware of the financial difficulties of the right hon. gentleman, and he had not, therefore, made any motion on the subject. The claimants were so worn out by suspense, that it were better for them to be deprived altogether not only of their claims but of existence. Four or five suicides had been occasioned by brokenness of heart. He had differed from them in their political opinions, yet, he considered that they had a claim on the faith of the country. He wished to be informed whether any thing would be done for them in the next session.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he felt the force of the observations of the hon. gentleman, but he could not hold out any hopes as to the claims in question.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Saturday, June 6.

ALIEN BILL.] A message from the House of Commons intimated the wish of that House to hold a conference with their lordships on the subject of the alien bill. Their lordships having expressed their intention to send an answer by messengers of their own, the deputation from the House of Commons retired.

The Marquis of Lansdowne, the Duke of Montrose, Earl Grey, the Earl of Liverpool, Lord Redesdale, Lord Manners, and Lord Leinster, were then appointed to attend the conference; and a message was sent by the usher of the black rod to the House of Commons, announcing their lordships' intention to attend the conference in the painted chamber.

After the conference was concluded, the noble lords returned to the House, and the Marquis of Lansdowne reported, that the managers of the Lords had attended the managers of the Commons, and that Lord Binning, on the part of the managers of the Commons, had delivered to them the alien bill, and had stated at the same time, that the Commons disagreed to an amendment made by their lordships to that bill. The Commons declined giving any reason for that disagreement, except that they considered the amendment of their Lordships to be inexpedient. Upon this report being read,

The Earl of Liverpool moved, that "this House do not insist upon its amendment."

The Lord-Chancellor having put the question, Earl Grey rose, and expressed his surprise at the manner in which the report which had just been read had been received. The bill in question had been sent down from that House to the House of Commons, with a clause which had been introduced, with an express allegation that it was indispensable to give effect to the bill, and their lordships were called upon, so important was the clause considered, to dispense with their usual forms, in order that it might be passed with the greater celerity. Notwithstanding this proceeding, however, now that the commons had thought proper to reject the clause, they were called upon, without any explanation, to subscribe to a resolution which militated entirely against their former opinions. For his own part, he thought that the bill was much improved by the omission of this clause; for he could not help coming to the conclusion, that it was not only impolitic, but unjust. He thought, in fact, that every thing which went to render the bill inefficient would be productive of public advantage. (Hear.) But when he recollected that a majority of that house had agreed to the bill in its amended form, he considered that the preservation of their dignity, as a branch of the legislature, demanded some other course than that which had been taken. The House of Commons had not condescended to give any reason for the rejection of their amendment*, and yet, they were called upon, without explanation, to abandon it altogether—to abandon that, without which it had been strongly urged that the bill would be totally ineffective. The noble earl then proceeded to comment upon the impropriety of coming to this determination in the absence of those who had supported the amendment, and who, to maintain their own consistency, ought, at least, to have an opportunity of explaining the grounds upon which they might be inclined to accede to this new proposition. With these feelings, and with a view that the house should take the subject deliberately into their consideration, he begged to move, as an amendment to the motion of the noble lord, "That the farther consideration of this report be deferred to Monday next, and that the lords be summoned."

The question having been put upon this amendment,

The Earl of Liverpool said, that he was not prepared to retract one word of the opinion he had given upon the importance of this clause. Both in point of policy and justice, he considered it necessary to the protection of the natural rights of British subjects. For if it were possible by a trick, such as this clause was meant to guard against, to enable a foreigner to obtain all the rights of a natural-born subject, there would be an end of all their labours for a century past for the maintenance of those rights. There might be different opinions respecting the policy to be adopted in the admission of foreigners to the rights of natural-born subjects. Some might be for excluding them altogether; others for admitting them under regulations more or less rigid; a third opinion might be, that they should be admitted without any limitation. He was not then going to discuss which of those opinions was the most proper for a country to adopt; for, whatever course might be thought preferable with respect to aliens, all would agree that the legislation respecting them ought to be consistent, and that one law ought not to be allowed to counteract all the legislative regulations adopted on the subject of naturalization, so long as it was thought fit that those regulations should be continued. Indeed, when the clause was discussed by their lordships, no one objected to it as a prospective measure; it was only its retrospective operation that had caused a difference of opinion. He could scarcely believe any individual existed who would say, that a law should be suffered to remain in force, by which any foreigner, however hostile and rancorously disposed towards this country, might, at the expense of 80*l*., obtain all the rights of a natural born subject, without taking the oath of allegiance, or submitting to any of the regulations which the legislature thought proper to adopt in passing bills of naturalization. This extraordinary act was not known until April last. He would ask their lordships, whether any of them supposed the existence of a measure by which a foreigner who had purchased stock to the extent of 80*l*. one day, might sell it the next to another, and naturalize him also, and thus make the rapid process of naturalization go on without limitation? He was too well convinced of the loyalty and patriotism of the other house of parliament to suppose that they would not apply a remedy to such a state of things. The reason assigned at the conference, that the commons considered the amendment in the bill inexpedient, warranted the supposition which he had made. This expression of their sentiments supported the opinion, that they would have no objection to accomplish the same object in another way. He had no doubt that the objection of the commons did not apply to the clause substantially, but to its introduction into this particular bill. He therefore thought, that a distinct measure, having the same object, would be approved both by their lordships and by the other house. On that ground he had recommended to their lordships not to insist upon their amendments.

Lord Holland said, that were it not for the state of humiliation in which the house was placed, he should have been disposed to consider the whole proceedings relative to the clause in question rather as a subject for mirth and pleasantry, than for serious consideration. The whole tendency of the noble earl's argument was to prove that their lordships would have acted most preposterously, had they not adopted this clause, and that the Commons had done wrong in refusing to agree to it; and yet he concluded with proposing, that it should now be rejected. The word "inexpedient," it appeared, had damped his courage, and he affected to believe that the Commons, who, he inferred had acted very absurdly, would, notwithstanding, adopt what their lordships were desired to reject. After boasting that he himself had retracted no opinion, he had the singular modesty to ask their lordships to retract theirs. He said, "You must now alter the opinions you have solemnly given on the subject, because the Commons, who have just given a proof of their disapprobation of your opinions, will be sure to take them up as soon as you yourselves reject them." This was a strange sort of reasoning, and full of deep humiliation; but it was in the criminality more than in the inconsistency of the proceeding, that the humiliation was to be found. A gross violation of the rights of property was contained in the clause which the Commons had rejected. The noble earl had more than once spoken of the trick and device by which, he asserted, certain aliens had attempted, since April last, under the Scotch act of parliament, to procure their naturalization; but they had only availed themselves of an existing law; whereas the noble earl, in contradiction to all the principles of law and justice, proposed to deprive them of their property and rights. But let not their lordships "lay the flattering unction to their soul," that this was merely an act of the Scotch parliament. It was no such thing, though, as an act of the Scotch parliament recognized by the Union, it was the law of the United Kingdom. It originated with the Scotch parliament, but it was re-enacted by the British parliament, in the year 1774. The noble earl had called upon any person to say, whether he knew of the existence of this act before the month of April last? Why should the noble earl ask that question, or why suppose that the act was unknown? Was it because the noble earl himself was ignorant of it, that it should be unknown to every other person? (Hear.) But if it were true that nobody knew any thing of the act, that would be a reason, not for adopting the noble earl's motion, but for entering into an inquiry on that point, previously to a full consideration of the whole subject. He knew not by what fatality it happened, but, fortunately, violence and injustice generally defeated their own purpose, and, in this case, ministers had most completely defeated themselves. He wished not to be understood as accusing their lordships of either violence or injustice, but the whole transaction was of such a nature, that it unavoidably excited in his mind the consolatory feeling which he had expressed. It was said, that the clause could not be looked upon as tending to an infraction of the rights of property; that the law being long unknown and dormant, the repeal of it could produce no injury to individuals. This, however, was all gratuitous assumption. It had never been proved that the law was unknown; but, admitting this assertion to be true, that was not a sufficient reason for the clause which their lordships had been induced to adopt. Ignorance of the law did not protect unfortunate men for breaking it, and he did not understand why legislators, who did not know the law which it was their duty to know, should make their ignorance an excuse for depriving other men of their rights. (Hear, hear.) The aliens who had purchased shares in the Bank of Scotland, held that property by the same title that their lordships held their estates, namely, the sanction of law. The measure which the noble earl had supported rendered foreigners mere trustees at the will of the crown, and liable to forfeit any land which they might have purchased. When the noble earl was formerly urging their lordships to adopt the clause, he declared he was quite impatient under the existence of a law, the effect of which was, if acted upon, to give the rights of free-born subjects to any foreigners, without being compelled to take an oath of allegiance, or without an obligation to perform any of the duties of a subject. He was before anxious for its repeal, not only prospectively, but retrospectively; and nothing would satisfy him short of the disfranchisement of all the individuals who had obtained legal rights under the Scotch act, since the 28th of April. Now, however, he was more moderate, he was content to mix a little water with his wine. (A laugh.) The retrospective part of the clause, which he now spoke of as a little matter by the bye, was to be omitted. In fact, the only consistent part of the noble earl's conduct was, his precipitation and impatience. He had been all impatience to get the clause passed, and he was now in an equal hurry to get it rejected. If, however, their lordships must stand in a white sheet on this occasion (a laugh), he thought it becoming that they should go through the work of repentance with due deliberation and solemnity. He would therefore support his noble friend's motion, for the farther consideration of the subject on Monday.

* When the Commons object to any amendment, as affecting their privileges, they usually inform the Lords, that they consider the amendment inexpedient, and "that they decline offering farther reasons." If, however, the Lords do not take this hint, but insist upon their amendment, then the Commons are obliged to explain their meaning more clearly. (3 Hats. 132.)

The Marquis of Lansdowne said, that, upon a former occasion, he admitted that the facility allowed to foreigners by this act of the Scotch parliament should not be allowed to exist. He was still of the same opinion; but he never thought that, in justice, the repeal of it should be prospective, not retrospective. It would be a great injustice, a complete spoliation of rights, to deprive foreigners of those advantages which they enjoyed under an act recognized by the British parliament, and under which they had acquired property. Foreigners became possessed of rights under this act, in the same way as all other rights were obtained—by law. It was attempted to justify the repeal of this act, upon the ground that it had fallen into disuse, and was quite unknown. Such was not the case. The existence of the law was well known, and though persons not immediately interested in it might not have been aware of its existence, it was familiar to many, as well to those who had acquired property under it as to others. The best mode, in his opinion, would be, to adjourn the consideration of this question to a farther period. By that means, they would give time for the introduction of a new bill, which might be carried regularly through all its stages in both houses. What had occurred on this occasion was an addition to the many proofs that the privileges of the two houses of parliament tended greatly to public utility, though their exercise might occasionally be attended with some inconvenience.

The Earl of Harrowby, (who had entered the house while Lord Holland was speaking) supported the motion of his noble friend (the Earl of Liverpool.) He saw no injustice in the measure which had been adopted by the house. A law allowing such facilities to foreigners as the Scotch act of parliament did, should not be allowed to exist. It was nothing more than a private act, passed more than 120 years ago for a local object. It was now brought under the notice of their lordships for a particular purpose, after having for a long time remained forgotten, and almost completely unknown. He did not blame those who had discovered the acts upon which the objection to the amendment of their lordships was founded: but the conduct of the noble lord opposite was most singular; for, after resisting the clause proposed, he now objected to their lordships rescinding it. The noble lord had commented on the word "inexpedient," in the answer of the Commons, to which his noble friend had alluded; but, in fact, that was the common expression employed on such occasions; it was therefore very extraordinary that the noble lord should think fit to found any argument on that word. With regard to what had been said on the subject of the act of 1794, he was persuaded that when that act passed, the tendency of the act of the Scotch parliament must have escaped observation.

Lord Holland said, he perceived that the noble lord who spoke last wished to charge him with inconsistency, while his only object was to rescue the proceedings of the house from that charge. The noble lord ought also to be informed, that he had founded no argument on the word " inexpedient." The noble lord said that was the common expression used on such occasions; if it were so, it was the more extraordinary that the noble lord at the head of the treasury should have quoted that expression, in order to induce their lordships to believe that the Commons had no objection to another measure, distinct from the alien bill. If the noble lord thought fit to speak on entering the house in the middle of a debate, he should take care what arguments he used, for he could not tell how they were to hit. In the present case they went all against the noble lord on the bench beside him. For his part, he could not suppose that the British parliament had so far neglected its duty as to pass the act of 1771, without taking into consideration the Scotch act, which was thereby confirmed. The object of ministers in the retrospective clause was nothing more nor less than to pass an act of pains and penalties without any criminality, or even the allegation of any criminality, against the individuals who were to be affected by that unjust measure.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, that he should not have troubled their lordships with any observations, were it not for some ideas that were thrown out, which he could not allow to pass in silence. The noble earl (Liverpool) had defied any person to say, that he knew this to be the law of the land in April last. He could assure that noble earl, that he was well aware of the existence of such a law. A noble lord, a friend of his, knew that he had stated to him many months back that such was the law. There was not a single director of the Bank of Scotland, or an eminent lawyer connected with that Bank, who was not aware of it. It was not a mere dormant act, or one merely emanating from the parliament of Scotland. It was recognized and confirmed by various acts of the British parliament. It was so recognized in the 14th, the 28th, and 34th of the king. It was said to be a private act: it was no such thing. It had been long acted upon. Many foreigners had purchased property upon the faith of it, and it would be most unjust to deprive them retrospectively of its benefits. It was as public as any act upon the statute-book, but, like many others in which persons were not immediately interested, it had not been adverted to. The noble earl should not conclude, from his own ignorance of it, that others were in the same predicament. For his own part, he was well aware that a law of the kind existed, but he did not consider himself called upon to communicate the circumstance, and he was not sorry that he had given an opportunity for proposing the amendment, which was rejected by the other house.

The House then divided upon Earl Grey's amendment:

Contents 21—Not-Contents 32.

The original motion was then carried.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Saturday, June 6.

ALIEN BILL.] A message from the House of lords requested the attendance of the House to a conference in the Painted Chamber, upon the subject of the disagreement of the house to the lords' amendments of the alien bill.

A committee of managers was appointed, and, on their return from the conference, Lord Binning, on the part of the managers, stated, that the managers on the part of the Lords had been informed, that the Commons considered the amendment by their lordships to be inexpedient, and that they declined offering any farther reasons.

Mr. Canning rose to call the attention of the house to the circumstance of a misrepresentation, which he might say was unprecedented since he had had the honour of a seat in parliament, and probably so in the recollection of most members who heard him. This misrepresentation occurred in a statement purporting to be an account of what took place in the house last night, in that part of the debate on the consideration of the lords' amendments to the alien bill, where, after an hon. and learned gentleman (Sir A. Piggott) had objected to those amendments, as affecting the privileges of the house, he (Mr. Canning) appealed to the Chair for an opinion on the question. In a newspaper of this morning there was not only a report of what then occurred, but a comment of a nature which, as it affected a particular member, or the privileges of the house in general, was most offensive, far exceeded the usual latitude allowed in such cases, and could never be tolerated. It would be in the recollection of the house, that when this point of form arose, he, after making a few observations, put a question to the Chair, saying, he was willing to rest the issue on its decision; and it was in the description of the tone and manner in which he was said to have delivered his sentiments on that occasion, and made this appeal, that he thought the house implicated, and he, individually, had reason to complain. In the report itself there was no unfairness or misrepresentation. It stated the substance of what he said, and gave the view that he took, as correctly as such reports are generally given; but nothing could be more unfair than the comment which followed, and which described him as treating the objection of the hon. and learned gentleman as absurd, and confidently and triumphantly appealing to the Chair for a confirmation of his opinion, and, in expectation of a different answer from that which he received. The words to which he alluded, and of which he complained, were these:—" It will be recollected that a clause was introduced into it by the Lords, invalidating the effect of a law derived originally from Scotland, whereby it was first enacted, that the purchasers of stock in the Bank of that country should be deemed naturalized; and afterwards, by the act of Union, the naturalized subjects of one country were in future to be admitted to equal rights in the other. This law, we say, was, by an express clause in the Alien bill, to be set aside: but it was last night discovered and argued in the Commons, that such a clause, having relation to money-concerns—to the money-concerns of the subject—could only originate in that house. A debate ensued, in which Mr. Canning treated the idea, then first started, as absurd; triumphantly and confidently declaring, that he should be content to put the question to the Speaker, and to be decided by him (being, as he is, the constitutional watchman of the Commons' rights), whether the present was a money transaction at all, within the purview of that law which makes it necessary to originate all such in the Commons. There is such a thing as 'reckoning without your host;' and here it appears that Mr. Canning did so reckon; for the Speaker, thus appealed to, declared his opinion that the clause in question was of such a nature as to render its origination in the Lords irregular and illegal." Now, Sir, (said the right hon. gentleman,) what passed on the occasion alluded to, passed in a house as full as at present, and I can confidently and triumphantly put it to your recollection, and to that of the members who then attended, whether the manner in which I stated my sentiments, the expressions which I used, and the tone in which I made the appeal, were not the very reverse of those here described; and whether any man who heard me could, without doing it falsely, perversely, and malignantly, convey to the public the representation which I have read. I can not only rest the matter on the impression of the house, but I can appeal to you whether, from previous communication on the point at issue, I had not good reason, at the time when I put the question, for believing what was your opinion; and whether, so far from entertaining a confident hope of eliciting from the Chair an answer contrary to what was given, I had not a perfect anticipation of what that answer would be. It is not my intention to found any farther proceeding on this subject. I think it enough to have pointed out the misrepresentation, in order to induce greater caution in future. I am of opinion, that great good must and does result from the publication of the proceedings of this house; but it is not too much to require in those who communicate them to the public, a respect for truth, and an attention to correctness; and it is not to be tolerated, that they should impute motives or represent conduct without the least shadow of fact for their statements.

Mr. Speaker said, that though he could not, without great delicacy, touch on any thing in which he was personally concerned, he owed it to the house and to the right hon. gentleman on this appeal, to confirm every thing which he had stated. When a question arose about the forms of the house, on which, from his situation, he might be supposed to deliver his opinion, he thought it due from him to communicate his impressions either to the house, or to any individual member of either side who might make the appeal to him. He had accordingly, on being asked by the right hon. gentleman his opinion, mentioned it to him previously to its being stated to the house; and he would have done so to any other member; convinced that, by concealing his impressions on matters of form from any member, he should be doing what was neither consistent with courtesy, or right. (Hear, hear.)

A member asked the name of the newspaper alluded to.

Mr. Canning said, "The Times."

Mr. Brougham concurred in the statement, that nothing could be more distant from a true representation of what had occurred than the comment which had been read. He had a perfect recollection of the circumstances, and could say, that the tone in which the right hon. gentleman delivered his sentiments on the Alien bill, and in the appeal to the Chair, was incorrectly stated. He was glad to hear from the right hon. gentleman, a liberal admission of the benefit to be derived from free discussion and the unrestrained publication of what occurred in the house; but comments of the sort alluded to, when inaccurate, were very much to be reprobated. He himself had reason to be dissatisfied with similar comments on what he had said, though he always felt reluctant to complain. On a late occasion, he was said to have made an attack on a great law officer, and then to have retracted it; whereas, it would be in the recollection of the house, that what were called the attack and the retractation referred to different things, and that neither the one nor the other existed; he, speaking of the court in the one case, and of the character of the individual at the head of it in the other.

Here the conversation ended.

Mr. Tierney said, the house had now been for some minutes without any business before it. He wished to know from the noble lord whether any measure was to be brought forward to-day, which required so full an attendance, or whether they had been convened on a Saturday only to have the pleasure of sitting to look at each other. If the noble lord had any measure to propose, he would perhaps state the nature of it now, that the house might be prepared for it whenever it was brought forward.

Lord Castlereagh said, it appeared to his Majesty's government that it was not fit the law should remain in the state in which it was now, with respect to continuing the privilege of naturalization, on the smallest purchase of stock in the Bank of Scotland; he should therefore, on Monday next, introduce a bill on this subject: it would be a short bill, to suspend the operation of the Scotch act in favour of aliens purchasing such stock till the next session. The bill would have no retrospective provisions, and he did not think it would lead to much discussion.

MARRIAGE OF THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.] Lord Castlereagh, after apologizing to the house for not having brought forward earlier the motions with which he meant to conclude, moved, "That an humble address be presented to His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, to offer the dutiful congratulations of this house to His Royal Highness, on the happy nuptials of His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge with the Princess of Hesse, youngest daughter of the Landgrave Frederick, and niece of the Elector of Hesse; and to assure His Royal Highness of the sincere and heartfelt satisfaction which this house derives from a circumstance that must add so much domestic happiness to His Majesty's family."

This motion was agreed to, nemine contradicente.

The noble lord then moved, "That this house do congratulate Her Majesty on the happy nuptials of His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge with the Princess of Hesse, youngest daughter of the Landgrave Frederick, and niece of the Elector of Hesse."

This motion was agreed to, nem. con. and Mr. Disbrowe was ordered to attend Her Majesty with this congratulation.

The noble lord next moved, "That a Message be sent from this house to congratulate their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, on their happy nuptials."

This motion was also agreed to, nem. con. and Lord Edward Somerset, Lord John Thynne, Sir Edward Stopford, Mr. Littleton, Lord Viscount Clive, the Marquis of Worcester, the Earl of March, and Lord Viscount Valletort, were ordered to attend the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge with the said message.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, June 8.

STANDING ORDERS.] Lord Sidmouth rose to give notice, that he would to-morrow move to suspend the Standing Order No. 104. If their lordships agreed to that motion, it would then be in their power to suspend any other Standing Order which would otherwise prevent them passing any bill which might come under their consideration through all its stages in one day.

Lord Holland said, it would be necessary for their lordships well to consider how far the noble lord's motion might lead them, if it should be adopted. The suspending of the Order No. 104, would enable any person to-morrow to procure the suspension of all the Standing Orders.

Lord Sidmouth was aware that, when this Order should be suspended, any noble lord might move the suspension of the other Standing Orders; but it would be for their lordships to decide on that proposition. The sole object of his notice was, to enable their lordships to pass any bill which might come before them to-morrow, through its several stages on the same day, if such a proceeding should be thought necessary.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, his noble friend was perfectly right in the objection he had made. The suspending of the Order No. 104, would put it in the power of any of their lordships to suspend all the remaining Standing Orders. It was very extraordinary that such a notice as that given by the noble lord should have come from him at the present time. The suspension of the Standing Order was never proposed except when there was before their lordships some legislative proceeding, with a view to facilitate which the proposition was made. At present there was no appearance of any ground for the motion of which the noble lord had given notice.

The Earl of Liverpool acknowledged that it was the general practice, in respect to propositions of the nature of that of which his noble friend had given notice, to make them with a view to a particular bill. He believed, however, that there were some precedents of motions which, like the present notice, did not go to suspend the Standing Orders for forwarding any particular bill, but this particular Order, No. 104, which said, that no Standing Order should be suspended without a day's notice of the motion to that effect being given. It was true, as the noble lord had said, that it would, after the suspension of that Order, be in the power of any individual to propose the suspension of all the other Orders: but he had a better opinion of the house than to suppose that such a course would be adopted; as he knew that their lordships would be guided on that, as on every other question, by a view to the public interest.

Lord Holland said, he did not mean to throw any impediment in the way of the measure which the noble lord had in view, but he thought it would be better if the notice of the noble lord expressed not merely the suspension of the Standing Order No. 104, but the object for which that suspension was proposed.

The Earl of Lauderdale recommended, that the suspension of the Standing Orders which were framed with the view of preventing any bill from passing through more than one stage on the same day, should be specified in the notice.

After some farther conversation, it was agreed that the notice should be given for the suspension of the three Standing Orders Nos. 26, 104, and 125.

The lords were then ordered to be summoned to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, June 8.

MARRIAGE OF THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.] Mr. Disbrowe appeared at the bar, and reported the answer of her Majesty to the Message of Congratulation of the 6th instant, as follows:—

"I receive with satisfaction the congratulations of the House of Commons on the marriage of my son the Duke of Cambridge with the Princess of Hesse, youngest daughter of the Landgrave Frederick, and niece of the Elector of Hesse.

"This fresh proof of their attachment is highly grateful to my feelings."

Lord Edward Somerset reported the answer of the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, as follows:—

"We return the House of Commons our thanks for their very obliging attention on this occasion."

EDUCATION COMMITTEE.] Mr. Brougham brought up a Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the Abuses of Charitable Institutions for the Education of the Poor. On moving that it be printed, he begged to mention a case, which had come to the knowledge of the committee since he made his statement on a former occasion. It was the case of an abuse in the county of Huntingdon. In the reign of Edward II. land had been bequeathed for the use of a school. It was then of the estimated value of 35*l.* It consisted of 145 acres, in the neighbourhood of a large and populous town. Its present rent was only 160*l.*, although its value, according to the lowest estimate, was within a trifle of 800*l.* a-year. Who were the lessors of this estate? The mayor and twelve aldermen of the borough. Who were the trustees? The mayor and twelve aldermen. Who were the lessees, who derived the benefit of possessing the land at a rent so diminished? The mayor and twelve aldermen of the borough. These gentlemen were the lessors, the trustees, and the lessees of this estate, all in one. In this borough the right of voting was in the burgesses. The burgesses were chosen by the mayor and aldermen. Now, under whatever circumstances a burgess might be chosen, when he became a burgess he remained so. "Once a burgess, always a burgess." It could not be expected, therefore, that these voters would always vote the right way, unless there were means of keeping them in order. Those means were very simple. It was necessary for the convenience of these voters, that they should be in possession of some of the lands, and the mayor and aldermen gave to each of them such a portion as was deemed expedient. Of course, there was never such a thing as a contested election in the borough.—Such was the abuse of this charity; and it was marvellous that this, the grossest of all the cases of robbing the poor which had come to the knowledge of the committee, was exempted from the control of the commission appointed by the bill, in consequence of that most fatal clause which had been introduced, exempting from the visit of that commission all charities which had special visitors. It really seemed as if that case had been sent to the committee to fill up every vacancy in his arguments against the alterations in the bill. Who were the visitors in this case? The mayor and aldermen themselves, the trustees, lessors and lessees, who had abused the trust, and robbed the poor for their own interest. He would ask, after this statement, whether any man could pretend to doubt, that the bill, if not altogether, had been almost entirely frittered away and destroyed by the alterations which had been made? All that he could say was, that they ought not to sit and slumber, but to supply the great deficiencies which those alterations had occasioned, and he hoped that a bill would be passed, early in the next session, for that purpose. (Hear, hear.)

The report was ordered to be printed*.

ALIENS AND DENIZENS BILL.] Lord Castlereagh rose and said, that the house had that evening received a message from the house of lords, stating, that their lordships did not insist on their amendments to the alien bill. As the objections to the clause which had been added by the lords were not founded on any hostility to the general scope of the measure, but on its being an invasion of the privileges of the house of commons, and on its containing a provision of a retrospective nature, he now felt it his duty to propose a bill to alter the law which allowed foreigners to obtain all the privileges of naturalization, merely by the purchase of the stock of a banking company. He was persuaded that the house would agree with him, that this was a state of the law which ought not to be suffered to exist in this country. It would certainly have been his duty to propose a permanent arrangement of this dangerous and anomalous state of the law, if the session had not been so near a close, and if the subject had not been one which required a good deal of consideration. It appeared, that, besides the privileges conferred on the alien purchasers of Bank of England stock, there were some corporations in the united kingdom which had the faculty, not of absolutely naturalizing foreigners who became members of them, but of making them denizens, without the consent of the crown. The legislature never could have intended that foreigners, by the payment of a small sum to these bodies, and without any other qualification, should be admitted into the constitution; and therefore he apprehended, that it would be necessary to take up the subject at an early period of the next session, and to adopt measures which would prevent such high privileges from being obtained by means wholly incommensurate to them. The bill which he now proposed to introduce was so framed, that he could not anticipate any opposition to it. He conceived that it would be better to suspend the law for a short and limited period, and then every thing which the parties interested might have to submit to parliament, might be taken into consideration more fully hereafter. On these grounds he trusted that the house would consent to pass the bill through all its stages that day. No harm could result from such a proceeding, and therefore he concluded with moving, "that leave be given to bring in a bill, to prevent aliens, for a time to be limited, from becoming naturalized, or from being made, or becoming denizens, except in certain cases."

Sir J. Macintosh said, he should not oppose the motion of the noble lord. The principle of the measure that had been before proposed, was an outrage on the constitution, and calculated to violate all principles of justice; it was equally subversive of public credit, injurious to private property, and fatal to every right that was dear to this country. But, as that objectionable and abominable part of the measure had been withdrawn, he was ready to acknowledge that something ought to be done on this subject. He was far from saying that the mode of naturalization in question ought to exist. He thought it an unreasonable and unconstitutional regulation, and should have no objection to its removal as an absurd enactment. But, though he had no objections to a deliberate measure, he should be very scrupulous in adopting any hasty step, especially after the gross blundering and mistakes that had been committed by ministers during the last fourteen days. He did not intend to waste much of the time of the house, but he could not help calling to mind the liberality and friendly policy which had been used towards foreigners formerly, compared with what was the practice of the present government. He hoped the house would not pass the act in the vague and general way in which it at present stood. He submitted, whether it would not be proper to allow the names of the companies to which allusion had been made to be inserted in the bill. Why should the house have nothing but a general assertion that such companies existed? Why should they have words so sweeping, which seemed to lead to no conclusion but one—that the

* It appears by the Report of the Committee, that the charity here alluded to by the hon. and learned member is that of St. John's Hospital, in the town of Huntingdon. On the 8th of June, Mr. Samuel Wells, a solicitor at Huntingdon, was examined before the committee, and he states, that the hospital was founded in the reign of Edw. II. by David, earl of Huntingdon, and, by an inquisition taken in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, it was found, that the hospital was endowed for the purpose of a free grammar school for the town of Huntingdon.—The rev. —— Edwards is the schoolmaster, but he teaches no boys upon the foundation of the hospital. he is a burgess and a voter, and the trustees have suffered him to build a large boarding school, he contends he has nothing to do but to teach Latin, and he charges the scholars for other things.—The corporation are the special visitors of the hospital.—Mr. Wells then states, that the corporation and burgesses are all under the influence of Lord Sandwich, whose interest consists in land near the town common. In 1810, this gentleman filed an information against the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses, at the relation of Thomas Allnutt, Esq. and others, and he is still proceeding against them. Towards the close of his examination, he is asked, "Have you found the expenses of the proceedings in the Court of Chancery to be very great?" To this he replies, "Yes, enormous, above 1000*l.*; and, in addition to the attempts they have made to make me miserable, they have rendered my life very uncomfortable during the proceedings."

noble lord was so uninformed that he was afraid of attempting to enumerate the companies or corporations, lest he should not describe all the cases which it was desirable to comprehend in the bill?—In the committee he should certainly propose an amendment, to remove from the statute-book the disgrace of employing those vague and unsatisfactory terms, for no other reason than that the authors of the bill were not able to furnish the particulars.

The Attorney-General said, that the acquisition of the privilege of denizenship by aliens, was not confined to the purchase of the stock of certain corporate bodies. Certain acts of the parliament of Ireland gave rights almost as extensive as those given by the Scotch act. The question for the house to determine was, as there would not be time in the present session to look through the various statutes, whether it would not be wise to pass a law suspending the operation of these rights for a limited time, and to leave it for a future parliament to consider, whether they should be altered or revoked.

Mr. W. Smith said, he had decidedly reprobated the clause introduced into the alien bill by the house of lords; but the present measure had his entire concurrence.

Mr. Wynn said, he had also objected to the clause, not only because it was an encroachment on the privileges of the house of commons, but also because it was a measure of confiscation repugnant to every principle of law and justice. To the present proposition he had no objection whatever. If such powers existed as those to which it referred, it was proper that they should be suspended until parliament could at leisure consider them.

Sir W. Burroughs said, he should not oppose the present measure; he considered it reasonable and expedient.

Mr. Brougham expressed his approbation of the bill. He begged, however, to suggest one alteration which the noble lord would, he hoped, agree to. It was understood that the measure was to be strictly prospective. In order, then, to make it clearly a prospective measure, he thought that, instead of "from and after the passing of this act," it would be advisable to say, "from and after Thursday," or "Friday." It should be recollected, that the place where the purchases of stock were to be made was 400 miles from this metropolis. Suppose on Wednesday morning next, an alien in Edinburgh, who could not by possibility have heard what were the provisions of the bill, should purchase stock. He would be a naturalized subject. Suppose he then purchased a landed estate—the consequence of enacting that the operation of this bill should commence immediately after the passing of the act, would be, that, although the bill did not profess to be retrospective, but only prospective, the alien would incur the forfeiture of his land. If the alteration which he had suggested were made, he should not object to the suspension of the standing orders, which were a great protection to the subject, and ought not to be waved on slight grounds.

General Mitchell said, he had been in the city that day, and had heard orders given within the last two hours by aliens at the Bank of England, for the purchase of stock in the Bank of Scotland, no doubt with a view of defeating the present bill.

The bill was brought in, and read a first time. On the motion for the second reading,

Lord Castlereagh said, that if the house were to adopt the suggestion of the hon. and learned gentleman, a great number of most obnoxious individuals, who ought not to be allowed the privileges of British subjects, would, in the interval, obtain the object they had in view, and be placed beyond the reach of parliament. The period, after which no orders for purchase of stock should be considered as bonâ fide, ought at least to be carried back to Saturday, when he gave notice of his intention to introduce this bill. But he would contend, that the proposing of the clause in the other house was a complete notice to all parties who wished to purchase stock, that if they did so, they would do it at their peril.

Mr. Brougham protested against the noble lord's doctrine of notices. What was the notice of the noble lord more than the notice of any other member in the house? It was true, that the retrospective operation of the measure did not extend to a whole month, as formerly, but only to 48 hours; but the one was as dangerous in principle as the other. The noble lord had said, that from the moment the attention of parliament was called to a measure, from that moment the rights of individuals might be affected by the acts of the legislature. If that doctrine were sanctioned by the house, there would be no security for property. If the rights of individuals were to be taken away, they ought, at least, to be taken away by a prospective operation.

Mr. Canning said, it was not contended by his noble friend that a notice of a motion should be considered as binding on the subjects of this country; but when the object of that motion was one respecting which there was and could be no difference of opinion—no person could conceive that the measure respecting which such notice was given would not be adopted by the house. Let the individuals who might consider they had suffered from the present measure, come forward in the next session and state the case to the house, and, after hearing their statement, parliament would determine whether any compensation should be made for the injury done to them in carrying into effect a great national object.

Lord Folkestone said, that the conduct of ministers exhibited on this occasion the same inconsistency which had marked it throughout the whole of the last and present sessions. One of them had lately argued, that this measure ought to have a retrospective effect, but now they came down and proposed it without that which was said to be essential to it. How could the house and the country confide in those who committed such gross blunders and mistakes as the gentlemen opposite had been compelled to acknowledge?

General Thornton said, that if purchasing Bank of Scotland stock gave foreigners a right to sit in that house, he hoped that ministers would make the measure so far retrospective as to deprive them of that right.

The bill was then read a second time, committed, reported, read a third time, and passed*.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, June 9.

STATE OF THE CURRENCY.] The Earl of Lauderdale said, he thought it necessary at this period of the session to remind the noble lords opposite of the state of the currency. He had already more than once alluded to the injurious consequences of the disparity in the value of gold and silver established by the late coinage; and it now appeared, from the regular publication of the prices, that at the present price of gold, 1½ per cent. could be gained by the exchange of silver for that metal. The gold coin was consequently driven out of circulation, and it was quite impossible that the Bank could resume payments in specie on the expiration of the present act, unless some measure for regulating the coinage should be adopted at an early period of the next session†.

ALIENS AND DENIZENS BILL.] Mr. Brogden, and other members, brought up this bill from the Commons.

Lord Sidmouth moved that the bill should be read a first time.—The noble viscount stated, that the object of the bill was, to prevent any alien, under the Scotch act of 1695 for establishing the Bank of Scotland, or under acts relative to other corporations, from becoming denizens in virtue of such acts previously to the 25th of March next. The bill would merely suspend the operation of those statutes, and afford an opportunity next session for the due consideration of any proposition for the repeal of the Scotch act of 1695, and other acts of a similar nature.—In order that the bill might pass through the subsequent stages, he moved the suspension of the Standing Orders, agreeably to the notice he had given.

Lord Holland said, he thought that the noble lord had raised the precedents for suspending the Standing Orders too far when he applied them to the present measure. Shortness of time was not a sufficient reason for such a proceeding; it could be justified only by some urgent necessity. (Here the noble lord desired the clerk to read the Order, No. 24. in order to confirm his statement. This being done, he proceeded to comment on the bill.) Though he did not mean to oppose the measure itself, he could not help remarking on the extraordinary conduct of ministers respecting it. They had declared themselves totally ignorant of an important law, and had presumed, that every individual in parliament had been equally ignorant of it. But if they shewed ignorance at the outset, they manifested still more in the progress of the measure. They began to apprehend, that there were possibly other acts besides that which had at first alarmed them, which it would be necessary for them to suspend. Those laws, however, they could not point out; but, without specifying them, it was proposed, contrary to every principle of legislation and justice, that they also should be taken away. Another instance of their ignorance was, the assertion, that under the Scotch act of parliament, any alien who purchased stock would thereby be enabled to sit in parliament, contrary to the act by which foreigners were excluded. This was far from being the fact: for, by an act of parliament, not of that private and local description which this Scotch act had been described to be, but one of the most public and important nature—he meant the act of the 6th of Queen Anne, cap. 7,—it was provided, that every person disabled from sitting in the parliament of Ireland should be rendered incapable of sitting in the parliament of Great Britain. This he did not urge as an argument against the bill, but to shew their lordships how cautious they ought to be in adopting legislative proceedings, on the recommendation of ministers, who proved themselves so completely ignorant of every thing connected with the subject on which they proposed to legislate. What had occurred on this occasion reminded him of the advice once given him by an eminent person, a relative of his, whose memory he regarded with affection and veneration. That person observed to him, equally wisely and truly, that, "when politically in the dark, the best thing that could be done was to stand still." Contrary to this prudent maxim, it was the practice of ministers, whenever they were in the dark, to run straight forward, not caring against what they might run their heads, or whom they might overturn. It was difficult to say what might be the consequences of this blindly adopted measure. It might be a question, whether it would not take away the rights of English children born between this and the 25th of March, who would otherwise be natural born subjects, and whether it did not take away the rights of the descendants of the princess Sophia of Hanover. He did not say that it had those effects, and he thought it had not; but still there appeared much doubt and obscurity on the face of the measure, and, if time were allowed, many errors in framing it might be corrected. It was now discovered that there were certain laws in Ireland by which foreigners were admitted to become denizens. There might be several other Scotch acts and English acts also to which the bill applied; but ministers remained in total ignorance respecting all the acts which they proposed to repeal or suspend. But the flagrant injustice of the retrospective clause in the former bill was what he had most objected to. That objection, he was glad to find, was now in a great measure removed, though even as the bill now stood, it appeared to cast "a longing lingering look behind" towards the old injustice. He could not see that persons who purchased stock for the express purpose of naturalization, under a law authorizing that object, were less entitled to the rights so acquired, than those who had purchased it without that view, and found themselves accidentally naturalized. He, therefore, did not approve of the clause which fixed the commencement of the operation of the bill now, rather than at three or four days after it had passed. There was another objection which might be urged against this bill; but so little time was allowed for considering its bearing, that he could not venture to speak positively on the effect of any of its provisions. It might be a mere misapprehension in him, but he conceived it probable, from the preamble of the bill, that it might trench on some of the prerogatives of the crown with respect to aliens. But no part of the prerogative, their lordships knew, could be taken away without a recommendation from the crown. It would, however, complete the climax of ignorance on the part of ministers, if, after proving themselves ignorant of the Scotch act of 1695, of the practice of parliament relative to amendments of several Irish and English acts, they should finally manifest their ignorance of the prerogatives of the crown. He defied their lordships to see at present all the effects of this bill. He agreed, that it was proper to do something in the state in which the law stood, but he could not come to the conclusion that this was the measure which ought to be adopted. Their lordships had witnessed the lamentable ignorance of ministers on this subject; and it must therefore be difficult for them to place reliance on persons who had, within a few days, so often changed their opinions on this subject. He, in general, disapproved of the course of proceedings which had been adopted, but as the retrospective clause was removed from the bill he should not object to its passing.

* In the course of the debates on this subject, the Editor has taken the liberty of making a few observations on the right of prohibiting foreigners from coming to, and remaining in, this country. If he might venture now to state the result of his researches and reflections on this important question, he would observe, that this right does not belong to the king, but, as Lord Coke declares, (see note, p. 1786) to the legislature.—It has been always considered, that one of the chief duties of humanity is, that every country should afford an asylum to strangers who are driven by violence out of their own. In a former note (p. 1838), the Editor has cited the divine law, and the practice of Henry IV. of France, and of Queen Elizabeth. The opinions of the ancients on this point are extremely worthy of consideration. Homer says, the Poor and Stranger are the care of Jove; and again, the suppliant Stranger craves a brother's love. In Lucian (de Dea Syria) amongst the crimes which brought Deucalion's flood upon the world, we find it mentioned, "that they did not receive Strangers." In Livy (l. 41. c. 24.) the decree of the Achæans, by which they forbade the Macedonians to enter their territories, is called, execrabilis, velut desertio Juris Humani, as it were a detestable desertion of the law of human nature. —At the same time it must be admitted, that Strangers are bound to submit to the established government, and, as Grotius (lib. 2. c. 2. s. 16.) and Puffendorf (lib. 3. c. 3. s. 10.) observe, they must beh[illegible] the[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] prude[illegible] [illegible] as to administer no occasion to factions and seditions.—Now, in this country, there are laws to punish crimes committed by the subject, and the same laws will punish crimes committed by a stranger. Why, then, should not strangers be suffered to come to this country, and to reside in it, under the responsibility of keeping the laws? It is said, that the ordinary mode of proceeding in such cases would be too circuitous with respect to strangers. But why so? Is greater danger to be apprehended from a stranger than from a natural-born subject? Arbitrary power is liable to great abuse, and is always to be suspected. Nor ought any man to be offended at the suspicion which it creates. No man can undertake to say that he will not abuse it. —Lord Digby, in his speech (Jan. 19, 1640), on the Bill for preventing Inconvenience happening by the long intermission of Parliaments, said, "It hath been a maxim among the wisest legislators, that whosoever means to settle good laws, must proceed in them with a sinister opinion of all mankind, and suppose, that whosoever is not wicked, it is for want only of the opportunity. It is that opportunity of being ill, that we must take away, if ever we mean to be happy."

† On the 17th of September, 1818, a general meeting was held of the proprietors of the Bank, conformably to the provisions of the charter, for the purpose of declaring the half-yearly dividend, and of transacting such business as might be depending.—Mr. Young observed, that he was anxious to press upon the attention of the Directors, in whose honour and humanity he placed the fullest confidence, the propriety of withdrawing from circulation the one and the two pound notes, with a view to the diminution of forgery. The Governor (G. Dorrien, Esq.) remarked, that this was a subject for the consideration of the Legislature, and must depend on the renewal or expiration of the Restriction act. At the same time he might say, that if any objection existed against the resumption of cash-payments, it was not among the Bank directors that such objection originated or was entertained.

The Standing Orders were suspended, the bill read a second time, and the motion for committing it negatived. It was then read a third time.—On the question that it do pass, Earl Grey said, he could not permit a proceeding fraught with such dangerous consequences to take place, without entering his protest against its being made a precedent. Ministers, he was aware, had placed themselves in a situation of difficulty. He alluded to the general belief of the speedy dissolution of parliament.

He was aware that, at such a time, delay might be attended with much inconvenience, as the country was making preparations for the new elections: but, notwithstanding that inconvenience, he should have been disposed rather to meet it, than to run the risk of establishing any precedent of this kind. The Standing Orders ought only to be suspended on questions of great public importance, and not merely for the sake of expedition. The principle on which they were to be suspended was, that the measure was of such urgency that delay would be attended with injury to the public interest. Now, this could not be said to be the case with respect to the present bill; for no danger to the public could arise, whether it were passed this day, or a week hence. It could not be said to be a measure of such necessity as to require so extraordinary a departure from the usual course of their proceedings. Ministers had acted most improperly on this occasion, in not proposing the measure to parliament at a time when it might have received full consideration; and nothing could be more disgraceful than the ignorance which they had displayed throughout the whole proceeding. They had now reached the last stage of the bill, when the noble and learned lord on the woolsack had only to put the question that it do pass, and yet, those who had proposed the measure had not, and could not explain what acts of the legislature it repealed, and what right of the subject it took away. When the former bill was before the house, the noble and learned lord on the woolsack had proposed to word the clause so as to do away all modes of naturalization, except by act of parliament. He had objected to this; and the noble and learned lord did him the honour to allow the full weight of his objection. He would now ask the noble lords, whether they knew the extent and bearing of their own measure? Was there ever an instance in that house of a measure of such importance being brought forward, of the extent and bearing of which the ministers who proposed it appeared to be ignorant, or, at least, would not explain them? He remembered, on the occasion of a bill being brought some years ago from the other house of parliament, the object of which bill had his concurrence, as it was to relieve persons who differed from the doctrine of the church of England from certain severe penalties, that the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, and another noble and learned lord, objected to its repealing all penalties under acts of parliament which were not specified. Now, this was precisely the objection which he made to the present bill. It was for the house to determine whether they would now establish a precedent for thus rashly repealing acts of parliament. The rights of foreign seamen serving in the navy, of foreign protestants settled in the colonies, and of foreign protestants serving in troops in the colonies, were, according to the bill, saved; but were these the only rights that might be affected? There were several acts of parliament inviting foreigners to settle in Ireland, with a view to the political interests of that country. Were their lordships certain that those acts could be repealed without a breach of faith? It was provided in some of them, that they should take effect under the licence of the Lord Lieutenant, but those acts were not saved by any exception in this bill. It was a serious consideration, that the persons whose rights were suspended, might, before the 25th of March, be sent out of the country on the information of some of those miscreants whom ministers encouraged and associated with—a practice, he thought, no less disgraceful, than it was unconstitutional*.—They might thus be placed in a situation never to be able to prosecute their rights. This was a case in which the wholesome rules framed for the security of the rights of individuals and the public interest had been set aside; and, therefore, to satisfy his conscience, he could not permit the bill to pass without expressing his disapprobation of the rashness with which it was framed, and protesting against the course by which it was passed becoming a precedent.

* The following curious Copy of a Licence to a Spy is taken from a book published in the beginning of the last century, entitled "Memoirs of John Ker, of Kersland:"

"ANNE R.—Whereas we are fully sensible of the fidelity and loyalty of John Ker, of Kersland, Esq. and of the services he hath performed to us and our government; we therefore grant him our royal leave and license to keep company and to associate himself with such as are disaffected to us and our government, in such way or manner as he shall judge most for our service. Given under our Royal hand, at our Castle of Windsor, the 7th of July, 1707, and of our reign the sixth year."

The policy of one of the best of the Roman emperors appears to have been of a very different nature. Mr. (afterwards Lord Chancellor) Somers, in his tract, entitled "Security of Englishmen's Lives," &c. says, "Trajan was an excellent prince, endowed with all heroical virtues, yet the most eloquent writers, and his best friends, found nothing more to be praised in his government, than that in his time, all men might think what they pleased, and every man speak what he thought, and he had no better way of distinguishing himself from his wicked predecessors, than by hanging up the Spies and Informers whom they had employed for the discovery of crimes."

Mr. Wilberforce says, that "any country must suffer ten times more by the employment, than by the want of Spies. By the use of such instruments, government may be able to detect some treasons which would otherwise escape punishment; but that advantage is much more than counterbalanced by the evils that ensue.—Let the practice not be defended on the ground that it is necessary for the preservation of the public peace. No! no! the British empire does not stand in need of such assistance to maintain its security; it disclaims all connexion with such allies. Our liberties, our rights, and our tranquillity, stand on the principles of law and the constitution, and despise the aid or the countenance of such base associates." (See pages 336—337.)

The Earl of Liverpool said, there were numerous instances in which the Standing Orders had been suspended, merely for the sake of expedition, without any reference to the importance of the measure. The Standing Orders, however, could not be suspended without a day's previous notice, and in this their lordships had a sufficient security against surprise. When it was agreed that the Orders should not be suspended without a day's notice, their lordships expressed an opinion that they might be suspended at any time, without reference to the importance of the measure. But he was not disposed to rest the question on this ground only. Independently of any expectation of a dissolution of parliament, if it could have been calculated that the house might sit a month on this bill, it would, in that case, have been necessary either to suspend the Standing Orders, and pass the bill with the same rapidity as now, or to give it a retrospective effect. If it should have been neglected to do one or other of these things, there would soon have been no alien in the country to be affected by the bill. They would all have been naturalized under the act relative to the Scotch bank. He, therefore, maintained, that if there ever was a case of necessity, though he did not agree that necessity must always be made out in order to warrant the suspension of the Standing Orders, this was one. As to the objection, that the acts affected by the bill were not specified, that would be very worthy of consideration, if there were time for inquiry. It was, however, agreed on all hands, that the mode of naturalization taken away by the bill ought not to exist, and yet, it was not repealed, but only suspended. The noble lord had asked what rights the measure took away; in fact it affected none. It only suspended for a time the capacity of acquiring rights. Their lordships would agree with him, that it was not fit persons should acquire the rights of naturalization, except in a regular and definite manner; and, to prevent the infringement of that principle, was the sole object of this measure.

Earl Spencer said, he must join with his noble friend in protesting against this unjustifiable measure. He complained of the manner in which it had been introduced, by a clause tacked to the end of a bill, and hurried through the house without any previous discussion whatever. When he saw all the errors that had been committed through excessive haste, when he saw the present bill proposed in so precipitate a manner, he thought it constituted a precedent that ought on no account to be established. If it had been retrospective, it would have been still more objectionable; and he still thought, that no evil whatever could arise from its postponement, even under the present qualified form.

Lord Holland, alluding to the plea of necessity that had been so strongly insisted on by the noble earl (Liverpool), advised him to be a little more chary in the use of it, and to reserve it, like Goliah's sword, only to be brought forward on urgent occasions. It was but three or four days ago that the noble earl had maintained with the utmost pertinacity, that it was absolutely necessary for the safety of England, and the peace of Europe, that the bill should have a retrospective effect. Since that period, however, the noble lord had been able to lay his head on his pillow, without suffering much from fear of the terrible effects that must follow if the retrospective operation of the bill should be entirely done away. He, therefore, could put very little trust in the soundness or sincerity of any arguments which the noble earl might adduce on the score of necessity. As to the argument which the noble earl had urged from the immediate expectation of a dissolution, he remembered that, some years since, a dissolution had been hurried to save the establishment from the danger of an act that was impending; and yet, that very act, which was thought so dangerous in 1808, was passed sub silentio some years afterwards. He thought, therefore, that the noble lord's ideas of necessity might vary again in the course of four or five days, and that, by that time, he might feel no apprehension though 49, or 69, or 89 aliens more should become naturalized by buying a share in the Bank of Scotland. Upon the whole, he thought the present proceeding one that covered with shame the ministers of the country, both from their ignorance of the laws and their contempt of the rights of the nation.

The bill was then passed.

PROTEST AGAINST SUSPENDING THE STANDING ORDERS.] The following Protest was entered on the Journals.

"Dissentient,

"Because to suspend the Standing Orders of this House is, at all times, a proceeding liable to grave objections, and only to be justified by some urgent necessity; but, to suspend them for the purpose of hurrying through all its stages, in one day, a bill, which must have the effect of suspending various acts of parliament, which have not been named, and which the House has not had an opportunity of considering, seems to us to defeat the purposes for which they were devised, and to set at naught the reasons upon which they are founded."

(Signed) GREY.	SPENCER.
VASSAL HOLLAND.	MONTFORT.
LAUDERDALE.	ROSSLYN.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, June 9.

The House met, and Forty members not being present at four o'clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, June 10.

MR. SPEAKER'S SPEECH TO THE PRINCE REGENT.] This day being appointed for closing the session, the Prince Regent came down to the house, at two o'clock, with the usual state, and took his seat upon the throne. Sir Thomas Tyrwhitt, the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, was sent to command the attendance of the House of Commons.

Shortly afterwards, Mr. Speaker, accompanied by a great number of members, came to the bar. Mr. Speaker then delivered the following Speech:—

"May it please your Royal Highness,

"We, his Majesty's faithful Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, attend your Royal Highness with our last bill of supply.

"In obedience, Sir, to your Royal Highness's recommendation, we have not failed to apply our anxious and continued attention to the state of the public income and expenditure,—and heavy, as unquestionably the weight and pressure still remain upon our finances, we have the satisfaction to observe that the revenue, in its most important branches, is gradually and progressively improving.

"Among the various duties, Sir, in which we have been engaged, there is none, perhaps, that could have devolved upon us, more interesting in itself, or more in unison, we are persuaded, with the sincere and unfeigned sentiments of all classes of his Majesty's subjects, than the duty of adopting the necessary measures for the fulfilment of those engagements which your Royal Highness was graciously pleased to communicate to us, as having been concluded with the courts of Spain and Portugal, on the subject of the Slave Trade.

"Nor, Sir, have we been less attentive to another object of great public importance, earnestly recommended by your Royal Highness to our early and particular consideration—the deficiency which has so long existed in the number of places of public worship belonging to the established church. To the remedy of this deficiency, we have most readily afforded a large and liberal assistance, well convinced, that the first and dearest interests of this country—its truest happiness—its soundest prosperity—its surest independence—its proudest and most substantial national glory, are all involved and blended intimately and inseparably in the religious and moral habits of its people.

"The bill, Sir, which it is now my duty humbly to present to your Royal Highness, is entitled

'An Act for applying certain monies therein
'mentioned for the service of the year one 'thousand eight hundred and eighteen.'

"To which, with all humility, we pray his Majesty's Royal Assent."

On the conclusion of this speech the Lord Chancellor received the Bill from Mr. Speaker, which, with the Aliens Regulation bill, the Aliens and Denizens bill, the Election of Coroners bill, and the Education of the Poor bill, received the Royal Assent.

THE PRINCE REGENT'S SPEECH.] His Royal Highness the Prince Regent then delivered from the Throne the following Speech:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"It is with deep regret that I am again under the necessity of announcing to you, that no alteration has occurred in the state of his Majesty's lamented indisposition.

"I continue to receive from foreign powers the strongest assurances of their friendly disposition towards this country, and of their desire to maintain the general tranquillity.

"I am fully sensible of the attention which you have paid to the many important objects which have been brought before you.

"I derive peculiar satisfaction from the measure which you have adopted, in pursuance of my recommendation, for augmenting the number of places of public worship belonging to the established church; and I confidently trust, that this measure will be productive of the most beneficial effects on the religion and moral habits of the people.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I thank you for the Supplies which you have granted to me for the service of the present year; and I highly approve of the steps you have taken with a view to the reduction of the unfunded debt.

"I am happy to be able to inform you, that the revenue is in a course of continued improvement.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"On closing this session, I think it proper to inform you, that it is my intention forthwith to dissolve the present, and to give directions for calling a new parliament. In making this communication, I cannot refrain from adverting to the important change which has occurred in the situation of this country, and of Europe, since I first met you in this place.

"At that period, the dominion of the common enemy had been so widely extended over the Continent, that resistance to his power was by many deemed to be hopeless; and in the extremities of Europe alone was such resistance effectually maintained.

"By the unexampled exertions which you enabled me to make, in aid of countries nobly contending for independence, and by the spirit which was kindled in so many nations, the Continent was at length delivered from the most galling and oppressive tyranny under which it had ever laboured; and I had the happiness, by the blessing of Divine Providence, to terminate, in conjunction with his Majesty's Allies, the most eventful and sanguinary contest in which Europe had for centuries been engaged, with unparalleled success and glory.

"The prosecution of such a contest for so many years, and more particularly the efforts which marked the close of it, have been followed within our own country, as well as throughout the rest of Europe, by considerable internal difficulties and distress. But, deeply as I felt for the immediate pressure upon his Majesty's people, I nevertheless looked forward without dismay, having always the fullest confidence in the solidity of the resources of the British empire, and in the relief which might be expected from a continuance of peace, and from the patience, public spirit, and energy of the nation.

"These expectations have not been disappointed.

"The improvement in the internal circumstances of the country is happily manifest, and promises to be steadily progressive; and I feel a perfect assurance that the continued loyalty and exertions of all classes of his Majesty's subjects will confirm these growing indications of national prosperity, by promoting obedience to the laws and attachment to the constitution, from which all our blessings have been derived."

Then the Lord Chancellor, by the command of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, said—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"It is the will and pleasure of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty, that this parliament be now dissolved; and this parliament is dissolved accordingly."

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, June 10.

FINANCE.] General Thornton, seeing the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his place, rose and said, he was desirous of acquiring some information with regard to the five and four per cent. annuities.—He had understood the right hon. gentleman to have said, on moving for leave to bring in a bill to establish the new 3½ per cent. annuities, that such a measure would, amongst other advantages, facilitate the redemption of the 5 and 4 per cents. He was not aware, however, that, by that or any former act, the right hon. gentleman had the power of paying them off during the recess. From the flourishing state of our finances, he did not think it improbable that the funds might rise so considerably before the next session of parliament as to render it expedient to pay off those annuities; and it would be much to be lamented if such a favourable opportunity should be lost, in consequence of no authority having been given by a legislative measure before parliament should separate. It was certainly of importance that no delay should take place if a saving of between two and three millions annually could be effected, while, at the same time, faith would be preserved with the public creditor.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he conceived that whenever such a measure should become expedient, the preservation of faith with the public creditor would require arrangements to be made which must receive the sanction of the legislature; and, therefore, it could not be carried into effect until parliament should again meet. He did not think that an act could have been passed with propriety in the present session, in anticipation of the occurrence of a favourable opportunity of paying off the 5 and 4 per cent. annuities.

SLAVE TRADE.] Mr. Wilberforce observed, that he had received information, on which he could depend, that the slave trade was openly carrying on, to a great extent, in the French colonies on the North West coast of Africa, and that this inhuman practice was accompanied by circumstances of peculiar atrocity, murders having been committed by wholesale in its prosecution. As it was extremely desirable to prevent the possibility of any effectual revival of this detestable traffic, and, as one great means of doing so would be to ascertain, as far as it was practicable, the real facts of the case, he should move, "That an humble address be presented to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, praying that he would be graciously pleased to order that there be laid before this House a copy of any communication regarding the renewal of the slave trade on the North West coast of Africa."

Lord Castlereagh said, he was not at all surprised at the vigilance of his hon. friend on this interesting subject. He could assure him, that every disposition was manifested by the French government to put an end to the slave trade; but he must be aware how difficult it was to cause a trade of that kind suddenly and entirely to cease in any colony, more especially when that colony had but recently passed into the possession of the power by which it was held. It must be highly satisfactory to his hon. friend, and all the advocates of humanity, to reflect, that, in the late session of the French Chambers, the law for the abolition of the slave trade passed the chamber of deputies, and that of peers, by very large majorities, consisting, he believed, of nine-tenths of the members of both; and this was the more gratifying, as his hon. friend must be well aware, from his experience in the country, how difficult it was, in cases where the property of individuals was implicated to a great extent, to carry into effect measures by which that property was diminished in value. Although he was apprehensive, with his hon. friend, that considerable mischief had occurred in the quarter alluded to, yet it was by no means to the extent reported. With respect to his hon. friend's motion, as the information he wished for was not in such a shape as would allow of its being produced, and as his hon. friend had, by calling the attention of the house to the subject, effected in some measure the object he had in view, he was desirous that the motion should be withdrawn.

Mr. Wilberforce assented to this suggestion, at the same time observing, that he hoped the British government would persevere in their efforts, and that they would soon be crowned with success.

Lord Castlereagh begged to add one circumstance in corroboration of what he had stated with regard to the disposition of the French government. It was known to his hon. friend that the governor of the Island of Bourbon had been recalled by the French government, on account of his conduct on the slave-trade. Another governor of a French colony had recently experienced the same treatment, under similar circumstances *. His hon. friend and the country might be assured, that no exertions should be wanting on the part of his Majesty's ministers, to effect the complete abolition of this detestable traffic.

The motion was then withdrawn.

Soon after two o'clock, the Usher of the Black Rod required the attendance of the House in the House of Lords. Mr. Speaker and the members present accordingly attended.—(See the Lords.)

When the members returned to their House after the dissolution, divested of their legislative character, Mr. Manners Sutton, the late Speaker, offered to read the Prince Regent's speech, at the table, as is usual after a prorogation.

Mr. Tierney objected to any such proceeding, as implying some approbation of this mode of dissolution, which he considered as an insult to Parliament.—Mr. M. Sutton observed, that he had consulted Mr. Hatsell that morning on a case where there was no precedent, there having been no such dissolution since that of the Oxford Parliament, in the reign of Charles II. (anno 1681.) The difficulty did not depend on the members present being no longer a House of Parliament. That circumstance equally existed in the case of a prorogation. But the peculiar difficulty of this case consisted in his being no longer a Speaker.—Lord Castlereagh said, that the gentlemen present might incur a præmunire, if they appeared to deliberate as a House of Commons.—It was remarked that there could be no harm in a conversation between Mr. M. Sutton and his friends round the table.—The Speech was not read, and the gentlemen separated †.

In the course of the afternoon, Proclamations were issued for calling a New Parliament, and for electing and summoning the Sixteen Peers of Scotland.—The writs were returnable on Tuesday, the 4th day of August, on which day

* In addition to these facts, see what is stated in the note, page 1153.

† Some gentlemen thought, that the dissolution of Parliament by the Prince Regent in person was ungracious, and that it was intended as a mark of dissatisfaction. It certainly appears that, in former times, a dissolution in person was considered an offensive act in the Sovereign. On the 10th of March, 1628, the day to which both Houses were adjourned, King Charles I. came to the House of Lords, and, without sending for the Commons, spoke as follows: "My Lords—I never came here upon so unpleasant an occasion, it being the dissolution of a Parliament; therefore men may have some cause to wonder why I should rather not choose to do this by commission; it being rather a general maxim with Kings to leave harsh commands to their Ministers, themselves only executing pleasing things." And then, after some farther words, directed the lord keeper to dissolve the parliament. The entry, on the Lords' Journal is—Ipse DOMINUS REX hoc præsens Parliamentum dissolvit.——On the 28th of March, 1681, King Charles II. suddenly dissolved the Parliament then sitting at Oxford. His speech was as follows: "My Lords and Gentlemen—That all the world may see to what a point we are come, that we are not like to have a good end, when the divisions at the beginning are such: therefore, my Lord Chancellor, do as I have commanded you." Then the Lord Chancellor said, "My Lords and Gentlemen, his Majesty has commanded me to say, That it is his royal pleasure and will, that this parliament be dissolved; and this parliament is dissolved."—Bishop Burnet (Hist. of Own Times, V. 1. p. 499.) gives the following account of this dissolution. "By the steps which the Commons had taken, the King saw what might be expected from them; so, very suddenly, and not very decently, he came to the House of Lords, the crown being carried between his feet, in a sedan: and he put on his robes in haste, without any previous notice, and called up the Commons, and dissolved the Parliament; and went with such haste to Windsor, that it looked as if he was afraid of the crowds that this meeting had brought to Oxford."

In these two instances, the dissolution in person was thought indecent and offensive. It is true that the Parliament of 1660—the Convention Parliament, which restored King Charles II—was dissolved by the King in person, but then, his Majesty had sent a message to the House of Lords some days before, to signify his intention, which message was communicated by them to the Commons, and a conference was holden upon it. The message was as follows:—"His Majesty hath expected, ever since Thursday morning, to be informed, that his two houses of parliament had been ready to present such Bills to him as they had prepared for his royal assent, and hath continued ever since in the same expectation, and hoped that he might, this day, have finished the work, and dissolved them according to his signification; but, being informed that there are yet depending in both houses some few Bills of great importance to his and the public service, which are not yet ready to be presented to him; and being desirous to part with his two houses of parliament, who have deserved so well of him, in such a manner, that they may not be obliged to use more expedition, in the despatch, than is agreeable to the affairs which are to be despatched, his Majesty is graciously pleased to declare, That he will be ready to pass such Bills as are necessary, in point of time, to be passed, on Monday morning; and then, that the houses adjourn till Thursday, so that they may have that day and Friday to put an end to those most public Bills which are not yet finished; and his Majesty will on the next day, being Saturday the 29th of this month, be present with them, and dissolve the parliament; and his Majesty desires both houses, against that time, to lay aside all business of private concernment to finish all public Bills."

Since the Revolution, Parliament has been always they were returned accordingly, and the Parliament was then prorogued to the 2nd day of October. On that day, it was prorogued to the 12th day of November. It was then again prorogued to the 29th day of December. On the 17th day of November her Majesty expired, and, in consequence of the provisions of the Act, passed in the last Session, to alter and amend the Regency Act, a Proclamation was issued on the 19th of November, for the meeting of Parliament on the 14th day of January, 1819, for the despatch of business.

dissolved by Proclamation, after having been first prorogued. The dissolution, therefore, by the Prince Regent in person was an unusual proceeding; but it does not appear, from any thing that was said or done, that it was meant to be offensive. It was adopted merely for the sake of despatch.

APPENDIX.

No. I. Abstract of the Return made by the Secretary of State, on the 5th of March, 1818, to the House of Commons, of the Names, &c. of all Persons arrested, in ENGLAND, on Charges of High Treason, and Suspicion of Treason, in the year 1817.

Names of Prisoners.		Ages.	Occupations.	Places of Abode.	Offence.	Authority for Release.	Whether Recognizance, or Not.	When Recognizance vacated.
James Watson, the Elder		..	Surgeon	London	High Treason.				Brought to Trial in London.
Thomas Preston		..	Cordwainer	Do.
George Burrows		35	Framework-knitter	Ripley					Brought to Trial at Derby.
Thomas Bettison		35	Collier	Swanwick
John Fletcher		30	Shoemaker	Heanor
Josiah Godber		..	Labourer	Ripley
Samuel Hunt		25	Farmer	S. Wingfield
John Hill		24	Framework knitter	Do.
Alexander Johnson		25	Do.	Pentridge
Samuel Ludlam	under	21	Do.	S. Wingfield
William Ludlam	under	21	Do.	Do.
John Moore	about	55	Wharfinger	Ripley
John Mc'Kessick		..	Framework-knitter	Heanor
Thomas Turner		28	Do.	S. Wingfield
Joseph Turner	about	19	Labourer	Do.
Edward Turner		40	Stonemason	Do.
Joseph Rawson, alias Thorpe	under	21	Framework-knitter	Swanwick
William Turner		..	Stonemason	S. Wingfield
Robert Turner	under	21	Framework-knitter	Do.
Joseph Weightman, sen.		21	Do.	Pentridge
William Weightman	about	30	Farmer	Do.
Thomas Weightman	under	21	Sawyer	Do.
James Weightman	under	21	Do.	Do.
George Weightman		..	Do.	Do.
William Adams	under	21	Labourer	Ripley
George Brassington	under	21	Do.	Do.
Gormon Buxton		..	Collier	Swanwick
William Hardwick		..	Framework-knitter	Ripley
Joseph Hall	under	21	Do.	Swanwick
Nathaniel Jennings	under	21	Do.	Do.
Isaac Ludlam	about	54	Stonegetter	S. Wingfield
Edward Moor	under	21	Framework-knitter	Ripley
John Onion	under	21	Labourer	Butterly
Joseph Savage	under	21	Do.	Do.
Charles Swaine	under	21	Framework-knitter	S. Wingfield

Names of Prisoners.	Ages.	Occupations.	Places of Abode.	Offence.	Authority for Release.	Whether Recognizance, or not.	When Recognizance vacated.
Joseph Topham.......... under	21	Blacksmith..........	Pentridge......	High Treason.	....	....	....	Brought to Trial at Derby.
John Wright.......... under	21	Framework-knitter....	Ripley........		....	....	....
Thomas Ensor.......... under	21	Labourer..........	Do..........		....	....	....
Daniel Hunt.......... about	25	Do..........	Wingfield Park		....	....	....
Jeremiah Brandreth.......... about	26	Framework-knitter....	Bullwell........		....	....	....
Isaac Ludlam, jun.......... under	21	Do..........	S. Wingfield....		....	....	....
Thomas Bacon.......... about	60	Do..........	Pentridge......		....	....	....
John Bacon.......... about	57	Do..........	Do..........		....	....	....
John Castle..........	..	Smith..........	Westminster....	Suspicion of High Treason.	Admitted Evidence for the Crown	—	—
John Keans..........	..	Tailor..........	Mary-le-bone...		Privy Council	—	—
John Hooper..........	..	Cordwainer..........	Westminster....		....	....	....	Brought to Trial in London.
Arthur Thistlewood..........	..	Gentleman..........	Westminster....		....	....	....
Thomas Evans..........	54	Brace-maker..........	Do..........		Secretary of State	—	—
Thomas John Evans..........	20	Do..........	Do..........		Do......	—	—
John Johnston..........	37	Tailor..........	Manchester....		Do......	Recognizance...	31 Jany 1818.
William Ogden..........	73	Printer..........	Do..........		Do......	Do......	Do......
Samuel Drummond..........	24	....	Do..........		Do......	Do......	Do......
John Bagguley..........	18	Servant..........	Do..........		Do......	Do......	Do......
Elijah Dixon..........	26	Spinner..........	Do..........		Do......	Do......	Do......
Robert Ridings..........	50	Weaver..........	Failsworth......		Do......	—	—
Samuel Bamford..........	30	Barber..........	Middleton......		Do......	Do......	Do......
Edward Connor..........	..	Victualler..........	Chadderton....		Do......	—	—
John Lancashire..........	30	Weaver..........	Middleton......		Do......	Do......	Do......
John Roberts..........	30	Cooper..........	Manchester....		Do......	Do......	Do......
James Sellers..........	38	Cutler..........	Do..........		Do......	Do......	Do......
Nathaniel Hulton..........	26	Tailor..........	New Mills......		Do......	Do......	Do......
John Healey..........	35	Surgeon..........	Middleton......		Do......	Do......	Do......
John Knight..........	54	Spinner..........	Manchester....		Do......	Do......	Do......
James Leach..........	22	Weaver..........	Rochdale......		Do......	Do......	Do......
William Kent..........	27	Weaver..........	Chadderton....		Do......	Do......	Do......
George Plant..........	..	Weaver..........	Blakeley......		Do......	Do......	Do......
Gravenor Henson..........	34	Framework-knitter....	Nottingham....		Do......	Do......	Do......
Richard Flitcroft..........	31	Militia Man..........	Stockport......		Do......	Do......	Do......
George Bradbury..........	34	Mason..........	Manchester....		Do......	Do......	Do......
Robert Pilkington..........	33	Weaver..........	Bury..........		Do......	Do......	Do......
Robert Moggridge..........	..	Tailor..........	Somers Town...		Do......	—	—

Name	Age	Trade	Residence	Offence
George Brettell	42		Mary-le-bone	Suspicion of High Treason.	Do.	—	—
Stephen Casey	50	Madhouse-keeper	Plaistow		Do.	—	—
William Holl	45	Engraver	Camden Town		Do.	—	—
William Carr	57	Victualler	Tottenham-court-road.		Do.	—	—
Joseph Mitchell	33	Pamphlet-seller	Liverpool		Do.	Recognizance	Do.
William Benbow	29	Cordwainer	Manchester		Do.	—	—
William Wolstenholme	60	Cutler	Sheffield		Do.	Do.	Do.
James Wolstenholme	36	Joiner	Do.		Do.	Do.	Do.
Thomas Wolstenholme	30	Grinder	Do.		Do.	Do.	Do.
George Robinson	36	Labourer	Do.		Do.	Do.	Do.
James Rowen	48	Do.	Do.		Do.	Do.	Do.
William Bradwell	35	Grinder	Do.		Do.	—	—
Rowland Hartle	46	Hatter	Do.		Do.	Do.	Do
Samuel Haynes	39	Framework-knitter	Nottingham		Do.	Do.		Ill.
John Holmes	31	Do.	Do.		Do.	Do.	Do.
Francis Ward	49	Do.	Do.		Do.	Do.	Do.
John Smaller	51	Cordwainer	Horbury		Do.	Do.	Do.
James Mann	33	Cloth-dresser	Leeds		Do.	Do.	Do.
James Birkin	25	Stockinger	Derby		Do.			Dangerously Ill.
William Cliff	25	Do.	Do.		Do.	Do.	Do.
Benjamin Scholes	..	Victualler	Wakefield		Do.	Do.	Do.
Benjamin Whiteley	44	Cloth-drawer	Holmfirth		Do.	Do.	Do.
Richard Lee	40	Clothier	Do.		Do.	Do.	Do.
Benjamin Heponstall	45	Cloth-dresser	Hightown		Do.	Do.	Do.
Thomas Riley	40	Tailor	Crossland Moor					Died in Prison.

Observations. Of the four Persons stated to have been tried in London, Watson was first put on his trial in Westminster Hall, before Lord Chief Justice Ellenborough, and the other Judges of that Court, on the 9th of June, 1817. The trial lasted till the 16th of June, when the Jury returned a Verdict of Not Guilty. On the following morning the trial of Preston, Hooper, and Thistlewood, was abandoned.

Of the Persons stated to have been tried at Derby, Jeremiah Brandreth was first put on his trial, before Chief Baron Richards, Mr. Justice Dallas, Mr. Justice Abbot, and Mr. Justice Holroyd, at Derby on the 15th of October, 1817. He was found Guilty. William Turner, Isaac Ludlam the elder, and George Weightman, were then severally tried, and found Guilty. Twelve Prisoners were discharged, the Attorney-General having declined to prosecute, and the Jury having, in consequence, found them Not Guilty. The counsel for the remaining Prisoners then proposed to the Attorney-General, that they should withdraw their plea of Not Guilty, if mercy should be extended to them. This proposition was acceded to. Judgment of death was then passed on the whole of the Prisoners.—On the 7th of November, 1817, Brandreth, Turner, and Ludlam, were executed at Derby. The other Prisoners were afterwards either transported, or pardoned.

No. II. Abstract of the Return made by the Secretary of State, on the 16th of March, 1818, to the House of Commons, of the Names, &c. of all Persons Arrested in Scotland, upon Charges of Treasonable Practices, and of administering and taking Unlawful Oaths, in 1817.

NAMES.	Occupation.	Place of Abode.	Age.	BY WHOSE AUTHORITY RELEASED.
Andrew M'Kinley	Weaver	Main Street, Calton Glasgow	—	High Court of Justiciary—After Trial.
James Finlayson	Writer's Clerk	Leanfield	21	Do......Witness on M'Kinley's Trial.
John M'Lachlan	Weaver	Crossloan-street	34	Do.......Do.
John Buchanan	..Do	Bridgeton	27	Sheriff Substitute of Lanarkshire.
Hugh Cochrane	..Do	Anderston	38	High Court of Justiciary.
Hugh Dickson	..Do	Calton	34	Do......Witness in M'Kinley's Trial.
James Hood	Web Mounter	Govan	21	Do......Do.
James Robertson	Weaver	Bridgeton	51	Sheriff Depute of Lanarkshire.
Andrew Somerville	..Do	..Do	32	Sheriff Substitute.
John Campbell	..Do	Crossloan-street	25	High Court of Justiciary—Witness on M'Kinley's Trial.
William Paul	Cotton Spinner	Barrowfield	23	Sheriff Substitute.
James Hervey	Weaver	Clyde-street	50	......Do.
James M'Tear	Schoolmaster	Calton	35	Discharged by Sheriff after examination.
John Young	Beamer	..Do	30	Warrant for Treasonable Practices discharged.
Wm. Simpson	Weaver	Anderston	25	High Court of Justiciary—Witness on M'Kinley's Trial.
Peter Gibson	Carpenter	Clyde-street	38	Do......Do.
Thomas Sinclair	Weaver	Govan	32	Do.
John Stewart	..Do	Ladywell-street	52	Sheriff Substitute.
Robert Thom	..Do	Camlachie	50	......Do.
William Murray	Cotton Spinner	Calton	52	......Do.
William Robertson	Weaver	Govan	34	......Do.
Roger Gordou	..Do	Anderston	30	......Do.
John Weier	..Do	Green-street	31	Discharged by Sheriff after examination.
John Montgomery	..Do	Calton	29	......Do.
James Paton	..Do	Landrecy-street	39	Warrant for Treasonable Practices discharged.
James Shields	..Do	Anderston	47	Sheriff Substitute.
John Cochrane	Porter	Glasgow	38	Discharged by Sheriff after examination.
William Irvine	Weaver	Marlboro'-street	32	Sheriff Substitute.
John Wylie	Manufacturer	Glasgow	28	Sheriff Depute.
Andrew Robb	Vintner	Anderston	40	Warrant for Treasonable Practices discharged.
William Edgar	Schoolmaster	Bridgeton	25	High Court of Justiciary.
David Smith	Cotton Spinner	Calton	32	Sheriff Substitute.
John Keith	..Do	..Do	—	High Court of Justiciary.
David Dryburgh	Schoolmaster	Carmunnock	40	Sheriff Substitute.
John Johnston	Weaver	Bridgeton	23	......Do.
Peter Cameron	Cotton Spinner	Calton	—	......Do.
Robert Kerr	Manufacturer	Glasgow	—	Released upon Bail.

OBSERVATIONS.—Andrew M'Kinley was brought to Trial before the High Court of Justiciary at Edinburgh, on the 18th of July, 1817, and the Jury returned a Verdict of Not Proven. (See an account of the Trial in these Reports, Vol. i. p. 1698, note.)

No. III. Abstract of the Return made by the Secretary of State, on the 16th of March, 1818, to the House of Lords, of all Persons arrested or committed, since the 1st of January, 1817, for having been tumultuously, or unlawfully, or in a disorderly manner assembled in Great Britain, and of all Persons whose Papers were seized, or whose Houses were searched for Arms or other offensive Weapons, or who were detained, in consequence of their having been so assembled, without being brought to Trial, together with an account of the Authority by which they were subsequently discharged.

"Within the period specified in the above-mentioned address, no persons have been arrested or committed by his Majesty's Secretaries of State, for the offences mentioned in the address, nor have any houses been searched for arms or other offensive weapons by virtue of such warrants, nor have any such warrants been issued for the seizure of papers; but upon the arrest of the under-mentioned persons for high treason, or suspicion of high treason, by virtue of warrants of his Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the home department, some papers of those persons have been seized by the messengers to whom those warrants were directed; viz.

James Watson the elder.	James Mann.
Thomas Evans.	Benjamin Scholes.
Thomas John Evans.	William Ogden.
John Johnston.	William Benbow.

It is not known to the home department that any seizures of papers have been made, except as above mentioned, nor that any arrests, commitments, or searches within the scope of the address have taken place in any part of England, except at Manchester and Nottingham.

Copies of the address having, by the commands of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, been transmitted to the magistrates at each of those towns, it appears by the returns from thence that the houses of the under-mentioned persons in the town of Nottingham were, on the tenth day of June last, searched for arms; viz.

Alexander Amos.	Frances Ward.
Jeremiah Brandreth.	John Holmes.
Dennis Rhodes.	William Handby.
Samuel Haynes.	Charles Merrey.

And that the following persons were, on the 10th day of March, 1817, arrested at or near Manchester, for having been tumultuously, unlawfully, and in a disorderly manner assembled."

The Return then gives the names of 249 persons, of whom 27 were apprehended, without warrant, near St. Peter's Church, and the remainder (called the Blanketeers) were apprehended, without warrant, on the Stockport road. Of the whole 249, 2 (Samuel Drummond and John Bagguley, who were among those arrested near St. Peter's Church) are stated to have been sent to London under warrant from the Secretary of State: 7 are stated to have been committed to Lancaster for trial: 59 are stated to have been Bailed to Sessions: 92 are stated to have been Discharged; and 89 are stated to have given their own Recognizances.

Observations. It will be seen by the Abstract No. 1. that Drummond and Bagguley were discharged on their own Recognizances, on the 31st of January, 1818. The Blanketeers were to have been tried at Lancaster on the 6th September, 1817, but Mr. Topping (counsel for the crown) desired the jury to acquit them, and, accordingly a verdict of Not Guilty was returned, and the prisoners were discharged. (See an account of the proceedings, in these Reports, Vol. I. p. 1671, note.)

No. IV. Abstract of the Net Produce of the Revenue of Great Britain, in the Years ending 5th January 1817, and 5th January 1818, distinguishing the Quarters;—and also, the Total Produce of the Consolidated Fund, the Annual Duties, and the War Taxes.

	QUARTERS ending				YEAR ending
	April 5, 1816.	July 5, 1816.	Oct. 10, 1816.	Jan. 5, 1817.	Jan. 5, 1817.
Customs	1,394,639	767,846	1,499,288	1,317,381	4,979,154
Excise	4,325,528	4,124,975	4,937,055	4,484,440	17,871,998
Stamps	1,520,536	1,500,414	1,487,447	1,461,324	5,969,721
Post Office	378,000	353,000	365,000	330,000	1,426,000
Assessed Taxes	726,909	2,207,659	714,270	2,134,484	5,783,322
Land Taxes	135,227	426,503	180,067	388,132	1,127,929
Miscellaneous	72,712	70,554	41,848	56,085	241,199
Unappropriated War Duties	. . . .	. . . .	. . . .	. . .
Unappropriated Property Tax	. . . .	. . . .	. . . .	374,006	374,006
Total Consolidated Fund	8,551,551	9,150,951	9,224,975	10,545,852	37,773,329
Annual Duties to pay off Bills:
Customs	39,143	524,691	958,540	870,827	2,393,201
Excise	7,654	90,732	98,611	337,097	534,124
Pensions, &c.	. . . .	. . . .	. . . .	4,016	4,016
Total Annual Duties	46,797	615,123	1,057,181	1,211,910	2,931,341
Permanent and Annual Duties	8,598,348	10,066,371	10,282,156	11,757,792	40,704,670
WAR TAXES.
Customs	517,659	190,151	31	525	1,008,366
Excise	1,067,266	1,354,616	1,259,533	780,659	4,162,074
Property (Appropriated)	4,861,027	2,071,776	2,960,576	1,292,205	11,185,584
Total War Taxes	6,445,952	3,916,543	4,220,140	2,073,389	16,656,024
Total Net Revenue	15,011,300	13,982,917	14,502,296	13,831,181	57,360,694

	QUARTERS ending				YEAR ending
	April 5, 1817.	July 5, 1817.	Oct. 10, 1817.	Jan. 5, 1818.	Jan. 5, 1818.
Customs	1,719,314	831,853	1,880,180	2,458,628	6,889,975
Excise	3,819,211	3,831,360	4,025,209	4,695,074	16,370,854
Stamps	1,492,611	1,589,615	1,688,663	1,566,532	6,337,421
Post Office	342,000	323,000	354,000	319,000	1,338,000
Assessed Taxes	868,104	2,216,806	782,602	2,260,017	6,127,529
Land Taxes	154,550	461,664	190,502	353,604	1,163,320
Miscellaneous	98,595	62,160	76,799	255,318	492,872
Unappropriated War Duties	30,225	20,031	12,124	6,200	68,580
Unappropriated Property Tax	993,193	. . . .	. . . .	. . . .	993,493
Total Consolidated Fund	9,518,103	9,339,489	9,010,079	11,914,373	39,782,044
Annual Duties to pay off Bills:
Customs	192,982	877,760	1,241,770	558,993	2,871,505
Excise	13,279	83,727	124,684	36,441	258,131
Pensions, &c.	. . . .	. . .	. . . .	. . . .	. . . .
Total Annual Duties	206,261	961,487	1,366,454	595,434	3,129,636
Permanent and Annual Duties	9,724,364	10,300,976	10,376,533	12,509,807	42,911,680
WAR TAXES.
Customs	. . . .	. . . .	. . . .	. . . .	. . . .
Excise	809,565	779,647	739,943	768,157	3,097,312
Property (Appropriated)	. . . .	472,338	407,072	389,048	1,268,458
Total War Taxes	809,565	1,251,985	1,147,015	1,157,205	4,365,770
Total Net Revenue	10,533,[illegible]29	11,552,961	11,523,548	13,667,012	47,277,450

The Irish and Portuguese Payments, for the Interest on their respective Debts payable in England, are excluded from this Statement; and the War Taxes appropriated to the Interest of Loans charged on them, are not included in the Consolidated Fund, but under the head of War Taxes, to the Quarter ended 5th July 1816, inclusive, from which period certain War Duties of Customs being made perpetual by Act 56 Geo. III., cap. 29, are included under the head of Consolidated Customs.

Treasury Chambers, 7th May 1818. S. R. LUSHINGTON.

No. V. An Account of the Net Produce of the Revenue of Ireland, as paid into the Exchequer, in the Year ended the 5th day of January 1818 (in Irish Currency).

	£.	s.	d.
Customs	1,607,455	11	7½
Excise and Assessed Taxes	2,308,203	11	3¾
Stamps	563,621	11	3¼
Post Office	62,000	—	—
Miscellaneous	212,396	14	2¾
	£4,753,677	8	5¼

British	£4,388,010 — —

Irish Revenue Department,
Treasury Chambers, Whitehall,
7th May 1818.

S. R. LUSHINGTON.

No. VII. (See No. VI. over.) An Account of the Net Produce of the Revenue of Ireland, as paid into the Exchequer, in the Year ended the 5th day of April, 1818 (in Irish Currency).

	£.
Customs	1,582,406
Excise and Assessed Taxes	2,398,239
Stamps	553,792
Post Office	52,000
Miscellaneous	228,728
	£4,815,165

British	£4,444,768

Irish Revenue Department,
Treasury Chambers, Whitehall,
7th May 1818.

S. R. LUSHINGTON.

No. VI. Abstract of the Net Produce of the Revenue of Great Britain, in the Years ending 5th April 1817 and 5th April 1818; distinguishing the Quarters; and also, the Total Produce of the Consolidated Fund, the Annual Duties, and the War Taxes.

	QUARTERS ending				YEAR ending April 5, 1817.
	July 5, 1816.	Oct. 10, 1816.	Jan. 5, 1817.	April 5, 1817.
Customs	767,846	1,499,288	1,317,381	1,719,314	5,303,829
Excise	4,124,975	4,937,055	4,484,440	3,819,211	17,365,681
Stamps	1,500,414	1,487,447	1,461,324	1,492,611	5,941,796
Post Office	353,000	365,000	330,000	342,000	1,390,000
Assessed Taxes	2,207,659	714,270	2,134,484	868,104	5,924,517
Land Taxes	426,503	180,067	388,132	154,550	1,149,252
Miscellaneous	70,554	41,848	56,085	98,595	267,082
Unappropriated War Duties	....	....	....	30,225	30,225
Unappropriated Property Tax	....	....	374,006	993,493	1,367,499
Total Consolidated Fund	9,450,951	9,224,975	10,545,852	9,518,103	38,739,881
Annual Duties to pay off Bills:
Customs	524,691	958,540	870,827	192,982	2,547,040
Excise	90,732	98,641	337,097	13,279	539,749
Pensions, &c.	....	....	4,016	....	4,016
Total Annual Duties	615,423	1,057,181	1,211,940	206,261	3,090,805
Permanent and Annual Duties	10,066,374	10,282,156	11,757,792	9,724,364	41,830,686
WAR TAXES.
Customs	490,151	31	525	....	490,707
Excise	1,354,616	1,259,533	780,659	809,565	4,204,373
Property (Appropriated)	2,071,776	2,960,576	1,292,205	....	6,324,557
Total War Taxes	3,916,543	4,220,140	2,073,389	809,565	11,019,637
Total Net Revenue	13,982,917	14,502,296	13,831,181	10,533,929	52,850,323

	QUARTERS ending				YEAR ending April 5, 1818.
	July 5, 1817.	Oct. 10, 1817.	Jan. 5, 1818.	April 5, 1818.
Customs	831,853	1,880,180	2,458,628	1,991,718	7,162,379
Excise	3,831,360	4,025,209	4,695,074	4,248,082	16,799,725
Stamps	1,589,615	1,688,663	1,566,532	1,588,759	6,433,569
Post Office	323,000	354,000	319,000	336,000	1,332,000
Assessed Taxes	2,216,806	782,602	2,260,017	917,414	6,176,839
Land Taxes	464,664	190,502	353,604	178,295	1,187,065
Miscellaneous	62,160	76,799	255,318	73,270	467,547
Unappropriated War Duties	20,031	12,124	6,200	713	39,068
Unappropriated Property Tax	...	....	....	....	.
Total Consolidated Fund	9,339,489	9,010,079	11,914,373	9,334,251.	39,598,192
Annual Duties to pay off Bills:
Customs	877,760	1,241,770	558,993	11,946	2,690,469
Excise	83,727	124,684	36,441	6,520	251,372
Pensions, &c.	....	....	....	....	.
Total Annual Duties	961,487	1,366,454	595,434	18,466	2,941,841
Permanent and Annual Duties	10,300,976	10,376,533	12,509,807	9,352,717	42,540,033
WAR TAXES.
Customs	....	....	....	....	.
Excise	779,647	739,943	768,157	897,203	3,184,950
Property (Appropriated)	472,338	407,072	389,048	254,190	1,522,648
Total War Taxes	1,251,985	1,147,015	1,157,205	1,151,393	4,707,598
Total Net Revenue	11,552,961	11,523,548	3,667,012	10,504,110	47,247,631

The Irish and Portuguese Payments, for the Interest on their respective Debts payable in England, are excluded from this Statement; and the War Taxes appropriated to the Interest of Loans charged on them, are not included in the Consolidated Fund, but under the head of War Taxes, to the Quarter ending 5th July, 1816, inclusive, from which period certain War Duties of Customs being made perpetual by Act 56 Geo. III. cap. 29, are included under the head of Consolidated Customs.

Treasury Chambers, 7th May 1818. S. R. LUSHINGTON.

No. VIII. Compare of the Produce of the Revenue of Great Britain, exclusive of the War Duty on Malt and Property, in the Quarters ended 5th April 1817 and 1818.

	QUARTERS ENDED.		Increase.	Decrease.
	5th April 1817.	5th April 1818.
	£.	£.	£.	£.
Customs	1,912,296	2,003,664	91,368
Excise	4,642,055	5,151,805	509,750
Stamps	1,492,611	1,588,759	96,148
Post Office	342,000	336,000		6,000
Assessed Taxes	868,104	917,414	49,310
Land Taxes	154,550	178,295	23,745
Miscellaneous	98,595	73,283		25,812
	9,510,211	10,249,220	770,321	31,812
Deduct Decrease			31,812
Increase on the Quarter			739,009

Treasury Chambers, 7th May 1818. S. R. LUSHINGTON.

No. IX. An Account of the Net Produce of the Revenue of Ireland, as paid into the Exchequer, in the Quarters ended the 5th day of April 1817, and 5th day of April 1818 (in British currency.)

	QUARTERS ENDED.		Increase.	Decrease.
	5th April 1817.	5th April 1818.
	£.	£.	£.	£.
Customs	324,635	301,514		23,121
Excise and Assessed Taxes	493,308	576,418	83,110
Stamps	151,504	142,431		9,073
Post Office	12,000	2,770		9,230
Miscellaneous	21,846	36,920	15,074
Total	1,003,293	1,060,053	98,184	41,424
Deduct Decrease			41,424
Increase on the Quarter			56,760

Irish Revenue Department, Treasury Chambers, Whitehall, 7th May 1818. C. ARBUTHNOT.

No. X. An Account of the Total Amount of the National Debt in each year from the the Amount of Debt redeemed, and also Total Amount of unredeemed Debt in each

		GREAT BRITAIN.
		Total amount of debt. Co. 1.	Debt contracted in each year. Co. 2.	Debt redeemed in each year. Co. 3.	Total unredeemed debt Co. 4.
		£.	£.	£.	£.
Amount at 1st August	1786	238,231,248	....	....	238,231,248
Between 1st Aug. 1786 and 1st Feb.	1787	238,231,248	....	662,750	237,568,498
At 1st February	1788	238,231,248	....	1,456,900	236,111,598
	1789	238,231,248	....	1,506,350	234,605,248
	1790	238,231,248	....	1,558,850	233,046,398
	1791	238,231,248	....	1,587,500	231,458,898
	1792	238,231,248	....	1,507,100	229,951,798
	1793	238,231,248	....	1,962,650	227,989,148
	1794	244,481,248	6,250,000	2,174,405	232,064,743
	1795	260,157,773	15,676,525	2,804,945	244,936,323
	1796	311,863,471	51,705,698	3,083,455	293,558,566
	1797	368,809,040	56,945,569	4,390,670	346,113,465
	1798	394,159,040	25,350,000	6,695,585	364,767,880
	1799	429,783,290	35,624,250	7,779,807	392,612,323
	1800	451,658,290	21,875,000	20,211,571	394,275,752
	1801	480,703,290	29,045,000	10,281,776	413,038,977
	1802	536,657,603	55,954,313	9,925,739	459,067,551
	1803	567,008,978	30,351,375	8,846,450	480,572,476
	1804	583,008,978	16,000,000	12,409,854	484,162,622
In this and following years the debt is shewn, after deducting the 5 per cents. 1797, paid off in each year	1805	603,925,792	20,916,814	11,951,711	493,127,726
	1806	640,752,103	36,826,311	12,673,475	517,280,561
	1807	669,652,847	28,900,744	13,105,761	533,075,543
	1808	687,689,958	18,037,111	14,336,628	536,776,026
	1809	701,229,515	13,539 557	14,574,531	535,741,052
	1810	722,446,770	21,217,255	15,000,454	541,957,854
* Includes Loan 1811, raised for Ireland, chargeable on Great Britain	1811	742,239,101	19,792,331	16,087,487	545,662,698
	1812	771,370,396	*29,131,295	18,509,174	556,284,819
	1813	812,013,135	40,642,739	21,716,165	575,211,392
	1814	905 549,502	93,536,367	24,579,590	644,168,169
	1815	930,184,109	24,634,607	19,728,540	649,074,235
	1816	1,000,986,526	70,802,417	20,561,137	699,315,516
	1817	1,003,768 694	2,782,168	19,328,369	682,769,314
Great Britain and Ireland Consolidated by 56 Geo. 3. c. 98 at 5 Jan.	1818	1,106,759,615	5 per cents 1797 paid off 41,829*l.*	18,470,398	748,201,991

The sums in columns 3 and 7 have been redeemed and transferred as follows:

	£.
By the Sinking Fund	328,274,369
Land-tax	25,389,233
Life Annuities purchased	4,323,385
Stock, the dividends due upon which have remained unclaimed 10 years and upwards	222,037
Purchased with unclaimed dividends	348,600
	358,557,624

* The above debt of Ireland, column 5, is exclusive of 1,900,000*l.* Irish 5*l.* per cents. payable in England. By 57 Geo. III. cap. 48, the Sinking Fund Accounts terminate on the 5th January in each year, instead of 1st February as heretofore.

National Debt-office, Feb. 13.

S. HIGHAM, Secretary.

An Account of the Amount of the Unfunded Debt of Great Britain, on the 1st of February in each 3¾*d.*; 1805, 31,515,548*l.* 3*s.* 9½*d.*; 1806, 34,196,500*l.* 13*s.* 10¾*d.*; 1807, 34,348,391*l.* 10*s.* 8½*d.*; 1808, 7½*d.*; 1812, 50,454,166*l.* 15*s.* 8*d.*; 1813, 54,055,632*l.* 17*s.* 11*d.*; 1814 56,749,184*l.* 2*s.*; 1815, 9*s.* 2*d.*

1st February 1786 to the 5th January 1818, stating the Amount of Debt contracted, of those years.

	IRELAND, funded in Great Britain.
	Total amount of debt. Co. 5.	Debt contracted in each year. Co. 6.	Debt redeemed in each year. Co. 7.	Total unredeemed Debt. Co. 8.
	£.	£.	£.	£.
—	—	—	—	—
—	—	—	—	—
—	—	—	—	—
—	—	—	—	—
—	—	—	—	—
—	—	—	—	—
—	—	—	—	—
—	—	—	—	—
—	—	—	—	—
—	—	—	—	—
—	—	—	—	—
—	—	—	—	—
....	2,925,000	2,925,000	15,404	2,909,596
....	6,925,000	4,000,000	96,530	6,813,066
....	12,175,000	5,250,000	130,185	11,932,881
....	15,315,000	3,140,000	253,360	14,839,521
....	19,708,750	4,393,750	310,928	18,922,343
....	22,348 000	2,639,250	337,008	21,224,585
....	25,548,000	3,200,000	472,256	23,952,329
....	33,738,000	8,190,000	579,428	31,562,901
....	38,398,000	4,660,000	738,849	35,484,052
....	41,718,000	3,320,000	807,393	37,996,659
....	47,139,625	5,421,625	907,585	42,510,699
....	50,094,000	2,954,375	951,463	44,513,611
....	53,694,000	3,600,000	1,013,577	47,100,034
....	61,274,250	7,580,250	1,135,716	53,544,568
....	61,274,250	Included in Gr. Brit.	1,356,276	52,188,292
....	68,930,250	7,656,000	1,567,541	58,276,751
....	79,130,250	10,200,000	1,798,434	66,678,317
....	86,472 750	7,342,500	1,812,122	72,208,695
....	103 032,750	16,560,000	2,316,690	86,452,005
....	103,032,750	——	2,507,101	83,944,904
	—	—	—	—

} The sums stated in columns 3 and 7 amount to 358,557,623*l.* The difference arises from the fractional parts of a pound being omitted.

year, from the 1st of February 1803 to the 1st of February, 1818, inclusive:—1804, 23,787,251*l.* 15*s.* 39,669,960*l.* 2*s.* 8¼*d.*; 1809, 47,383,732*l.* 18*s.* 3*d.*; 1810, 48,442,635*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*; 1811, 46,971,580*l.* 2*s.* 65,096,695*l.* 12*s.* 1½*d.*; 1816, 46,013,578*l.* 12*s.* 11*d.*; 1817, 46,777,672*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.*; 1818, 58,513,399*l.*

No. XI. An Account of the Average Amount of Bank Notes in Circulation, including Bank Post Bills;

In each Half Year, from the 1st of January 1797 to the 1st of January 1818, inclusive.

	£.
1797:
January to June	10,821,574
July to December	11,218,084
1798:
January to June	12,954,685
July to December	12,204,547
1799:
January to June	13,374,874
July to December	13,525,714
1800:
January to June	15,009,457
July to December	15,311,824
1801:
January to June	16,134,249
July to December	15,487,555
1802:
January to June	16,284,052
July to December	16,571,726
1803:
January to June	15,967,094
July to December	17,043,450
1804:
January to June	17,623,680
July to December	17,192,440
1805:
January to June	17,271,429
July to December	16,480,713
1806:
January to June	16,941,887
July to December	16,641,761
1807:
January to June	16,724,368
July to December	16,687,438
1808:
January to June	16,953,787
July to December	17,303,512
1809:
January to June	18,214,026
July to December	19,641,640
1810:
January to June	20,894,441
July to December	24,188,605
1811:
January to June	23,471,297
July to December	23,094,046
1812:
January to June	23,123,140
July to December	23,351,496
1813:
January to June	23,939,693
July to December	24,107,445
1814:
January to June	25,511,012
July to December	28,291,832
1815:
January to June	27,155,824
July to December	26,618,210
1816:
January to June	26,468,283
July to December	26,681,398
1817:
January to June	27,339,768
July to December	29,210,035

WILLIAM DAWES, Acct. Genl.

Bank of England, 18th April, 1818.

No. XII. An Account of the total weekly Amount of Bank Notes and Bank Post Bills in circulation, from the 3d of February to the 3d of March 1818: distinguishing the Bank Post Bills; the Amount of Notes under the Value of 5l.; and stating the aggregate Amount of the whole.

	Bank Notes of 5l. and upwards.	Bank Post Bills.	Bank Notes under 5l.	Total.
1818:	£	£	£	£
February ....10.	19,650,590	1,848,380	7,446,610	28,945,580
—— ....17.	19,574,780	1,847,280	7,424,720	28,846,780
—— ....24.	18,996,980	1,855,000	7,364,620	28,216,600
March .... 3.	19,047,570	1,828,470	7,372,080	28,248,120

Bank of England, 9th March 1818.

WILLIAM DAWES,
Accountant General.

No. XIII. Accounts relating to Prosecutions for forging Bank of England Notes, viz.

1. Account of the number of persons prosecuted for forging notes of the Bank of England, and for uttering or possessing such notes knowing them to be forged, from the 1st of January, 1816, to the 25th of February, 1818; distinguishing the years, and the number convicted and acquitted of such offences respectively.

Year.	Capital convictions.	Convictions for having forged Bank-Notes in possession.	Acquittals.	Total number prosecuted.
1816	20	84	16	120
1817	32	95	15	142
1818 to 25th Feb.	4	21	1	26

2. Account of the number of persons prosecuted for forging notes of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, and for uttering such notes, knowing them to be forged, during the 14 years preceding the suspension of cash-payments by the Bank in February, 1797, distinguishing the years.

Years.	Capital convictions.	Acquittals.	Total.
1783	nil.	—	—
1784	2	....	2
1785, 1786, 1787	nil.	—	—
1788	1	....	1
1789	....	1	1
1790, 1791, 1792, 1793, 1794, 1795, 1796	nil.	—	—

3. Account of the number of persons prosecuted for forging notes of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, and for knowingly uttering or possessing such forged notes, knowing them to be forged, since the suspension of cash-payments by the Bank, in February, 1797, to the 25th of February, 1818; distinguishing the years, and the numbers convicted and acquitted.

Years.	Capital convictions.	Convictions for having forged Bank-Notes in possession.	Acquittals.	Total number prosecuted.
1797	1	—	1	2
1798	11	—	1	12
1799	12	—	3	15
1800	29	—	15	44
1801	32	1	21	54
1802	32	12	19	63
1803	7	1	1	9
1804	13	8	4	25
1805	10	14	4	28
1806	—	9	1	10
1807	16	24	5	45
1808	9	23	2	34
1809	23	29	16	68
1810	10	16	3	29
1811	5	19	9	33
1812	26	26	12	64
1813	9	49	7	65
1814	5	39	3	47
1815	7	51	5	63
1816	20	84	16	120
1817	32	95	15	142
1818 to 25th Feb.	4	21	1	26

21st April, 1818.

JOSEPH KAYE,
Solicitor to the Bank of England.

No. XIV. An Account of the Total Number of Forged Bank Notes, discovered by the Bank to have been Forged, by presentation for Payment, or otherwise, from 1st January 1812 to 10th April 1818; distinguishing each year, and also distinguishing the Number of Notes of 1*l.*, of 2*l.*, of 5*l.* of 10*l.*, of 20*l.*, and above 20*l.*, in Value.

Years.	Number of Notes of £ 1.	Number of Notes of £ 2.	Number of Notes of £ 5.	Number of Notes of £ 10.	Number of Notes of £ 15.	Number of Notes of £ 20.	Number of Notes above £ 20.	Total Number.
In 1812..	12,255	4,261	1,125	205	....	34	5	17,885
— 1813..	11,347	3,097	827	38	....	4	2	15,315
— 1814..	10,342	3,320	1,011	38	....	10	1	14,722
— 1815..	14,085	2,829	806	41	2	1	1	17,765
— 1816..	21,860	2,141	795	24	....	5	24	24,849
— 1817..	28,412	1,839	875	52	....	....	2	31,180
— 1818 to 10 April	8,937	300	387	21	....	....	....	9,645
	107,258	17,787	5,826	419	2	54	35	131,361

Bank of England, 13th May, 1818.

H. HASE,
Chief Cashier.

The total nominal value of the 131,361 notes reported above, excluding those above 20*l.*, of which no individual return is made, was 177,242*l.*

An account has been returned to Parliament of the various sums paid by the public to the Bank of England, as a remuneration for receiving the deposits or contributions on loans raised for the public service from the year 1793, to the year 1816, inclusive: from which it appears that the total sum paid by the public on this account, amounts to no less than 397,086*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.*

According to Returns made to Parliament of the various Public Balances in the hands of the Bank on the 1st and 15th days of each month, between the 1st of January and the 15th of December 1817, inclusive, it appears:—

1st. That the total Balance belonging to the different departments of Government, including the Balances of the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery, amounted to £ 66,599,421; of which the average was £ 2,774,975.

2nd. That the total Balance resulting from Payments under the head of Customs, and of all other branches of the Public Revenue, amounted to £ 10,785,259; of which the average was £ 449,385.

3d. That the total Balance resulting from the Postmaster-General's Account with the Bank, amounted to £680,916; of which the average was £ 28,371.

The total of all Public Balances not particularly specified in the three preceding accounts, on the 1st of Jan. 1818, was £337,564.

The Total amount of Unclaimed Dividends, and Lottery Prizes, in the hands of the Bank, on the 1st and 15th days of every month in the year 1817, was as follows:

	Unclaimed Dividends.	Lottery Prizes.	Remained in the hands of the Bank.
	24) 43,431,985	357,387	24) 19,695,897
Average	1,809,666	14,891	820,662

No. XV. An Account of the Number of Licences for the Issue of Promissory Notes payable on Demand, in Great Britain, in each successive Year, from the 10th of October 1811, to the 10th of October 1817:—distinguishing, the Licences renewed, from those granted to New Banks; and distinguishing the Licences granted to Persons residing in Scotland.

	Number of Licences granted in England and Wales.		Number of Licences granted in Scotland.		Total Number of Licences granted in each successive Year.
	LICENCES Renewed.	LICENCES Granted to New Banks.	LICENCES Renewed.	LICENCES Granted to New Banks.	In England and Wales.	In Scotland.
From 10th Oct. 1811 to 10th Oct. 1812	609	216	48	5	825	53
— 10th Oct. 1812 to 10th Oct. 1813	708	214	52	34	922	86
— 10th Oct. 1813 to 10th Oct. 1814	716	224	82	4	940	86
— 10th Oct. 1814 to 10th Oct. 1815	756	160	85	6	916	91
— 10th Oct. 1815 to 10th Oct. 1816	693	138	74	11	831	85
— 10th Oct. 1816 to 10th Oct. 1817	621	131	78	1	752	79
From 10th Oct. 1811 to 10th Oct. 1817	4,103	1,083	419	61	5,186	480

SAMUEL HILL, Distributer, &c.

Stamp-Office, 23d February, 1818.

No. XVI. An Account of the Amount of Gold and Silver coined at his Majesty's Mint for the Two Years preceding 1st January 1818, distinguishing each year; and also distinguishing the Amount coined from Old Gold and Silver Coin.

GOLD.

Year.	Amount coined, (including for the Pix.)	Amount Coined from Old Gold Coin.
1816	Nil	Note:—The Gold imported into the Mint by the Bank, for Coinage, is received in Ingots, without reference to the Coin from which it is produced.
1817	£ 4,268,330
Total......£	£ 4,268,350

SILVER.

Year.	Amount coined, (including for the Pix.) £.	s.	d.	Amount Coined from Old Silver Coin.
1816.	1,806,181	0	6	Nil.
1817.	2,437,095	18	0	* 1,516,038	3	4
Total......£	4,243,276	18	6	£ 1,516,036	3	4

* Note.—There remains yet to coin about Half a Million Sterling of the Old Silver Coin.

Mint Office, 10th February 1818.

JAS. W. MORRISON, Dep. Master and Wr.

No. XVII. An Account of the total Amount of Gold coined in each Year, from the Commencement of the present Reign to the 1st January, 1818, inclusive.

	£.	s.	d.		£.	s.	d.
1760	111,325	10	6	1790	2,660,521	10	0
1	550,887	15	0	1	2,456,566	17	6
2	553,691	5	0	2	1,171,863	0	0
3	513,040	10	0	3	2,747,430	0	0
4	883,102	10	0	4	2,558,894	12	6
5	538,272	0	0	5	493,416	0	0
6	820,724	12	6	6	464,680	2	6
7	1,271,807	15	6	7	2,000,297	5	0
8	844,554	7	6	8	2,967,504	15	0
9	626,582	5	0	9	449,961	15	0
1770	623,778	15	0	1800	189,937	2	6
1	637,796	5	0	1	450,242	2	0
2	843,853	10	0	2	437,018	18	6
3	1,317,645	0	0	3	596,444	12	6
4	4,685,623	11	2¼	4	718,396	17	6
5	4,901,218	17	6	5	54,668	5	0
6	5,006,350	2	6	6	405,105	15	0
7	3,680,995	10	0	7	—	—	—
8	350,437	10	0	8	371,744	2	0
9	1,696,117	10	0	9	298,946	11	0
1780	—	—	—	1810	316,935	11	6
1	876,794	12	6	11	312,263	3	6
2	698,074	7	3	12	—	—	—
3	227,083	2	10	13	519,722	3	6
4	822,126	7	6	14	—	—	—
5	2,488,106	5	0	15	—	—	—
6	1,107,382	10	0	16	—	—	—
7	2,849,056	17	6	17	4,275,337	10	0
8	3,[illegible]64,174	10	0
9	1,[illegible]30,711	0	0	Total £	71,639,213	6	9¼

Mint Office, April 6th 1818.

JAMES W. MORRISON, Deputy Master and W.
JOHN BARTON, Comptroller.

No. XVIII. An Account of the Number of Sovereigns, Half Sovereigns, Crowns, Half Crowns, Shillings, and Sixpences, issued from the Mint in the course of the year 1817.

Sovereigns.	Half Sovereigns.	Total Aggregate Amount.	Crowns.	Half Crowns.	Shillings.	Sixpences.	Total Aggregate Amount.
£	£	£		£	£	£	£
3,224,025	1,037,295	4,261,320	Nil.	1,125,630	2,453,566	657,162	4,241,358

No. XIX. Account of Exchequer Bills, and Irish Treasury Bills.

The amount of Exchequer Bills issued under the 57th Geo. III. c. 2, was 24 millions.—The amount issued under the 57th Geo. III. c. 80, was 9 millions.—The amount issued under the 56th Geo. III. c. 14, was 6 millions.—The amount issued between the 5th of January 1817, and the 6th of January 1818, was 6,698,620l. 16s. 9½d.—The amount paid off within the same period, was 47,658,120l. 16s. 9½d.—The amount which remained to be issued on the 6th of January 1818, was 3,877,600l.—The amount issued per Acts 7 and 11 of Anne, remaining in the chests of the Tellers of the Exchequer, with the Interest due upon them, outstanding and unprovided for, was, Principal 912l. 10s., Interest 180l. 4s. 2¾d.—The money paid into the Exchequer, pursuant to 51 Geo. III. c. 15, and which remained for the disposition of Parliament, amounted to 21,448l. 12s. 6d.—The amount of Interest paid on Exchequer Bills in 3 years, ended the 5th January 1818, was, in 1816, 3,014,003l. 3s. 8d.; in 1817, 2,196,177l. 19s. 3d.; in 1818, 1,710,119l. 3s. 10d. The average was, 2,306,766l. 15s. 7d.—The amount of Exchequer Bills issued under the 57th Geo. III. c. 48, was 10,098,620l. 16s. 9½d.; the amount paid off was the same.—The amount issued under 57th Geo. III. c. 16. outstanding and unprovided for, was 18 millions.—The amount issued per Act 48 Geo. III. c. 3. outstanding and unprovided for, was 3 millions.

The following, therefore, was the amount of the Unfunded Debt in Exchequer Bills, outstanding on the 5th day of January 1818.

Under what Acts issued.	On what Funds charged, and the Amount to be issued under each Act.	Amount outstanding.
48 Geo. 3d., cap. 3, continued p^r 55 Geo. 3d., cap. 16.; and further continued p^r 56 Geo. 3d., cap 7, until 5th April 1818..........	Supplies........A° 1818........3,000,000	3,000,000
56 Geo. 3d., cap. 14.	6,000,000*l.* Bank Advance, payable at the end of two years from the passing of the Act, out of the Supplies for the then current year	6,000,000
56 Geo. 3d., cap. 28.	Originally charged on Supplies 1816, but by 57 Geo. 3d., cap. 132, made payable out of Supplies A° 1817..............	607,000
57 Geo. 3d., cap. 2......	Supplies........A° 1818 24,000,000	24,000,000
— cap. 16.	Supplies........A° 1818 18,000,000	15,336,800
— cap. 80.	Supplies........A° 1818 9,000,000	7,785,600
		£56,729,400

Of which the Sum Provided for, was............	607,000
Do. Do. Unprovided for, ...	56,122,400
	£56,729,400

The Amount of Irish Treasury Bills, Outstanding and Unprovided for, on the 13th February 1818; in British Currency, was

	£	s.	d.
Issued pursuant to 56 Geo. 3, cap. 41, payable 25 March 1818, at 5 per Cent.	276,923	1	6½
Ditto ....Ditto, cap. 47, payable 24 June 1818, at 5 per Cent.	807,692	6	2
Ditto ....57 Geo. 3, cap. 81, payable 5 July 1819, at 4 per Cent.	3,600,000	0	0
	£4,684,615	7	8½

No. XX. An Account of the Average Price of Wheat, Barley, and Oats, in England and Wales; and also in the Twelve Maritime Districts; in each Quarter, from 5th January 1815 to 5th January 1818.

QUARTERS ended	ENGLAND AND WALES:							THE 12 MARITIME DISTRICTS
	Wheat:		Barley:		Oats:			Wheat:		Barley:		Oats:
	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.		s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.
1815:
25th March..	64.	2.	29.	9.	22.	6.	....	62.	4.	29.	2.	21.	7.
24th June....	69.	11.	30.	11.	24.	11.	....	69.	0.	29.	9.	24.	0.
29th Sept....	66.	7.	32.	1.	26.	1.	....	66.	3.	30.	10.	25.	0.
1816:
5th January..	56.	6.	28.	2.	21.	8.	....	56.	8.	27.	6.	20.	8.
25th March..	54.	6.	24.	6.	18.	3.	....	55.	1.	23.	11.	17.	4.
24th June....	68.	7.	26.	11.	20.	5.	....	70.	0.	26.	7.	19.	9.
29th Sept....	80.	4.	33.	10.	24.	7.	....	81.	0.	33.	6.	23.	10.
1817:
5th Jan.	97.	10.	47.	10.	30.	1.	....	96.	7.	46.	4.	28.	8.
25th March..	102.	7.	50.	4.	30.	9.	....	100.	6.	50.	0.	29.	10.
24th June...	106.	3.	52.	1.	34.	9.	....	104.	4.	51.	7.	34.	11.
29th Sept....	90.	9.	47.	3.	34.	10.	....	90.	1.	46.	9.	34.	8.
1818:
5th Jan......	80.	7.	43.	8.	27.	9.	....	81.	10.	43.	5.	26.	2.

London,
20th February, 1818.

WM. DOWDING,
Receiver of Corn Returns.

No. XXI. An Account of the Value of all IMPORTS into, and all EXPORTS from, GREAT BRITAIN, during each of the Four Years ending the 5th January 1818 (calculated at the Official Rates of Valuation, and stated inclusive and exclusive of the Trade with IRELAND); distinguishing the Amount of the Produce and Manufactures of the United Kingdom Exported, from the Value of Foreign and Colonial Merchandise Exported:—also, stating the Amount of the Produce and Manufactures of the United Kingdom Exported from GREAT BRITAIN, according to the Real and Declared Value thereof.

Years.	Official value of Exports.	Official Value of Imports.			Declared Value of Produce and Manufactures of the United Kingdom exported.
		Produce and Manufactures of the United Kingdom.	Foreign and Colonial Merchandise.	Total Exports.
	£.	£.	£.	£.	£.
1815	36,559,788	36,120,733	20,503.496	56,624,229	47,859,388
1816	35,989,650	44,048,701	16,929,608	60,978,309	53,209,809
1817	30,105,565	36,697,610	14,545,964	51,243,574	42,955,256
1818	33,971,025	41,590,516	11,534,616	53,125,132	43,614,136
1815	32,620,770	33,200,580	19,157,818	52,358,398	43,447,372
1816	31,822,053	41,712,002	15,708,434	57,420,436	49,653,245
1817	26,374,920	34,774,520	13,441,665	48,216,185	40,328,940
1818	29,916,320	39,235,397	10,269,271	49,504,668	40,337,118

No. XXII. An Account of the Value of all IMPORTS into, and all EXPORTS from, IRELAND, during each of the Four Years ending the 5th January, 1818, (calculated at the Official Rates of Valuation, and stated inclusive and exclusive of the Trade with GREAT BRITAIN) distinguishing the Amount of the Produce and Manufactures of the United Kingdom exported, from the Value of Foreign and Colonial Merchandise exported;—also, stating the Amount of the Produce and Manufactures of the United Kingdom exported from IRELAND, according to the Value thereof, as computed at the average Prices Current.

Years.	Official Value of Imports.			Official Value of Exports.									Declared Value of Produce and Manufactures of the United Kingdom exported.
				Produce and Manufactures of the United Kingdom.			Foreign and Colonial Merchandise.			Total Exports.
	£.	s.	d.	£.	s.	d.	£.	s.	d.	£.	s.	d.	£.	s.	d.
1815	6,687,732	2	9½	6,114,878	14	0½	475,370	9	11½	6,590,249	4	0	12,620,695	13	2½
1816	5,637,117	16	1½	6,360,184	8	6	170,676	16	2	6,530,861	4	8	11,391,559	6	9½
1817	4,693,745	4	6	6,012,253	15	9¾	165,869	4	8	6,208,123	0	5¾	8,510,977	1	5
1818	5,644,175	16	5½	6,412,892	10	2	150,562	7	10½	6,563,454	18	0½	10,526,325	8	0¼
1815	1,134,493	1	10½	1,006,672	19	10	208,162	19	7½	1,214,835	19	5½	2,046,846	0	2
1816	1,165,342	17	10	1,163,994	3	10¼	40,117	17	2½	1,204,112	1	0¼	1,919,782	18	4¼
1817	1,050,618	19	5	932,488	0	10¾	42,374	6	4	974,862	7	2¾	1,328,933	6	4
1818	889,335	14	2½	851,518	5	9	23,413	4	10½	874,961	10	7½	1,111,897	9	11

No. XXIII. An Account of the Number of VESSELS, with the Amount of their TONNAGE, and the Number of MEN and BOYS employed in Navigating the same (including their repeated Voyages), that entered INWARDS, and cleared OUTWARDS, at the several Ports of the United Kingdom, from and to all parts of the World (exclusive of the intercourse between GREAT BRITAIN and IRELAND respectively), during each of the Four Years ending 5th January, 1818.

	INWARDS.
	BRITISH AND IRISH.			FOREIGN.			TOTAL.
	Vessels.	Tons.	Men.	Vessels.	Tons.	Men.	Vessels.	Tons.	Men.
Years ending 5th January, 1815	8,975	1,290,248	83,793	5,286	599,287	37,375	14,261	1,889,535	121,168
1816	8,880	1,372,108	86,390	5,411	764,562	44,000	14,291	2,136,670	130,390
1817	9,744	1,415,723	90,119	3,116	379,465	25,345	12,860	1,795,188	115,464
1818	11,255	1,625,121	97,273	3,396	445,011	27,047	14,651	2,070,132	124,320
	OUTWARDS.
Years ending 5th January, 1815	8,620	1,271,952	84,100	4,622	602,941	34,828	13,242	1,874,893	118,928
1816	8,795	1,381,041	88,586	4,701	751,377	40,956	13,496	2,132,418	129,542
1817	9,044	1,340,277	86,651	2,579	399,160	23,481	11,623	1,739,437	110,132
1818	10,713	1,558,336	97,362	2,905	440,622	25,270	13,618	1,998,958	122,632

No. XXIV. An Account of the Number of SHIPS, with the Amount of their TONNAGE, which have entered INWARDS and cleared OUTWARDS at the several Ports of GREAT BRITAIN, to and from the East Indies, for Ten Years, ending the 5th January, 1818; distinguishing each Year and each Port.

	INWARDS.		OUTWARDS.
	Ships.	Tonnage.	Ships.	Tonnage.
In the Year 1814.........London..............	97	71,028	48	37,353
.....................Bristol..............	..	....	2	871
.....................Liverpool..........	..	....	1	512
.....................Plymouth...........	..	....	1	405
Total in 1814....	97	71,028	52	39,141
In the Year 1815.........London.............	93	68,803	117	78,431
.....................Liverpool...........	1	512	2	790
.....................Hull................	..	....	2	759
.....................Sandwich...........	1	521	..	....
Total in 1815....	95	69,836	121	79,980
In the Year 1816.........London............	109	81,326	138	87,866
.....................Bristol...............	..	....	1	416
.....................Hull..................	..	....	1	362
.....................Portsmouth.........	..	....	2	800
.....................Liverpool...........	7	3,365	16	7,014
.....................Whitehaven.........	..	....	1	514
.....................Newcastle..........	..	....	1	589
.....................Greenock..........	..	....	2	960
Total in 1816....	116	84,691	162	98,521
In the Year 1817.........London............	102	67,297	145	85,172
.....................Bristol..............	..	....	2	1,061
.....................Hull.................	..	....	1	379
.....................Newcastle..........	..	....	6	2,259
.....................Plymouth...........	..	....	1	589
.....................Portsmouth.........	..	....	3	2,122
.....................Whitby.............	..	....	1	468
.....................Liverpool...........	15	6,426	26	10,876
.....................Greenock...........	2	775	4	1,702
Total in 1817....	119	74,498	189	104,628

Note:—The whole of the Books of Accounts belonging to this Office, having been destroyed in the Fire at the late Custom-House, the information required cannot be furnished prior to the Year 1814.

T. E. WILLOUGHBY.

Custom House, London, Office of the Register General of Shipping, 1 May, 1818.

IN the Year ending 5th January 1817, an American Vessel, burthen 399 Tons, touched at Cork, bound to Canton in China; which was the only Vessel that entered Inwards or cleared Outwards, at the several Ports of Ireland, from or to the East Indies, for the Ten Years ending 5th January 1818.

H. B. HAUTENVILLE,
Comptroller of Tonnage and Light-Money.

Custom House, Dublin, 7th May, 1818.

No. XXV. Miscellaneous Accounts referred to in the course of the Debates.

Ex Officio Informations.—The sum paid by Mr. Hone to the Crown Office for Copies of Three Informations ex officio, filed against him, was £8. 11s. 11*d*.—It appears by the Return made to the House of Commons on the 18th of February, 1818, that the charge for the Office Copy of every Information, whether filed ex officio or not, and whether for Libel or any other Misdemeanor, is Eightpence for each Sheet of 72 words contained in the Copy; and that the sum received in each case is applied to the use of the Clerk in Court, by whom, according to the usage of the Crown Office, the Copy required is made.—This fee is said to have been received in the Crown Office of the Court of King's Bench, anciently, and time out of mind.

City Prisons.—The sums paid by the Chamberlain of London, on account of the Gaols of the said City were, in 1816, £18,513. 8s. 2*d*.: in 1817, £20,498. 13*s*. 3*d*. Average of the 2 years, £19,511.

Persons under Sentence of Death.—The Number of Persons under Sentence of Death, in Newgate, on the 31st Jan. 1818 was, Males 54, Females 10. Total 64. Of these 52 did not exceed the age of 30 years. 2, for Forgery, were only 15 and 17. And amongst them were, 1 of 10 for Highway Robbery, 1 of 11 for Burglary, 2 of 13 for Highway Robbery, Theft, &c. 1 of 14 years of age for Theft.—The whole were convicted and sentence passed at the Sessions commencing 3d Dec. 1817, and 14 Jan. 1818.

Lyme Regis Harbour.—The sum expended, since the last Session of Parliament, in the Repair of the Cobb at Lyme Regis, was £621.

Pardons under the Great Seal.—The Fees payable upon a Pardon granted under the Great Seal were as follow: Crown-office in Chancery, £50. 17s. 8*d*. Secretary of State's Office, £15. 7*s*. 0*d*. Signet Office, £6. 14*s*. 6*d*. Office of the Attorney and Solicitor-General's Clerk of the Patents, £22. 2*s*. 0*d*. Privy Seal Office, £6. 9s. 6*d*. Total £101. 10s. 6*d*.

Spanish Slave Ships.—The number of Ships engaged in the Slave Trade, and detained by his Majesty's Cruizers, for which Claims had been given by Spanish subjects were 21. The total number of Slaves composing the Cargoes was 3224.

Leather Tax.—Number of Raw Ox and Cow Hides exported, on which the Drawback was allowed, in England, for the last two years.—Year ending 5th Jan. 1817, 2,998.—Year ending 5th Jan. 1818, 2,797.

————Number of Ox and Cow Hides, and also the Number of Horse Hides, which paid the Import Duty, in England. Ox and Cow Hides (1817) raw, 195,114. Tanned 12lbs. Horse Hides, (raw) 235,860.—Ox and Cow Hides (1818) Raw, 279,324. Horse Hides (Raw) 121,757.

Army.—The effective Strength of the Army, on the 25th Dec. 1817, was, Officers, 6,849: Serjeants, 7,809: Trumpeters and Drummers, 3,145: Farriers, 319: Privates, 122,119: Total Non-Commissioned Officers and Privates, 133,392. Number of Troop Horses, 14,559.

No. XXVI. Accounts relating to the Poor Laws.

Comparative View of the Sums raised by Assessment, and the Sums expended on the Poor, at different periods.

		Total raised.	Expended on Poor.
Average	1748, 1749, 1750	£ 730,135	£ 689,971
Year	1776	1,720,316	1,530,804
Average	1783, 1784, 1785	2,167,748	2,004,237
Year	1803	5,348,204	4,267,965

The following Summary is collected from 14,640 Returns; viz. 10,593 Parishes, and 4,047 Places, being either Townships, Tythings, or Hamlets, which have made Returns separate from their respective Parishes.

1.—The Number of Persons relieved permanently, both in and out of any Workhouse, on the Average of the last Three Years, appears to be....516,963 } Do. occasionally, being Parishioners, 423,663 } Total 940,626; { exclusive of any Children of those permanently relieved out of the House.

2.—Four Thousand and Ninety-four Parishes or Places maintain the greater part of their Poor in Workhouses, averaging for the last three years 93,142 Persons.

3.—The Population of England and Wales, as taken from the Abstract laid before Parliament in the Year 1811, appears to have been 10,150,615; so that the number of Persons relieved from the Poors Rates appears to have been 9¼ in each One-hundred of the Population.

4.—The Total of the money raised by Poors Rates, or other Rates, appears to have averaged, for the last Three years, the sum of 8,168,340*l*. 13s. 9¾*d*. being at the rate of 16*s*. 1*d*. per head on the Population, or 3*s*. 1¾*d*. in the £. of the total Amount of the Sum of 51,898,423*l*. 12s. 6½*d*. as assessed to the Property Tax in the year 1815.

5. The total of the Money expended for the Maintenance of the Poor, on the average of the last three years, appears to have been £6,132,719. 4s. 1¾d. being about £6. 10s. 6¼d. for each Pauper.

6. The Amount of Money expended in Suits of Law, Removals, and Expenses of Parish Officers, averages ....£327,579 or $\frac{1}{25}$ part of the Money raised.

Ditto..........ditto........for Militia purposes..... 180,057 or $\frac{1}{45}$ .... Ditto......

Ditto..........ditto........for all other purposes ..1,655,162 or $\frac{1}{5}$ more than.. Ditto......

Total expenditure independent of the maintenance of the poor £2,162,799 or $\frac{1}{4}$ .... Ditto......

7. The Number of Persons belonging to FRIENDLY SOCIETIES appears to be, for the last three years, nearly 8½ in the 100 of the resident Population.

8. The Area of England and Wales according to the latest Authorities, appears to be 57,960 square statute miles, or 37,094,400 statute acres; wherefore, the Number of Inhabitants in each Square Mile, containing 640 Acres, averages 175 Persons.

9. The greater proportion of the Population of England and Wales appears to be employed in Trade and Manufactures, there being 770,199 Families returned employed in Agriculture, and 959,632 in Trade, Manufactures, and Handicraft; besides 413,316 other Families.

No. XXVII. Number of Persons charged with Criminal Offences, committed to the different Gaols in England and Wales, for trial at the Assizes and Sessions held for the several Counties, Cities, Towns, and Liberties therein, during the last Seven Years; distinguishing the Number in each Year, &c.

Committed for Trial in the Years	1811	1812	1813	1814	1815	1816	1817	Total in the 7 Years.
Viz. Males	3859	4891	5433	4826	6036	7347	11,758	44,150
Females	1478	1685	1731	1564	1782	1744	2,174	12,158
Total....	5337	6576	7164	6390	7818	9091	13,932	56,308
Convicted and sentenced to Death	*404	*532	*713	*558	*553	*890	*1,302	*4,952
Transportation for life..	29	25	50	53	38	60	103	358
———— 14 years..	34	67	95	78	94	133	157	658
———— 7 years..	500	588	622	625	826	861	1,474	5,496
Imprisonment (for various terms)......	2049	2506	2759	2574	3218	3663	5,700	22,469
Whipping, and fine....	147	195	183	137	154	190	320	1,326
—	3163	3913	4422	4025	4883	5797	9,056	35,259
Acquitted................	1254	1494	1451	1373	1648	1884	2,678	11,762
No Bill found, and not prosecuted	940	1169	1291	992	1287	1410	2,198	9,287
Total....	5337	6576	7164	6390	7818	9091	13,932	56,308
Offences (according to the Convictions, Indictments, and Commitments.)
Capital..................		1050	1282	1018	1086	1584	2,250	9,142
Not Capital..............	4465	5526	5882	5372	6732	7507	11,682	47,166
Total..	5337	6576	7164	6390	7818	9091	13,932	56,308
*Of whom were executed .	*45	*82	*120	*70	*57	*95	*115	*584

Number of Persons charged with Criminal Offences, committed to the different Gaols in each County, in England and Wales, for trial in the last Seven Years.

In the Years	1811	1812	1813	1814	1815	1816	1817
Anglesey	1	—	2	2	2	4	1
Bedford	27	17	34	27	28	43	44
Berks	63	108	79	83	77	103	146
Brecon..................	5	5	13	11	15	8	48
Bucks	37	33	64	47	50	65	75
Cambridge	21	34	45	37	64	71	98
Cardigan................	3	4	1	4	7	—	14
Carmarthen..............	11	10	6	8	12	17	14
Carnarvon	5	2	8	3	12	3	10
Chester.................	99	155	146	156	160	187	285
Cornwall................	31	45	42	39	54	84	120
Cumberland..............	17	53	42	23	28	51	89
Denbigh	8	7	11	10	5	15	51
Derby	37	60	71	38	57	60	165
Devon	152	179	197	235	264	284	380
Dorset	44	47	65	43	62	81	122
Durham..................	37	33	33	35	49	55	87
Essex	130	152	221	174	191	236	319
Flint...................	2	3	4	3	6	7	20
Glamorgan	18	13	26	20	15	22	50
Gloucester	109	155	175	139	187	243	442
(Bristol)	68	78	68	70	98	104	166
Hants...................	157	234	206	228	217	268	378
Hereford	66	83	79	61	54	87	174
Herts	50	109	64	61	80	81	123
Huntingdon	8	11	18	21	23	15	30
Kent....................	210	281	330	260	327	325	528
Lancaster...............	661	831	830	816	959	1,212	1,946
Leicester	57	65	77	42	71	125	176
Lincoln	65	84	102	116	156	133	232
Merioneth...............	2	2	5	1	3	6	9
Middlesex	1,482	1,663	1,707	1,646	2,005	2,226	2,686
Monmouth	18	21	18	26	24	19	59
Montgomery..............	5	13	18	8	9	14	49
Norfolk	143	137	162	119	185	244	310
Northampton	51	54	65	60	81	75	145
Northumberland..........	71	31	73	68	69	88	80
Nottingham..............	78	103	92	88	121	112	191
Oxford	31	59	70	56	66	85	118
Pembroke	7	12	8	8	19	18	29
Radnor..................	6	5	6	2	3	13	13
Rutland.................	5	4	9	1	11	12	9
Salop	79	53	92	69	90	96	267
Somerset	108	201	153	139	221	244	439
Stafford................	126	130	181	118	154	197	425
Suffolk.................	98	146	144	119	146	153	262
Surrey	208	296	279	255	294	366	491
Sussex..................	74	95	116	66	104	120	189
Warwick	178	177	263	224	277	341	624
Westmorland.............	5	9	8	6	13	18	14
Wilts	73	92	122	78	108	107	229
Worcester...............	84	78	109	104	130	128	239
York....................	206	304	405	337	355	420	748
Total	5,337	6,576	7,164	6,390	7,818	9,091	13,932

No. XXVIII. An Account of all Sums received by Great Britain, since the 20th November 1815, as Portions of the Indemnity to be paid by France, by the Treaty of that date; specifying the mode in which such Sums have been applied, and what part of them has been paid into the Exchequer.

Under the Convention, concluded in conformity to the 4th article of the principal Treaty, France was to pay Great Britain 125,000,000 francs, at the periods hereafter specified, viz.—

	Fr.	C.
In the year 1816	15,000,000	—
1817	27,500,000	—
1818	27,500,000	—
1819	27,500,000	—
1820	27,500,000	—
			125,000,000	—

In pursuance of this convention, the following sums have been actually paid, viz.—

	Fr.	C.
1815 Dec. 22	615,000	—
1816 Jan. 2	749,000	—
—— 8	3,636,000	—
April 8	1,666,666	66
Aug. 1	8,333,[illegible]3	34
			15,000,000
Nov. 28	9,166,666	66
1817 April 7	458,000	—
—— 14	524,000	—
—— 21	524,000	—
—— 28	524,000	—
May 5	[illegible]1,000	—
—— 12	[illegible],000	—
—— 15	524,000	—
—— 26	524,000	—
June 2	457,000	—
Oct. 20	4,583,666	66
Nov. 10	4,583,000	—
—— 30	4,583,666	68
			27,500,000	—
—— 27	9,166,666	66
1818 Mar. 26	9,166,666	66
			18,333,333	32

An agreement was subsequently made with France, for postponing the payment of one half the quadremetre becoming due from the 1st of April to the 31st of July, 1817, to the 20th of Octo[illegible]r, 1817; and for postponing the whole of the quadremetre becoming due from the 1st of August to the 30th of November, 1817, to the 10th and 30th of November, 1817; and interest was charged to France for such postponement, amounting to 133,106f. 52c.; and which was paid as follows, viz:—

	Fr.	C.
1817 Oct. 27	67,106	52
Nov. 13	44,000	—
Dec. 28	22,000	—
			133,106	52

	Fr.	C.
Making the total received from France to the 1st of May, 1818,..	60,966,439	84
This sum has been applied as follows:—
Retained by the British Commissioners, on account of the expenses of this establishment	555,666	66
Paid into the Military Chest in France towards the expenses of the Army of Occupation, over and above the sums received from France on account of that army	14,534,277	29
Paid to his Grace the Duke of Wellington, in Paris, towards the sum of 25,000,000 francs, granted by Parliament as prize-money to the troops under his Grace's command	8,000,000	—
Remitted to England, and which produced the sum of 1,406,916*l.* 11*s.* 11*d.* sterling	31,886,833	34
Total applied..	54,976,777	29
Remaining in the Indemnity Chest in Paris, in mandats, becoming due between the 1st May and 1st August	5,989,662	55
Total amount received from France..	60,966,439	84

The sum of 1,406,916*l.* 11*s.* 11*d.* sterling, the proceeds of the 31,886,833f. 34c. remitted from France, as above stated, was applied as follows:—

	£.	s.	d.
Towards completing the grant of the sum of 25,000,000 francs, as prize-money to the army under the command of his Grace the Duke of Wellington	707,263	10	5
To the Paymaster-general of the Forces, in repayment of sums advanced and paid out of the extraordinaries of the army in England, for the use of the troops serving in France in 1816 and 1817	104,579	0	0
To the Paymaster-general of the Forces, in repayment of sums advanced and paid in England, out of the sums granted for the ordinary service of the army, on account of the troops serving in France in 1816 and 1817	595,074	1	6
	£1,406,916	11	11

Whitehall, Treasury Chambers, 14th May, 1814.

C. ARBUTHNOT.

No. XXIX. An Account of the Unfunded Debt and Demands Outstanding on the 5th day of January 1818.

		£.	s.	d.	Amount Outstanding £.	s.	d.
Exchequer:
Exchequer Bills	Provided for	607,000	0	0
	Unprovided for	56,122,400	0	0	56,729,400	0	0
Treasury:
Miscellaneous Services		965,529	17	8
Warrants for Army Services		504,064	2	0
Treasury Bills of Exchange drawn from Abroad		164,178	0	0
Irish Treasury Bills	Provided for .... £ 982,315 7 8¼; Unprovided for .. 4,684,615 7 8½	5,666,930	15	4¾
Loan Debentures		2,053	16	11¾
Lottery Prizes		23,565	4	7½	7,326,321	16	8
Army					839,590	13	1¼
Navy					1,614,105	10	3
Ordnance					169,893	18	11
Barracks					2,314	6	2
					£66,881,626	5	1¼

Whitehall, Treasury Chambers, 25th March, 1818.

C. ARBUTHNOT.

No. XXX. A List of all Persons who have acquired Stock in the Bank of Scotland, from the 30th April to the 12th June, 1818, both inclusive.

Purchasers' Names.	Stock Purchased.
April 30, 1818. John Stevens Barandon, merchant, Austin-friars, London	£416	13	4
—— Herman Sillem, Mark-lane, London, merchant	416	13	4
—— Frederick Charles Grantoff, same place, merchant	416	13	4
—— Andrew Thompson, writer, in Edinburgh	333	6	8
—— Robert Bruce Thompson, of the Customs, Leith	416	13	4
—— Peter Wood, Leith; and James Reddie, advocate	166	13	4
May 4. John Smith, late of the Hon. East India Company's service, residing in Ayr	250	0	0
—— William Trotter, merchant, in Edinburgh	833	6	8
May 1. *Charles Theodore Palamede Antoine Felix, Comte de Forbin-janson, of Paris, now residing in London	230	0	0
—— Frederick William Lewis Augustus, Count Lusi, Captain in the first regiment of his Prussian Majesty's Guards, now residing in London	250	0	0
—— Augustus Schmaeck, Bury-court,

* Aide-de-Camp to Napoleon at Waterloo; came over here with a personal passport of the King of Bavaria.

Purchasers' Names.	Stock Purchased.
St. Mary-axe, London, merchant	250	0	0
May 2. Henry Mylius, of Winchester-street, London, merchant	166	13	4
—— Benjamin Prosper Caumont, of Old Broad street, London, merchant	250	0	0
—— Samuel Dezoete, Old Broad-street, London, merchant	250	0	0
May 5. Thomas Lothian, surgeon in Edinburgh	750	0	0
—— Miss Helen Lothian, daughter of Dr. William Lothian, late Minister of Canongate..........	833	6	8
May 4. John Francis Maubert, of the Stock-Exchange, London, and of Stamford-hill, in the county of Middlesex	416	13	4
—— Charles Henry Moring, of Hampstead-heath, in the county of Middlesex	250	0	0
—— Reinhard Castendieck, of Jewry-street, Aldgate, London, merchant	250	0	0
—— Marc Macaire, of Tokenhouse-yard, London, merchant......	250	0	0
—— John Frederick Amy, of Idol-lane, Tower-street, London, merchant	166	13	4
May 5. Alexander Anderson, of Kingask, and Mrs. Janet Anderson, his spouse	2750	0	0
—— Frederick Henry John, of Adam's-court, Broad-street, London, merchant	416	13	4
—— John David, of Threadneedle-street, London, merchant	250	0	0
—— Charles Filica, Cateaton-street, London, merchant	250	0	0
May 6. John James Romer, of South-street, Finsbury-square, in the county of Middlesex, merchant	250	0	0
May 5. Ferdinand Jordan, of Euston-square, in the county of Middlesex, merchant............	166	13	4
May 6. Auguste Chas. Joseph, Compte Mercer de Flahault, de la Billarderie, in France, and of Aldie, in the county of Perth, North Britain; now residing at Meikleour, in the said county of Perth	83	6	8
May 8. Christopher Aubin, of High Wycombe, in the county of Buckingham	250	0	0
—— Ernest Emile Rosset, of Old South Sea-house, London, merchant	230	0	0
—— Henry Nicholas Quirin Rosset, of Old South Sea-house, London, merchant..................	250	0	0
—— John Louis Prevost, of George-street, Mansion-house, London, merchant..................	83	6	8
—— Henry Schaaf, Angel-court, in the city of London, merchant..	250	0	0
May 9. John Henry Jutting, of Bury-court, St. Mary-axe, in the city of London, merchant	250	0	0
—— Charles Trumpler, of St. Helen's-place, London, merchant	166	13	4
May 11. Frederic Joly, of Threadneedle-street, London, merchant	250	0	0
—— Maurice Jacob Hertz, of St. Helen's-place, London, merchant	250	0	0
—— John Frederick Gruning, of South-street, Finsbury-square, in the county of Middlesex, merchant..................	250	0	0
—— Peter Ambrose Schutz, of Bury-court, St. Mary-axe, London, merchant	166	13
—— Rudolph Groning, of Broad-street buildings, London, merchant..	166	13
May 12. John Henry Schroder, of St. Helen's-place, London, merchant	250	0	0
May 13. Alexander Henry Patry, of Mark-lane, London, foreign agent	83	6	8
—— James Adamson, writer in Edinburgh	583	6	8
—— John Brown, writer in Edinburgh	416	13	4
May 14. John Stirling, accountant of the Royal Bank	250	0	0
—— G. Laing, of the Accountant's Office, Royal Bank..........	250	0	0
May 15. John Nicholas Sibeth, of Lime-street, London, merchant	166	13	4
—— Charles Widder, of Austin-friars, London, merchant	166	13	1
—— Bernard Theodore Suse, of Lime-street, London, merchant	166	13	4
—— James Raymond Jonston, of Alva	83	6	8
May 16. John George Henry Burmester, of New Broad-street, London, merchant	166	13	4
—— George Oppenheimer, of New Broad-street, London, merchant	166	13	4
—— Christopher Ulric Riethmuller, of Great St. Helen's, London, merchant	166	13	4
—— George Meyer, of Great St. Helen's, London, merchant....	166	13	4
—— The Right Hon. Anne Charlotte, Countess of Thanet, spouse of the Earl of Thanet	250	0	0
—— Joseph de Yrigosi, Old Broad-street, London, merchant	250	0	0
—— Solomon Rheinhold, of Manchester, merchant..............	250	0	0
—— John Anthony Fructuoso, of London, merchant	166	13	4

All the following persons purchased only to the amount of 83*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* each:—

Hans Stephen Kleinwort, of Fenchurch-buildings, London, merchant.

William Ferdinand Marche, 5, Fenchurch-buildings, London, merchant.

Antoine Fontaine, tailor, in Edinburgh.

James Patry, of Mark-lane, London, merchant.

Augustus Frederick William Hoffman, of London, gentleman.

Hyppolyto Joseph Da Costa, of No. 7, Phillimore-place, Kensington, in the county of Middlesex, gentleman.

Moses Abithol, of Old Broad-street, London, merchant.

Count Jules de Polignac, Pair de France.

Carl Gottlieb Hellmuth, of London, merchant.

John David Kohler, of Cheapside, London, merchant.

Frederick William Jacob, London, merchant.

Monsieur le Baron Sigismond Frechi, residing in London.

Charles Williams, London, merchant.

Samuel Williams, London, merchant.

Peter Augustus Milberg, late of Hackney, near London, now in Hamburgh.

Henry Niemeier, No. 76, Cheapside, London.

Louis Bazalgette, Eastwick-park, in the county of Surrey.

Henry Jonathan Williams, attorney-at-law, Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, in the United States of America.

Hyacinth Desjars, of Threadneedle-street, London, merchant.

Lion Abraham Goldschmidt, of St. Helen's-place, London, merchant.

Diedrick Johann Elster, of Austin-friars, London, merchant.

James Albers, of Lime-street-square, London, merchant.

Henry Albers, of St. Helen's-place, London, merchant.

Andrew Frederick Nellen, of New Broad-street, London, merchant.

Henry Stuiz, Winchester-street, London, merchant.

Isaac Seliz, Pavement, Moorfields, London, merchant.

Martin Salomon Warburg, same place, merchant.

Joseph Alexander Du Corron, London, merchant.

Hipolite Lafargue, Great St. Helen's, London, merchant.

Henry Lewis John Samuel Rodolphus Roches, New London-street, London, merchant.

John Anthony Zwinger, Crescent, Minories, London, merchant.

Herman Wilhelm Olderham, New London-street, London, merchant.

Charles Henry Stavengen, Fenchurch-street, London, merchant.

Solomon Sebag, Old Broad-street, London, merchant.

Peter Bordenave, Freeman's-court, Cornhill, London, merchant.

Nicholas Warin, Great St. Helen's, London, merchant.

Ernest Hudswalcker, Billiter-street, London, merchant.

Meyer Davidson, New Broad-street, London, merchant.

John Lewis Augustus Osy, Fenchurch-street, London, merchant.

Samuel Ludwig Gross, New Bond-street, London, merchant.

John Christian Blohm, New Broad-street, London, merchant.

George Magnus, St. Swithin's-lane, London, merchant.

Stanislaus Darthez, Chamomile-street, London, merchant.

John Peter Darthez, Chamomile-street, London, merchant.

Frederick William Schmaling, Fenchurch-street, London, merchant.

No. XXXI. Abstract of the Act of 56 George III. c. 86, for establishing Regulations respecting Aliens arriving in or resident in this Kingdom, in certain cases.

Whereas it is expedient that provision should be made for establishing regulations respecting aliens arriving in this kingdom, or resident therein, in certain cases; Be it enacted, that when and so often as any alien, who may be within the realm, or who may arrive therein, shall neglect to depart, when ordered by Proclamation or by Order in Council, it shall be lawful for any of his Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, or the Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland, or his or their Chief Secretary, or for any Justice of the Peace, or for any Mayor or Chief Magistrate of any city or place, to cause every such Alien to be arrested, and to be committed to the common gaol of the county or place where he or she shall be so arrested, there to remain without bail or mainprize until he or she shall be taken in charge for the purpose of being sent out of the realm.

II. That every alien being found in this realm, contrary to such Proclamation or Order, and who shall be lawfully convicted thereof, may be adjudged to suffer imprisonment for any time not exceeding one month for the first offence, and not exceeding twelve months for the second and any subsequent offence.

III. That it shall be lawful for any one of his Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, or the Lord Lieutenant or Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland, or his or their Chief Secretary, in any case in which he or they shall apprehend that any alien will not pay immediate obedience to any such Proclamation or Order as aforesaid, or in any case when any alien shall have been arrested or committed for refusal or neglect to obey any such Order, or shall have been convicted of such refusal or neglect, and either before or after such alien shall have suffered the punishment inflicted for the same, by warrant under his hand and seal, to give such alien in charge to one of his Majesty's messengers, or to any other person or persons to whom he shall think proper to direct such warrant, in order to his or her being conducted out of the kingdom, and such alien shall be so conveyed accordingly: Provided always, that where such alien (not having been convicted as aforesaid) shall alledge any excuse for not complying with such Proclamation or Order, or any reason why such Proclamation or Order should not be enforced, or why further time should be allowed him for complying therewith, it shall be lawful for the Lords of his Majesty's Privy Council, in Great Britain or Ireland, to judge of the sufficiency of such excuse or reason, and to allow or disallow the same either absolutely or on such conditions as they shall think fit; and where such alien shall be in custody under such warrant of any of his Majesty's Secretaries of State as aforesaid, the messenger or other person in whose custody he shall be, forthwith upon its being signified to him that such excuse or reason is alledged by such alien, make known the same to the said Secretary of State, who, upon receiving such notification, or in any case in which he shall be informed that any such excuse or reason is alledged by or on behalf of any alien under Proclamation or Order to quit the realm, shall forthwith suspend the execution of such Proclamation or Order until the matter can be determined by the said Lords of his Majesty's said Privy Council, and such alien, if in custody under any such warrant, shall remain in such custody until the said Lords shall have signified their determination thereon, unless in the mean time the said Secretary shall consent to, or the said Lords shall make order for the release of such alien, either with or without security.

IV. Masters of vessels shall, on their arrival, declare in writing to the inspector of aliens or officer of the customs, the number of aliens on board, specifying their names and descriptions.

V. Masters neglecting to make such declaration, shall forfeit 10*l.* for each alien he shall have had on board.

VI. Act not to extend to mariners certified to be employed in the navigation of the ship.

VII. Every alien, immediately after his or her arrival, shall declare in writing, to the inspector of aliens, or officer of the customs, the name of the ship or vessel in which he or she shall have come to this country; and every alien who shall so arrive, and also every alien who shall depart from the realm shall, immediately after such arrival or before such departure respectively, declare in like manner to such officer, his or her name and rank, occupation or description, or if a domestic servant, then also the name, rank, and description of his or her master or mistress, or shall verbally make to such officer as aforesaid such declaration, to be by him reduced to writing, and shall also in like manner declare the country or place from whence he or she shall then have come, and the place to which he or she is then going, his or her profession or occupation, and the name and place of abode of the person to whom (if any) he or she is known; and every such alien coming into this realm, who shall neglect to make declaration of the aforesaid particulars, or who shall wilfully make any false declaration thereof, may for every such offence, on legal conviction thereof, be imprisoned for any time not exceeding three months, or may be adjudged to depart out of this realm, and all other his Majesty's dominions, within a time to be limited in such judgment; and if he or she shall be found therein after such time in such judgment so limited, without lawful cause, he or she shall, being duly convicted thereof, be imprisoned for any term not exceeding twelve months.

VIII. The inspector of aliens or officer of the customs, to whom such declaration shall be made, or particulars delivered, shall immediately register the same in a book to be kept for that purpose; in which book, certificates shall be printed in blank, and counterparts thereof; and one part containing all the particulars, excepting such as shall be in the column of remarks, shall be delivered to the alien, without fee, or other charge.

IX. Every alien arriving in this realm, except such domestic servants as aforesaid, shall within one week after his or her arriving at the place which shall be expressed in the certificate, delivered to him or her as aforesaid, as the place to which he or she proposes to go, produce such certificate, if in London, at the Aliens' Office, in Crown Street, Westminster, or to the Chief Magistrate of any other town or place in which he or she shall be; and if there be no Chief Magistrate in such town or place, then to some Justice of the Peace in and for the county, city, town, or district in which such alien shall be, or to such person as shall be authorized to that effect by such Chief Magistrate or Justice, by warrant under hand and seal; or in case such certificate shall be lost, shall deliver a full and true account of all the particulars that shall have been contained in such certificate; and every alien who shall neglect or refuse to produce such certificate, or deliver such account, or who shall wilfully deliver any false account, on conviction thereof before any two Justices for the county, city, town, or district in which such alien shall be, may be adjudged, at the discretion of such Justices, for the first offence to suffer imprisonment for any time not exceeding one month.

X. It shall be lawful for the Lord Mayor and Mayors, or any one or more of the Aldermen of the cities of London and Dublin, and for any one or more Justices of the Peace, being specially authorized by one of his Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, or by the Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, by warrant under his hand and seal, or generally authorized by Order of his Majesty in Council, or any Mayor or Chief Magistrate, or other Magistrate or Magistrates of any city, borough, or town corporate, so authorized, to cause any alien whom he or they shall have cause to suspect to be a dangerous person, to be taken into custody and examined, and either to discharge or detain such alien in custody as shall appear advisable; and if it shall appear fit to detain such alien in custody, it shall be lawful for such Mayor, Alderman, or Chief Magistrate, or other Magistrate or Magistrates, or such Justice or Justices, by warrant under his or their hand and seal, to order such alien to be detained in custody until his Majesty's pleasure shall be known, there to remain without bail or mainprize: Provided nevertheless, in every such case, every such Mayor, Alderman, Chief Magistrate, or Justice, shall forthwith transmit an account of his or their proceedings touching such alien, and of the reasons for which he shall have thought fit to detain such alien, to one of his Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, or Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in order that his Majesty, or such Lord Lieutenant, may determine what may be fit to be done thereon; and it shall be lawful for his Majesty, by warrant under his sign manual, or for such Lord Lieutenant, by order under his hand, or by warrant under the hand and seal of any one of his principal Secretaries of State, or the Secretary of such Lord Lieutenant, either to direct that such alien shall be discharged, or ordered out of the kingdom.

XI. If any certificate issued to any alien shall be lost, mislaid, or destroyed, and such alien shall produce to one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace, from the officers of the customs, at the port where such alien shall have arrived, or from the office of one of his Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, or from the office of the Chief Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, a copy of such certificate, and shall make it appear to the satisfaction of such Justice, that he or she is the person named therein, and that the same has been lost, mislaid, or destroyed, without his or her wilful neglect or default, such Justice shall grant a fresh certificate.

XII. Every Custom-House Officer and Justice to whom any such certificate or account shall be produced or delivered, shall forthwith transmit true and exact copies thereof, to one of his Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, or to the Chief Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

XIII. No fee to be taken for granting certificates, on penalty of 10*l.* Officers of the Customs neglecting to make entry, or to grant certificates, or knowingly making any false entry, shall forfeit 20*l.*

XIV. Any person forging, counterfeiting, or altering certificates, or obtaining them under any other than his true name and description, and being lawfully convicted thereof, shall suffer imprisonment in the common gaol, for any time not exceeding one year.

XV. No foreign ambassador or other public minister, nor their domestic servants, registered as such, or being actually attendant upon such ambassador or minister, shall be deemed an alien within the meaning of this act: Provided also, that nothing in this act contained shall affect any alien, in respect of any act done or omitted to be done, who shall make it appear that he or she was not above the age of fourteen years at the time when such act was so done or omitted to be done: Provided always, that if any question shall arise, whether any person alledged to be an alien, and subject to the provisions of this act or any of them, is an alien or not, or is or is not an alien, subject to the said provisions or any of them, the proof that such person is, or by law is to be deemed to be a natural-born subject of his Majesty, or denizen of this kingdom, or naturalized by act of parliament, or if an alien is not subject to the provisions in this act contained or any of them, by reason of any exception contained in this act, or which shall be expressed in any Proclamation or Order in Council as aforesaid, or in any special warrant from one of his Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, or from the Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland, or his or their Chief Secretary as aforesaid, shall lie on the person so alledged to be an alien, and to be subject to the provisions of this act, some or one of them.

XVI. and XVII. Justices of the Courts of Westminster or Dublin, &c. may admit aliens to bail; as may also any Justice, by authority of a Secretary of State, &c.

XVIII. Where any alien who shall have been committed to remain until he or she shall be taken in charge for the purpose of being sent out of the realm, shall not be sent out of the realm within two calendar months after such commitment, any of the Justices of his Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster, or in Dublin, or any of the Barons in Great Britain or Ireland, being of the Degree of the Coif, or the Lord Justice Clerk, or any of the Commissioners of Justiciary in Scotland, or any two of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace in any part of the United Kingdom, may, upon application made to him or them by or on the behalf of the person so committed, and upon proof made to him or them that reasonable notice of the intention to make such application had been given to some or one of his Majesty's principal Secretaries of State in Great Britain, or to the Lord Lieutenant or Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland, or his or their Chief Secretary, according to his or their discretion, order the person so committed to be continued in or discharged out of custody.

XIX. Aliens abiding in this kingdom, who have heretofore quitted their respective countries by reason of any revolution or troubles in France, or in countries conquered by the arms of France, shall not be liable to be arrested, imprisoned, or held to bail, or to find any caution for their forthcoming, or paying any debt, nor be taken in execution on any judgment, nor by any caption, for or by reason of any debt or other cause of action contracted or arising in any parts beyond the seas, other than the dominions of his Majesty, while such aliens were not within the said dominions of his Majesty; and in case any such aliens shall have been or shall be arrested, imprisoned, or held to bail, or taken in execution on a judgment, or by caption, contrary to the intent of this act, such alien shall be discharged therefrom by order of any of his Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster or Dublin, or of the Court of Session in Scotland, or of any Judge of such Courts in vacation time.

XX. All pecuniary penalties by this act imposed, exceeding the sum of ten pounds, shall be recovered by action of debt, bill, plaint, or information, in any of his Majesty's Courts at Westminster or in Dublin, or the Court of Great Session in Wales, or the Courts of the Counties Palatine of Chester, Lancaster, and Durham, or by action or summary bill or information in the Courts of Justiciary or Exchequer in Scotland, as the case shall require, wherein no essoign, privilege, protection, or wager of law, nor more than one imparlance shall be allowed; and all pecuniary penalties by this act imposed, not exceeding the sum of ten pounds, shall, on conviction of the offender upon oath before any Justice of the Peace of the County, &c. where the offence shall be committed, be levied by distress and sale of the offender's goods and chattels, by warrant under the hand and seal of such Justice, rendering to such offender the overplus (if any) on demand, after deducting the charges of such distress and sale; and for want of sufficient distress, such Justice is to commit such offender to the common gaol of the county, or place where such offence shall be committed, for any time not exceeding six calendar months, and no writ of certiorari or of advocation or suspension shall be allowed to remove the proceedings of the said Justice, touching the pecuniary penalties aforesaid, or to supersede or suspend execution or other proceeding thereupon.

XXI. The inhabitants of any parish, township or place, shall be competent witnesses for proving the commission of any offence against this act within the limits of such parish, township, or place, notwithstanding any part of the penalty incurred by such offence is given or applicable to the poor of such parish, township, or place.

XXII. If any person shall be sued or prosecuted for any thing done in pursuance or by colour of this act, such action or prosecution shall be commenced within twelve calendar months next after the offence shall be committed, and such person shall and may plead the general issue, and give the special matter in evidence for his defence; and if upon trial a verdict shall pass for the defendant, or the plaintiff shall become nonsuited, or shall discontinue his suit or prosecution, or if judgment be given for the defendant upon demurrer or otherwise, such defendant shall have treble costs against the plaintiff.

XXIII. The powers and authority given by this act to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, or his Chief Secretary, or to the Privy Council of Ireland, shall not extend to the case of any alien arriving or being in Great Britain; and the powers and authority given to any Justice of the Peace, Mayor, or Chief Magistrate of any city, town, or place, shall not extend beyond the limits of their respective jurisdictions.

A List of all the Public (General) Acts passed in the Sixth Session of the Fifth Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.— 58 Geo. III. 1818.

In framing this List, the Editor has arranged the Acts under different heads, according to the nature of the subject to which they relate. By this means, the Reader will be enabled to find any particular Statute he may want with greater facility. The figures placed at the end of each Act, denote the Chapter of that Act in the Statute Book. The whole number of Public General Acts passed during the Session amounted to 101; in addition to which there were also passed 86 Local and Personal Acts, declared Public, and to be judicially noticed; 39 Private Acts, printed by the King's Printer, and whereof the printed Copies may be given in evidence; and 66 Private Acts, not printed.

The following are the heads under which the Public General Acts are here arranged:—

ALIENS.

1. An Act to continue, for the term of Two years, and until the end of the Session of Parliament in which that Term shall expire, if Parliament shall be then sitting, an Act of the 56th of His present Majesty, for establishing Regulations respecting Aliens arriving in or resident in this Kingdom, in certain cases 96

2. An Act to prevent Aliens, until the 25th day of March, 1819, from becoming naturalized, or being made or becoming Denizens, except in certain cases 97

ARMY AND NAVY.

3. An Act to rectify a Mistake in an Act, passed in the 59th year of the reign of His present Majesty, for punishing Mutiny and Desertion, and to indemnify certain Persons in relation thereto . . . 10

4. An Act for punishing Mutiny and Desertion; and for the better payment of the Army and their quarters 11

5. An Act for fixing the Rates of Subsistence to be paid to Innkeepers and others on quartering soldiers 22

6. An Act to authorize the Governors of the Hospital of King Charles II. for ancient and maimed Officers and Soldiers of the Army of Ireland, (usually called the Royal Hospital at Kilmainham) to suspend or take away the Pensions of such Pensioners of the said Hospital as shall be guilty of any Fraud in respect of Prize Money or Pensions, or of any other gross misconduct 8

7. An Act to continue the laws now in force relating to Yeomanry Corps in Ireland 40

8. An Act to defray the Charge of the Pay, Clothing, and Contingent Expenses of the Disembodied Militia in Great Britain; and for granting Allowances in certain cases to Subaltern Officers, Adjutants, Quarter-masters, Surgeons, Surgeons' Mates, and Serjeant Majors of Militia, until the 25th day of March 1819 58

9. An Act for defraying, until the 25th day of June, 1819, the Charge of the Pay and Clothing of the Militia of Ireland; and for making Allowances in certain cases to Subaltern Officers of the said Militia during Peace 59

10. An Act for regulating the Payment of Regimental Debts, and the Distribution of the Effects of Officers and Soldiers dying in Service, and the Receipt of Sums due to Soldiers 73

11. An Act for the further Regulation of Payments of Pensions to Soldiers upon the Establishments of Chelsea and Kilmainham 74

12. An Act to consolidate and amend the Provisions of several Acts, passed in the 51st and 52d years respectively of the reign of His present Majesty, for enabling Wives and Families of Soldiers to return to their homes 92

13. An Act for the regulating of His Majesty's Royal Marine Forces while on Shore 12

REWARDS ON CONVICTION.

RIVERS, ROADS, AND HARBOURS.

ROYAL DUKES.

SAVING BANKS.

SLAVE TRADE.

SMUGGLING.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

TREASON.

WORKMEN.

VII. ADDENDA.

Treaty between His Britannic Majesty and His Majesty the King of the Netherlands, for preventing Their Subjects from engaging in any Traffic in Slaves. Signed at the Hague, May 4th, 1818.

In the Name of the Most Holy Trinity.

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and His Majesty the King of the Netherlands, animated with a mutual desire to adopt the most effectual measures for putting a stop to the carrying on of the Slave Trade by their respective subjects, and for preventing their respective flags from being made use of as a protection to this nefarious traffic, by the people of other countries who may engage therein; Their said Majesties have accordingly resolved to proceed to the arrangement of a Convention for the attainment of their objects, and have therefore named as Plenipotentiaries, ad hoc,

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Right Honourable Richard Earl of Clancarty, Viscount Dunlo, Baron Kilconnel, Baron Trench of Garbally, in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, one of His Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council in Great Britain and also in Ireland, Member of the Committee of the first for the affairs of Commerce and Colonies, Colonel of the Regiment of Militia of the County of Galway, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of His said Majesty to His Majesty the King of the Netherlands, Grand Duke of Luxemburg; and His Majesty the King of the Netherlands, Anne, William Charles Baron de Nagell d'Ampsen, Member of the Body of Nobles of the Province of Guelderland, Knight Grand Cross of the Order of the Belgic Lion and of that of Charles the Third, Chamberlain and Minister of State, holding the department of Foreign Affairs; and Cornelius Felix van Maanen, Commander of the Order of the Belgic Lion, and Minister of State, holding the department of Justice; who, having exchanged their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed on the following Articles:

ARTICLE I.

The laws of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland rendering it already highly penal for the subjects of His Britannic Majesty to carry on, or to be in any way engaged in Trade in Slaves, His Majesty the King of the Netherlands, referring to the 8th Article of the Convention entered into with His Britannic Majesty on the 13th August 1814, engages in pursuance thereof, and within eight months from the Ratification of these presents, or sooner if possible, to prohibit all his subjects, in the most effectual manner, and especially by penal law the most formal, to take any part whatever in the Trade of Slaves; and in the event of the measures already taken by the British Government, and to be taken by that of the Netherlands, being found ineffectual or insufficient, the High Contracting Parties mutually engage to adopt such further measures, whether by legal provision or otherwise, as may from time to time appear to be best calculated, in the most effectual manner, to prevent all their respective subjects from taking any share whatever in this nefarious traffic.

ARTICLE II.

The two High Contracting Parties, for the more complete attainment of the object of preventing all traffic in Slaves, on the part of their respective subjects, mutually consent that the ships of their Royal Navies, which shall be provided with special instructions for this purpose, as hereinafter mentioned, may visit such merchant vessels of the two nations, as may be suspected, upon reasonable grounds, of having Slaves on board for an illicit traffic; and in the event only of their finding such Slaves on board, may detain and bring away such vessels, in order that they may be brought to trial before the tribunals established for this purpose, as shall hereinafter be specified.

ARTICLE III.

In the intention of explaining the mode of execution of the preceding Article it is agreed:

1st. That such reciprocal right of visit and detention shall not be exercised within the Mediterranean Sea, or within the Seas in Europe lying without the Straits of Gibraltar, and which lie to the northward of the thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude, and also within, and to the eastward of the meridian of longitude twenty degrees west of Greenwich.

2d. That the names of the several vessels furnished with such instructions, the force of each, and the names of their several Commanders shall be, from time to time, immediately upon their issue, communicated by the Power issuing the same to the other High Contracting Party.

3d. That the number of ships of each of the Royal Navies authorized to make such visit as aforesaid, shall not exceed the number of twelve, belonging to either of the High Contracting Parties, without the special consent of the other High Contracting Party being first had and obtained.

4th. That if at any time it should be deemed expedient that any ship of the Royal Navy of either of the two High Contracting Parties authorized to make such visit as aforesaid, should proceed to visit any merchant ship or ships under the flag, and proceeding under the convoy of any vessel or vessels of the Royal Navy of the other High Contracting Party, that the Commanding Officer of the ship duly authorized and instructed to make such visit, shall proceed to effect the same in communication with the Commanding Officer of the Convoy, who, it is hereby agreed, shall give every facility to such visit, and to the eventual detainer of the merchant ship or ships so visited, and in all things assist to the utmost of his power in the due execution of the present Convention, according to the true intent and meaning thereof.

5th. It is further mutually agreed, that the Commanders of the ships of the two Royal Navies, who shall be employed on this service, shall adhere strictly to the exact tenor of the instructions which they shall receive for this purpose.

ARTICLE IV.

As the two preceding Articles are entirely reciprocal, the Two High Contracting Parties engage mutually to make good any losses which their respective subjects may incur unjustly, by the arbitrary and illegal detention of their vessels; it being understood that this indemnity shall invariably be borne by the Government whose cruizer shall have been guilty of the arbitrary detention; and that the visit and detention of ships specified in this Article shall only be effected by those British or Netherland vessels which may form part of the two Royal Navies, and by those only of such vessels which are provided with the special Instructions annexed to the present Treaty, in pursuance of the provisions thereof.

ARTICLE V.

No British or Netherland cruizer shall detain any ship whatever not having Slaves actually on board; and in order to render lawful the detention of any ship, whether British or Netherland, the Slaves found on board such vessel must have been brought there for the express purpose of the traffic.

ARTICLE VI.

All ships of the Royal Navies of the two nations, which shall hereafter be destined to prevent the traffic in Slaves, shall be furnished by their respective Governments with a copy of the Instructions annexed to the present Treaty, and which shall be considered as an integral part thereof.

These Instructions shall be written in the Dutch and English languages, and signed for the vessels of each of the two Powers, by the Minister of their respective Marine.

The two High Contracting Parties reserve the faculty of altering the said Instructions, in whole or in part, according to circumstances; it being, however, well understood, that the said alterations cannot take place but by the common agreement, and by the consent of the two High Contracting Parties.

ARTICLE VII.

In order to bring to adjudication, with the least delay and inconvenience, the vessels which may be detained for having been engaged in a traffic of Slaves, according to the tenor of the Fifth Article of this Treaty, there shall be established, within the space of a year at furthest from the exchange of the Ratifications of the present Treaty, two mixed Courts of Justice, formed of an equal number of individuals of the two nations, named for this purpose by their respective Sovereigns.

These Courts shall reside—one in a possession belonging to His Britannic Majesty, the other within the territories of His Majesty the King of the Netherlands; and the two Governments, at the period of the exchange of the Ratifications of the present Treaty, shall declare, each for its own dominions, in what places the Courts shall respectively reside. Each of the two High Contracting Parties reserving to itself the right of changing, at its pleasure, the place of residence of the Court held within its own dominions; provided, however, that one of the two Courts shall always be held upon the Coast of Africa, and the other in one of the colonial possessions of His Majesty the King of the Netherlands.

These Courts shall judge the causes submitted to them according to the terms of the present Treaty, without appeal, and according to the regulations and instructions annexed to the present Treaty, of which they shall be considered as an integral part.

ARTICLE VIII.

In case the Commanding Officer of any of the ships of the Royal Navies of Great Britain, and of the Netherlands, commissioned under the second Article of this Treaty, shall deviate in any respect from the dispositions of the said Treaty, and shall not be enabled to justify himself, either by the tenor of the said Treaty, or of the Instructions annexed to it; the Government which shall conceive itself to be wronged by such conduct, shall be entitled to demand reparation, and in such case the Government, to which the captor may belong, binds itself to cause inquiry to be made into the subject of the complaint, and to inflict upon the captor, if he be found to have deserved it, a punishment proportioned to the transgression which may have been committed.

ARTICLE IX.

The acts or instruments annexed to this Treaty, and which form an integral part thereof, are as follows:

A. Instructions for the ships of the Royal Navies of both nations, destined to prevent the traffic in Slaves.

B. Regulation for the mixed Courts of Justice, which are to hold their sittings on the coast of Africa, and in one of the colonial possessions of His Majesty the King of the Netherlands.

ARTICLE X.

The present Treaty, consisting of ten Articles, shall be ratified, and the Ratifications exchanged within the space of one month from this date; or sooner, if possible.

In witness whereof the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed the same, and thereunto affixed the Seal of their arms.

Done at the Hague, this fourth day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighteen.

(Signed) CLANCARTY. (L. S.)
A. W. C. DE NAGELL. (L. S.)
VAN MAANEN. (L. S.)

ANNEXES.

Instructions for the Ships of the British and Netherland Royal Navies, employed to prevent the Traffic in Slaves.

ARTICLE I.

Every ship of the Royal British or Netherland Navy, which, furnished with these Instructions, shall in conformity with the second Article of the Treaty of this date, have a right to visit the merchant ships of either of the two Powers actually engaged, or suspected to be engaged in the Slave Trade, may, except in the seas exempted by the third Article of the said Treaty, proceed to such visit, and should any Slaves be found on board, brought there for the express purposes of the traffic, the Commander of the said ship of the Royal Navy may detain them, and having detained them, he is to bring them as soon as possible for judgment, before that of the two mixed Courts of Justice, appointed by the seventh Article of the Treaty of this date, which shall be the nearest, or which the Commander of the capturing ship shall, upon his own responsibility, think he can soonest reach from the spot where the ship shall have been detained.

Ships, on board of which no Slaves shall be found, intended for purposes of traffic, shall not be detained on any account or pretence whatever.

Negro servants or sailors that may be found on board the said vessels cannot in any case be deemed a sufficient cause for detention.

ARTICLE II.

Whenever a ship of the Royal Navy, so commissioned, shall meet a merchantman liable to be searched, it shall be done in the mildest manner, and with every attention which is due between allied and friendly nations; and in no case shall the search be made by an Officer holding a rank inferior to that of Lieutenant in the Navies of Great Britain and of the Netherlands.

ARTICLE III.

The ships of the Royal Navies so commissioned, which may detain any merchant ship, in pursuance of the tenor of the present Instructions, shall leave on board all the cargo, as well as the Master, and a part at least of the crew of the above-mentioned ship: the captor shall draw up in writing an authentic declaration, which shall exhibit the state in which he found the detained ship, and the changes which may have taken place in it. He shall deliver to the Master of the detained ship, a signed certificate of the papers seized on board the said vessel, as well as of the number of Slaves found on board at the moment of detention.

The Negroes shall not be disembarked till after the vessels which contain them shall be arrived at the place where the legality of the capture is to be tried by one of the two mixed Courts, in order that in the event of their not being adjudged legal prize, the loss of the proprietors may be more easily repaired. If however urgent motives, deduced from the length of the voyage, the state of health of the Negroes, or other causes, required that they should be disembarked entirely or in part, before the vessel could arrive at the place of residence of one of the said Courts, the Commander of the capturing ship may take on himself the responsibility of such disembarkation, provided that the necessity be stated in a certificate in proper form.

Regulations for the Mixed Courts of Justice, which are to reside on the Coast of Africa, and in a Colonial Possession of His Majesty the King of the Netherlands.

ARTICLE I.

The mixed Courts of Justice, to be established by the Treaty of this date, upon the Coast of Africa and in a Colonial Possession of His Majesty the King of the Netherlands, are appointed to decide upon the legality of the detention of such vessels as the cruizers of both Nations shall detain in pursuance of this same Treaty.

The above-mentioned Courts shall judge definitively and without appeal, according to the present Treaty.

The proceeding shall take place as summarily as possible: the Courts are required to decide (as far as they shall find it practicable), within the space of twenty days, to be dated from that on which every detained vessel shall have been brought into the port where they shall reside;—First, upon the legality of the capture;—Secondly, in the cases in which the captured vessel shall have been liberated, as to the indemnification which the said vessel is to receive.

And it is hereby provided, that in all cases the final sentence shall not be delayed on account of the absence of witnesses, or for want of other proofs, beyond the period of two months, except upon the application of any of the parties interested, when, upon their giving satisfactory security to charge themselves with the expense and risks of the delay, the Courts may at their discretion grant an additional delay not exceeding four months.

ARTICLE II.

Each of the above-mentioned mixed Courts, which are to reside on the Coast of Africa, and in a Colonial Possession of His Majesty the King of the Netherlands, shall be composed in the following manner:

The two High Contracting Parties shall each of them name a Judge and an Arbitrator, who shall be authorised to hear and to decide without appeal all cases of capture of vessels which, in pursuance of the stipulations of the Treaty of this date, shall be brought before them. All the essential parts of the proceedings carried on before these mixed Courts shall be written down in the legal language of the country in which the Court may reside.

The Judges and the Arbitrators shall make oath before the principal Magistrate of the place in which the Courts may reside, to judge fairly and faithfully, to have no preference either for the claimants or the captors, and to act in all their decisions, in pursuance of the stipulations of the Treaty of this date.

There shall be attached to each Court a Secretary or Registrar, appointed by the Sovereign of the country in which the Court may reside, who shall register all its acts, and who, previous to his taking charge of his post, shall make oath before the Court to conduct himself with respect for their authority, and to act with fidelity in all the affairs which may belong to his charge.

ARTICLE III.

The form of the process shall be as follows:

The Judges of the two nations shall, in the first place, proceed to the examination of the papers of the vessels, and to receive the depositions of the Captain and of two or three at least of the principal individuals on board of the detained vessel, as well as the declaration on oath of the captor, should it appear necessary, in order to be able to judge and to pronounce whether the said vessel has been justly detained or not, according to the stipulations of the present Treaty, and in order that according to this judgment it may be condemned or liberated. And in the event of the two Judges not agreeing in the sentence they ought to pronounce, whether as to the legality of the detention or the indemnification to be allowed, or any other question which might result from the stipulations of the present Treaty, they shall draw by lot the name of one of the two Arbitrators, who, after having considered the documents of the process, shall consult with the above-mentioned Judges on the case in question, and the final sentence shall be pronounced conformably to the opinion of the majority of the above-mentioned Judges, and of the above-mentioned Arbitrator.

ARTICLE IV.

In the authenticated declaration, which the captor shall make before the Court, as well as in the certificate of the papers seized, which shall be delivered to the Captain of the captured vessel, at the time of the detention the above-mentioned captor shall be bound to declare his name, the name of his vessel, as well as the latitude and longitude of the place where the detention shall have taken place, and the number of Slaves found on board of the ship at the time of the detention.

ARTICLE V.

As soon as sentence shall have been pronounced, the detained vessel, if liberated, and the cargo, in the state in which it shall then be found, shall be restored to the Master, or the person who represents him, who may, before the same Court, claim a valuation of the damages, which they may have a right to demand: the captor himself, and, in his default, his Government, shall remain responsible for the above-mentioned damages.

The two High Contracting Parties bind themselves to pay, within the term of a year from the date of the sentence, the costs and damages which may be granted by the above-named Court, it being understood that these costs and damages shall be at the expense of the Power of which the captor shall be a subject.

ARTICLE VI.

In case of the condemnation of a vessel, she shall be declared lawful prize, as well as her cargo, of whatever description it may be, with the exception of the Slaves who may be on board as objects of commerce; and the said vessel, as well as her cargo, shall be sold by public sale, for the profit of the two Governments; and as to the Slaves, they shall receive from the mixed Court a certificate of emancipation, and shall be delivered over to the Government on whose territory the Court which shall have so judged them shall be established, to be employed as servants or free labourers.

Each of the two Governments binds itself to guarantee the liberty of such portion of these individuals as shall be respectively consigned to it.

ARTICLE VII.

The mixed Courts shall also take cognizance and decide according to the third Article of this regulation, on all claims for compensation, on account of losses occasioned to vessels detained under suspicion of having been engaged in the Slave Trade, but which shall not have been condemned as legal prize by the said Courts; and in all cases wherein restitution shall be decreed, the Court shall award to the claimant or claimants, his or their lawful attorney or attornies, for his or their use, a just and complete indemnification for all costs of suit, and for all losses and damages which the claimant or claimants may have actually sustained by such capture and detention; that is to say, first, in case of total loss, the claimant or claimants shall be indemnified:

A. For the ship, her tackle, apparel and stores.

B. For all freights due and payable.

C. For the value of the cargo of merchandize, if any; deducting for all charges and expenses payable upon the sale of such cargoes, including commission of sale.

D. For all other regular charges; in such cases of total loss; and,

Secondly, in all other cases not of total loss, the claimant or claimants shall be indemnified:

A. For all special damages and expenses occasioned to the ship by the detention, and for loss of freight, when due or payable.

B. A demurrage when due, according to the Schedule annexed to the present Article.

C. For any deterioration of cargo.

D. An allowance of five per cent. on the amount of the capital employed in the purchase of cargo, for the period of delay occasioned by the detention; and

E. For all premium of insurance on additional risks.

The claimant or claimants shall in all cases be entitled to interest, at the rate of five per cent. per annum on the sum awarded, until paid by the Government to which the capturing ship belongs: the whole amount of such indemnifications being calculated in the money of the Country to which the captured ship belongs, and to be liquidated at the exchange current at the time of the award.

The two High Contracting Parties, wishing however to avoid, as much as possible, every species of fraud in the execution of the Treaty of this date, have agreed, that if it should be proved, in a manner evident to the conviction of the Judges of the two Nations, and without having recourse to the decision of an Arbitrator, and the captor has been led into error by a voluntary and reprehensible fault on the part of the captain of the detained ship; in that case only, the detained ship shall not have the right of receiving, during the days of her detention, the demurrage stipulated by the present Article.

Schedule of Demurrage or Daily Allowance for a Vessel of 100 tons to 120 inclusive,	£5	per diem.

121 ditto— 150 ditto,	6
151 ditto— 170 ditto,	8
171 ditto— 200 ditto,	10
201 ditto— 220 ditto,	11
221 ditto— 250 ditto,	12
251 ditto— 270 ditto,	14
271 ditto— 300 ditto,	15

and so on in proportion.

ARTICLE VIII.

Neither the Judges nor the Arbitrators, nor the Secretary of the mixed Court, shall be permitted to demand, or receive from any of the parties concerned in the sentences which they shall pronounce, any emolument under any pretext whatsoever, for the performance of the duties which are imposed upon them by the present regulation.

ARTICLE IX.

The two High Contracting Parties have agreed that in the event of the death or legal impeachment of one or more of the Judges or Arbitrators composing the above mentioned mixed Courts, their posts shall be supplied ad interim, in the following manner:

On the part of the British Government, the vacancies shall be filled successively in the Court, which shall sit within the possessions of his Britannic Majesty, by the Governor or Lieutenant-Governor resident in that Colony; by the principal Magistrate of the same, and by the Secretary; and in that which shall sit within the possessions of his Majesty the King of the Netherlands, it is agreed that, in case of the death of the British Judge or Arbitrator there, the surviving individuals of the said Court shall proceed equally to the judgment of such ships as may be brought before them, and to the execution of their sentence.

On the part of the Netherlands, the vacancies shall be supplied, in the possessions of his Majesty the King of the Netherlands, successively by the Governor or Lieutenant-Governor, the principal Magistrate and Secretary of Government; and upon the Coast of Africa, in case of the death of any Netherland Judge or Arbitrator, the surviving members of the Court shall proceed to judgment in the same manner as above specified for the Court Resident, in the possession of his Majesty the King of the Netherlands, in the event of the death of the British Judge or Arbitrator.

The High Contracting Parties have further agreed, that the Governor or Lieutenant-Governor of the Settlement, wherein either of the mixed Courts shall sit, in the event of a vacancy arising, either of the Judge or Arbitrator of the other High Contracting Party, shall forthwith give notice of the same to the Governor or Lieutenant-Governor of the nearest Settlement of such High Contracting Party, in order that the loss may be supplied at the earliest possible period; and each of the High Contracting Parties agrees to supply definitively, as soon as possible, the vacancies that may arise in the above-mentioned Courts, from death or any other cause whatever.

Report from the Select Committee on the Education of the Lower Orders.

The Select Committee appointed to inquire into the Education of the Lower Orders, and to report their Observations thereupon, together with the Minutes of the Evidence taken before them from time to time, to The House; and who were instructed to extend their Inquiries to Scotland;—Have considered the matters to them referred, and agreed upon the following Report:

Your Committee rejoice in being able to state, that since their first appointment in 1816, when they examined the state of the Metropolis, there is every reason to believe, that the exertions of charitable individuals and public bodies have increased, notwithstanding the severe pressure of the times; and that a great augmentation has taken place in the means provided for the instruction of the Poor in that quarter. They are happy in being able to add, that the discussion excited by the first Report, and the arguments urged in the Committee to various patrons of charities who were examined as witnesses, have had the salutary effect of improving the administration of those institutions and inculcating the importance of rather bestowing their funds in merely educating a larger number, than in giving both instruction and other assistance to a more confined number of children. As the management of those excellent establishments is necessarily placed beyond the control of the Legislature, it is only by the effects of such candid discussions that improvements in them can be effected.

Since the inquiries of Your Committee have been extended to the whole Island, they have had reason to conclude, that the means of educating the Poor are steadily increasing in all considerable towns as well as in the Metropolis. A circular Letter has been addressed to all the clergy in England, Scotland and Wales, requiring Answers to Queries, of which a copy will be found in the Appendix. It is impossible to bestow too much commendation upon the alacrity shewn by those reverend persons in complying with this requisition, and the honest zeal which they displayed to promote the great object of universal Education, is truly worthy of the pastors of the people, and the teachers of that gospel which was preached to the poor.

Your Committee have lost no time in directing and superintending the work of digesting the valuable information contained in the Returns, according to a convenient plan, which will put the House in possession of all this information in a tabular form. They have received important assistance in this and the other objects of their inquiry, from two learned Barristers, Mr. Parry, and Mr. Koe of the Court of Chancery, who have devoted much of their time to the subject.

It appears clearly from the Returns, as well as from other sources, that a very great deficiency exists in the means of educating the Poor, wherever the population is thin and scattered over country districts. The efforts of individuals combined in societies are almost wholly confined to populous places.

Another point to which it is material to direct the attention of Parliament, regards the two opposite principles of founding schools for children of all sorts, and for those only who belong to the established church. Where the means exist of erecting two schools, one upon each principle, education is not checked by the exclusive plan being adopted in one of them, because the other may comprehend the children of sectaries. In places where only one school can be supported, it is manifest that any regulations which exclude dissenters, deprive the Poor of that body of all means of education.

Your Committee, however, have the greatest satisfaction in observing, that in many schools where the national system is adopted, an increasing degree of liberality prevails, and that the church catechism is only taught, and attendance at the established place of public worship only required, of those whose parents belong to the establishment; due assurance being obtained that the children of sectaries shall learn the principles and attend the ordinances of religion, according to the doctrines and forms to which their families are attached.

It is with equal pleasure that Your Committee have found reason to conclude, that the Roman Catholic poor are anxious to avail themselves of those Protestant Schools established in their neighbourhood, in which no catechism is taught; and they indulge a hope, that the clergy of that persuasion may offer no discouragement to their attendance, more especially as they appear, in one instance, to have contributed to the support of schools, provided that no catechism was taught, and no religious observances exacted. It is contrary to the doctrine as well as discipline of the Romish Church, to allow any Protestant to interfere with those matters, and consequently it is impossible for Romanists to send their children to any school where they form part of the plan.

Your Committee are happy in being able to state, that in all the Returns, and in all the other information laid before them, there is the most unquestionable evidence that the anxiety of the Poor for education continues not only unabated, but daily increasing; that it extends to every part of the country, and is to be found equally prevalent in those smaller towns and country districts, where no means of gratifying it are provided by the charitable efforts of the richer classes.

In humbly suggesting what is fit to be done for promoting universal education, Your Committee do not hesitate to state, that two different plans are advisable, adapted to the opposite circumstances of the town and country districts. Wherever the efforts of individuals can support the requisite number of schools, it would be unnecessary and injurious to interpose any parliamentary assistance. But Your Committee have clearly ascertained, that in many places private subscriptions could be raised to meet the yearly expenses of a School, while the original cost of the undertaking, occasioned chiefly by the erection and purchase of the schoolhouse, prevents it from being attempted.

Your Committee conceive, that a sum of money might be well employed in supplying this first want, leaving the charity of individuals to furnish the annual provision requisite for continuing the school, and possibly for repaying the advance.

Whether the money should be vested in Commissioners, empowered to make the fit terms with the private parties desirous of establishing schools, or whether a certain sum should be intrusted to the two great Institutions in London for promoting Education, Your Committee must leave to be determined by the wisdom of Parliament.

In the numerous districts where no aid from private exertions can be expected, and where the poor are manifestly without adequate means of instruction, Your Committee are persuaded, that nothing can supply the deficiency but the adoption, under certain material modifications of the Parish School system, so usefully established in the Northern part of the Island, ever since the latter part of the seventeenth century, and upon which many important details will be found in the Appendix.

The modifications will be dictated principally by the necessity of attending to the distinction, already pointed out, between districts where private charity may be expected to furnish the means of education, and those where no such resource can be looked to; and the Tables subjoined to this Report, will afford important lights on this subject. It appears further to Your Committee, that it may be fair and expedient to assist the parishes where no schoolhouses are erected, with the means of providing them, so as only to throw upon the inhabitants the burthen of paying the schoolmaster's salary, which ought certainly not to exceed twenty-four pounds a year. It appears to Your Committee, that a sufficient supply of schoolmasters may be procured for this sum, allowing them the benefits of taking scholars, who can afford to pay, and permitting them of course to occupy their leisure hours in other pursuits. The expense attending this invaluable system in Scotland, is found to be so very trifling, that it is never made the subject of complaint by any of the Landholders.

Your Committee forbear to inquire minutely in what manner this system ought to be connected with the Church Establishment. That such a connection ought to be formed appears manifest; it is dictated by a regard to the prosperity and stability of both systems, and in Scotland the two are mutually connected together. But a difficulty arises in England, which is not to be found there. The great body of the Dissenters from the Scottish Church differ little, if at all, in doctrine from the Establishment; they are separated only by certain opinions of a political rather than a religious nature, respecting the right of patronage, and by some shades of distinction as to church discipline; so that they may conscientiously send their children to parish schools connected with the Establishment, and teaching its catechism. In England the case is widely different; and it appears to Your Committee essentially necessary that this circumstance be carefully considered in devising the arrangements of the system. To place the choice of the schoolmaster in the parish vestry, subject to the approbation of the parson, and the visitation of the diocesan; but to provide that the children of sectarians shall not be compelled to learn any catechism or attend any Church, other than those of their parents, seems to Your Committee the safest path by which the Legislature can hope to obtain the desirable objects of security to the Establishment on the one hand, and justice to the Dissenters on the other.

The more extended inquiries of Your Committee this session have amply confirmed the opinion which a more limited investigation had led them to form two years ago, upon the neglect and abuse of Charitable Funds connected with education. They must refer to the Appendix and the Tables, for the very important details of this branch of the subject; but they must add, that although in many cases those large funds appear to have been misapplied through ignorance, or mismanaged through carelessness, yet that some instances of abuse have presented themselves, of such a nature, as would have led them to recommend at an earlier period of the session, the institution of proceedings for more promptly checking misappropriations, both in the particular cases, and by the force of a salutary example. From the investigations of the Commission about to be issued under the authority of an Act of Parliament, much advantage may be expected; and though it would not become Your Committee to anticipate the measures which the wisdom of the Legislature may adopt in consequence of those inquiries, with a view to provide a speedy and cheaper remedy for the evil than the ordinary tribunals of the country afford; yet Your Committee cannot avoid hoping, that the mere report and publication of the existing abuses will have a material effect in leading the parties concerned, to correct them, and that even the apprehension of the inquiry about to be instituted may in the mean time produce a similar effect.

As the Universities, Public Schools, and Charities with special visitors, are exempted from the jurisdiction of the Commissioners, Your Committee have been occupied in examining several of those institutions; the result of their inquiries will be found in the Appendix. It unquestionably shews, that considerable unauthorized deviations have been made, in both Eton and Winchester, from the original plans of the founders; that those deviations have been dictated more by a regard to the interests of the Fellows than of the Scholars, who were the main object of the foundations and of the founder's bounty; and that although in some respects they have proved beneficial upon the whole to the institutions, yet that they have been, by gradual encroachments in former times, carried too far. While therefore, Your Committee readily acquit the present Fellows of all blame in this respect, they entertain a confident expectation that they will seize the opportunity afforded by the inquiry, of doing themselves honour by correcting the abuses that have crept in, as far as the real interests of the establishments may appear to require it. If too, there should exist similar errors in the Universities, which have not been examined, Your Committee willingly flatter themselves that steps will be taken to correct them, by the wisdom and integrity of the highly respectable persons, to whose hands the concerns of those great bodies are committed.

Your Committee are fully persuaded, that many great neglects and abuses exist in charities which have special visitors; indeed it so happens, that the worst instance which they have met with belongs to this class; and that no visitatorial power was exercised, until a few months ago, although the malversations had existed for many years. To this subject they therefore beg leave to request the speedy attention of Parliament.

It further appears to Your Committee, that as the Commission about to be issued will be confined to the investigation of abuses, and as the information, in the Parochial Returns, is not sufficiently detailed respecting the state of Education generally, a Commission should also be issued, either under an Act of Parliament, or by means of an Address to the Crown, for the purpose of supplying this defect.

In the course of their inquiries, Your Committee have incidentally observed that charitable funds, connected with education, are not alone liable to great abuses. Equal negligence and malversation appears to have prevailed in all other charities; and although Your Committee have no authority, by their instruction, to investigate the matter, and to report upon it, yet they should deem themselves wanting in their duty were they not to give this notice of so important a subject, accidentally forced upon their attention.—3d June 1818.

Report of the Select Committee on Laws relating to Auctions.

The Select Committee appointed to take into consideration the Laws relating to Auctions, and to report the same, with their Observations thereupon, to the House, Have, pursuant to the order of the House, considered the same accordingly, and have agreed to the following Report:

Your Committee have examined several tradesmen and respectable auctioneers, who are all of opinion, that great frauds on the public are constantly committed, by the mode in which Sales by Auction are conducted:—That property is often sold under misrepresentation as to ownership, under various pretences; such as, owners going abroad, merchants' property intended for exportation; and empty houses are filled with goods for the purpose:—That articles of the most inferior manufacture, made for the express purpose of putting into sales, as the genuine property of individuals of respectability; and to such lengths has this mode proceeded, that many auctioneers who are in the practice of vending such articles, have, with a view to impose more successfully upon the public, been detected in using the names of several of the most respectable auctioneers, varying the spelling by alteration of a letter; and Your Committee have had proofs, that several of the respectable auctioneers, whose names have been so assumed, have in several instances, in justification to themselves, been compelled to appear personally at such sales, to prohibit the same being carried on in their names, knowing such was done with a view to impose on the public.

Your Committee find also, that sales are made of linen, describing the same as foreign, and the property of Hamburgh and foreign merchants; also cutlery wares, and plated goods, in particular, of the most inferior manufacture, with London makers' names thereon, publicly declared and sold as London manufacture; and to such an extent as to compel the London makers to appear in the Sale rooms, and in person expose the fraud and imposition attempted to be practised.

Your Committee also find, that great frauds and impositions have been practised in the sales of wine, misrepresenting it as the property of individuals of respectability; and in short, there has been scarcely an article which at auction has not been grossly misrepresented:—That sales are often made without attending to the due order of the catalogue, and sometimes without any catalogue, and at others with the same catalogue used for many days sales; and the Committee in this investigation have discovered, that great frauds have been committed upon the revenue, inasmuch as at times no sale has been returned, and at other times less in amount returned than absolutely sold; and that various prosecutions have been from time to time necessarily instituted by the Excise Board.

Your Committee have reason to suppose, that the facility given to these sales, by describing property falsely as to ownership, affords ready means of selling goods dishonestly come by, and holds out the means of the evil-disposed debtor to sell fraudulently the creditor's property, to a great and serious injury to the honest trader, raising money (as it is termed) by any sacrifice of price.

That the inferiority of manufacture so sold and mis-stated is of national injury, and Your Committee have had instances stated where an exporter has immediately shipped the articles bought, vamped up for the express purpose of deception, and which was not discovered till opened, and no responsibility attaching to the auctioneer, the buyers are left without a remedy:—That while these daily sales exist without check or control, the regular manufacturer and tradesman are but little resorted to, and who, Your Committee submit, (both buyer and seller) are entitled to every protection; by reason,—1st. That the taxes of the country, and the poor, fall very heavy on the established and fixed housekeeper, while the itinerant auctioneer, as many travel from place to place, avoid paying any taxes;—and, 2dly, That a proper responsibility to the buyer resting with them for any imperfect or bad article sold, and on whose judgment and credit the buyer very often places himself. Your Committee consider these sales afford encouragement to the manufacturers of inferior articles of almost every description, and are ruinous, for the reasons before stated, to the honourable and honest tradesman, creating a competition for lowness of price, in preference to excellence of quality, whereby the best workmen are injured and thrown out of employ.

Your Committee have received information of daring combinations, by a set of men who attend real sales, and drive, by various means, respectable purchasers away, purchase at their own price, and afterwards privately sell the same, under a form of public auction, termed, "Knock-out Sales."

Your Committee have but shortly adverted to the substance of the evidence they have received; but enough, they expect, to satisfy the House to make some alterations, in the present Session, which may prevent in some degree a continuance of these frauds and impositions on the public; and therefore resolve to recommend a complete revision of the Auction Laws, and at as early a period as may be practicable.

Your Committee therefore recommend to the House, that a Bill be immediately brought in, to increase the annual license from 12*s.* to 20*l.* on every auctioneer or person selling by auction within 10 miles of the Royal Exchange, the first year, and for every future year the sum of 5*l.*; and every auctioneer without the space of 10 miles, the sum of 5*l.* the first year, and the sum of 40*s.* for every future year; and any person directly or indirectly making any sale by auction, not being licensed, to forfeit for every offence 100*l.*

That no goods be sold, under a heavy penalty, without being previously exposed to view, at least twenty-four hours, nor without a catalogue previously printed, and sold in the order of the said catalogue; and that the real name and address of the auctioneer be printed on the first page; and that a penalty of 100*l.* be inflicted on every person using any fictitious name; and that the sales be confined to the hours from ten in the morning to six in the afternoon; except book sales, and produce usually sold by the candle.

That all auction rooms for the public sales of goods by auction, such as linen drapery, woollen drapery, hosiery, haberdashery, mercery, stationary, jewellery, hardware, books and prints, be licensed from time to time for one year, and security taken from the auctioneers and others, that these regulations and former Acts should be complied with.

That a Duty of 1*s.* per lot be deposited at the Excise Office upon delivery of the catalogue; and that the sum of 1*s.* per lot be allowed to be deducted from the duty on every lot which shall exceed 20*s.*— 26 May 1818.

Report of the Committee on Public Breweries.

THE COMMITTEE to whom the Petition of several Inhabitants of LONDON and its vicinity, complaining of the high price and inferior quality of BEER, was referred to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their Observations thereupon, to The House; and to whom the Evidence taken by the Committee on the Police of the Metropolis in the years 1816 and 1817, and in the present year, so far as it regards the licensing of Public Houses, was referred, HAVE examined the matters to them referred, and agreed upon the following REPORT:

YOUR Committee have, in pursuance of the directions of the House, inquired into the matter of the Petition referred to them, and have endeavoured to reduce the observations occurring to them on the Evidence which they have heard, under the distinct heads of complaint as set forth by the Petitioners.

The first object to which the attention of Your Committee was drawn, is that allegation of the Petition, stating the Petitioners to be aggrieved by the high price and inferior quality of Beer, and which they state is obtruded upon them, in consequence of the sale of it being confined to particular persons and places which they call privileged, meaning to refer to the system of licensing public houses. Your Committee would feel great difficulty in ascertaining the exact remunerating price of any manufactured article, and more especially of a commodity, the composition of which consists of substances whose prices are not only perpetually fluctuating, but also differing, in the course of very short periods of time, in the highest degree; unless, indeed, such prices were clearly proved to be excessive, either by comparison with the prices paid for the component ingredients, or with lower prices paid in other parts of the country; they therefore cannot but hesitate in pronouncing a distinct opinion as to the precisely fair and adequate price at which Beer either has been sold at of late years within the Metropolis, or at which it can now or ought to be supplied to the Public. They think it, however, their duty to state generally, that they have received no direct and pointed evidence, founded upon such as appeared to them conclusive data, that the prices at which Beer has been supplied (according to its general quality) to the consumer during a considerable period, has yielded more than a fair profit to the brewers; and from the evidence of the best informed on this subject, who have appeared before them, they are led to conclude, that the profits to the brewers have not been extravagant or unfair.

They cannot, however, but call the attention of the House to the very large capital now invested by the brewers in the Metropolis, in the purchase or mortgage of freehold or leasehold estates in public houses, both in the Metropolis, and still more in the Country, or in loans to publicans, in order to secure their custom; nor can they avoid believing, that such a mode of conducting these concerns, must, though not profitable to the trade in general, create a necessity of selling at such a price as may secure a trade interest on money so advanced, or an indemnity to the purchasers against the large sums they may be obliged to pay for licensed houses.

Your Committee also do not mean to express any opinion of the fairness of price of the commodity supplied by breweries, which, possessing a trade chiefly with houses which may be called proprietory, and dealing also in a lesser degree with free houses, compel the proprietory houses to take a different and inferior liquor to that with which the free part of the retail trade are by the same brewery supplied; on the contrary, Your Committee cannot reprobate in too strong terms so disgraceful a practice.

The next and the most material head of complaint presented by the Petitioners, is, the mixture of deleterious ingredients with Beer, as now made. Your Committee have limited their investigation on this subject to the six years preceding the date of the petition, from a consideration that such a period would well enable them to enter into a fair examination of its allegations, and to make a full report with regard to any practice which it might be supposed to be the object of the Petitioners to expose and correct, or which in any manner could, at the present moment, affect the interests of the Public. They have called upon the various officers of Excise, for their returns of convictions, their seizures of articles prohibited to be sold to or used by brewers; the officers who have made such seizures or detected illicit practices; and from this evidence it does not appear that any deleterious ingredients have been used by any of the eleven great breweries, within the above period; and it further appears, by such returns, that no articles contrary to law have been proved to be used by any one of the eleven great breweries, within the same period, except in the instance of Messrs. Thomas Meux's house, who in 1812, had employed a chemist of the name of Wheeler (who was examined before Your Committee) to prepare a solution of salt of tartar to correct an acidity which had at that time taken place in what he termed the young beer; but which he states to be perfectly innocent in itself, and to possess no pernicious qualities, nor to be in any degree prejudicial to the health of the consumer. For this breach of the law Messrs. Meux's and Co. were prosecuted, and on conviction paid a penalty of 100*l*., with forfeiture also of their dray and horses. Mr. Wheeler further stated, that that establishment has since passed into other hands. The absence of all other evidence against the eleven great breweries on this head, together with the inducements for disclosure and detection held out, by the very heavy penalties annexed to this species of offence, viz. (500*l*., half of which are given to the informer) induce them to believe that this charge, so far as it was intended to be pointed against the eleven great breweries, is, with the above single exception, unfounded; and that their beer has been, and as now brewed, is composed of malt and hops, legal colouring and finings only.

But your Committee must, in justice to the petitioners, state, that they do find, both from the excise returns and from the seizing officers, that drugs of a very nauseous, and some of a very pernicious quality, are still vended by persons as a trade, and bought by the lesser brewers and by the publicans; by both of them infused into their vats, and mixed in their barrels respectively, and in that state retailed to the public. That this practice is not confined to the metropolis, but extends into the country; and that travellers from London houses have been known to possess and offer cards, containing a list of articles, together with instructions adapted to the adulteration of beer. It is evident that the use of such articles, by the lesser brewers and publicans, as have been exhibited before your Committee, together with the practice of both, in many instances, (as proved by the excise returns) of mixing table beer with strong beer, must have a tendency to bring the general beverage of the eleven great brewers also into a degree of discredit; to excite a distrust in the minds of the public, and strongly to induce them to lay their complaints before the Legislature, without being able to point out distinctly the real authors of their grievance.

Your Committee have also received the most conclusive and satisfactory evidence from four of the principal brewers, who, having expressed themselves most willing to submit to any course of examination which your Committee might think proper to adopt, did, in the most unequivocal and distinct terms, deny the use of any deleterious or unlawful ingredients in their respective breweries, or any knowledge or belief of such practices in any other of the eleven great breweries.

Your Committee cannot suggest any other particular mode of preventing the use of deleterious or unlawful ingredients, than the following, viz. the strict execution of the 56th Geo. III., with regard to exacting the fullest penalties and forfeitures on those who thus endanger the health of the consumer; and the publication of every conviction (when the articles used shall have been proved to have been noxious) within the parish wherein any person guilty of such an offence shall carry on his trade; and in addition to this, a vigilant exercise of the sound discretion reposed in magistrates, to be exercised by them, in refusing licences to every victualler who shall have been convicted of any such practices.

The last head of complaint of the petitioners, in which is indeed included others of a collateral nature, is, the allegation of the existence of a monopoly in various parts of the kingdom, and particularly in the metropolis, by the eleven great breweries, and to which either the supposed unfairness of price, the use of unlawful ingredients, the alleged inferior quality of beer, and a combination to fix the price, have been ascribed. Your Committee, on this head of the petition, feel themselves called upon to revert to the investment of very large capitals in the purchase of licensed houses by brewers, and the consequent continued decrease of free houses, both in the metropolis and in the country, and in which practice that which the petitioners term monopoly, may be said chiefly to consist; and it is clear, that though the present number of free houses in the bills of mortality may still be sufficient to check, in some degree, such monopoly as may now exist; yet an extension of the present practice cannot but ultimately effect the full establishment of it, when at most the only competitors in the trade will be the proprietors of these houses. When this state of things shall arrive, the meetings of brewers to fix and lower prices, (and which is not disguised by them, but declared to be necessary,) will no longer be as unprejudicial as it is now stated to be, but may be and probably will be used as means of demanding such an unfair price from the public as they may be compelled to submit to. It is true, that price and not quantity is the subject of their present determinations and meetings, and that a competition in quality is more effectual than any competition in reasonableness of price; but an absorption of all or a greater proportion of free houses, may enable the successors of the present trades to use their power in a manner which the trade now declare not to be their practice, and totally adverse to their inclinations and intentions. Your Committee, however, cannot entertain a doubt but that it is an object of anxious consideration to the brewers to prevent any variation from the prices fixed at their general meetings; and the same has been evinced in one instance (a solitary one, your Committee are bound to observe,) in which a pecuniary consideration was offered by an agent of a brewer to a victualler, to induce him to abandon a practice which he had adopted, of selling porter at a reduced price.

Your Committee, owing to the late period of the session, were not enabled to examine, at any great length, into the state of the breweries in the country, but, from the inquiries they did make, it does appear that the abuse of the licensing system is in progress there, and producing still more injurious effects than any of which evidence has been adduced, as effecting the metropolis. In the small town of Chertsey it had become most obnoxious to the inhabitants, and, but for the exertions of a noble lord, a magistrate of the county of Surrey, who gave his evidence to the Committee, would have remained without any correction whatever. A partial correction was however effected by the establishment of one free house, and the competition of that free house, together with a coffee-house, did, in a degree, produce a supply of better beer to the community. It is worthy of notice, that the full establishment of that free house did not take place until some of the principal nobility and gentry appeared on the licensing day, and supported the grant of the licence. It further appears to your Committee, that, in some districts, not only brewers become the purchasers of licensed houses, but maltsters and spirit merchants also; that the brewers bind their proprietory houses to the spirit merchant, who, in return, performs the same service for the brewers; that the liquor then becomes inferior; private families supply themselves from their own breweries; smaller societies brew from molasses in tea-kettles; but the poor who have none of these resources, must be content with such liquor as is retailed at the licensed houses, whatever may be the quality, the price, or the measure. This system of purchasing licensed houses, appears to be condemned by two of the principal brewers, who must be supposed best to know its evil tendency and effects, not only as against the public, but as against the prosperity of their own trade. Mr. Barclay expressly condemns it, and states, that it is now increasing; and that a brewery supported by purchased public-houses, must deteriorate the quality of their beer; Mr. Martineau is of the same opinion.

Your Committee, on the difficult question of applying a proper and temperate remedy to this evil, and avoiding as much as possible proposing any measure by which that species of property which the Legislature has, by its attention not having been called to the subject, permitted to arrive at its present magnitude, beg leave to suggest, that it may be fit to enact some prospective law, which, at a given period of time, shall direct the magistrates to refuse licences to such houses as shall, on due inquiry, appear to them, by any new contract, purchase or mortgage, to have become in substance the property of a brewer; and until some regulation of this nature shall be adopted, they beg leave to submit to the House, that they entirely concur in that part of the Report of the Police Committee, which earnestly calls on "the magistrates in the country, to lend their aid to break down a confederacy, which is so injurious to the interests of the poor and middling classes of the community."—3d June, 1818.

Report of the Committee on Copyright Acts.

The Select Committee appointed to examine the Acts 8 Anne, c. 19; 15 Geo. III. c. 53; 41 Geo. III, c. 107; and 54 Geo. III, c. 116, respecting Copyright of Books; and to report any or what Alterations are requisite to be made therein, together with their Observations thereupon, to the House; and to whom the Petitions regarding the Copyright Bill, and all Returns from Public Libraries, and from Stationers' Hall, presented in the present Session, were referred; and who were empowered to report their Opinion thereupon to the House; Have examined the matters to them referred, and have agreed upon the following Report and Resolutions, together with an Appendix.

The earliest foundation for a claim from any public library, to the gratuitous delivery of new publications, is to be found in a deed of the year 1610, by which the Company of Stationers of London, at the request of Sir Thomas Bodley, engages to deliver a copy of every book printed in the Company (and not having been before printed) to the University of Oxford. This however seems to be confined to the publications of the Company in its corporate capacity, and could in no case extend to those which might proceed from individuals unconnected with it.

Soon after the Restoration in the year 1662, was passed the "Act for preventing abuses in printing seditious, treasonable, and unlicensed books and pamphlets, and for regulating of printing and printing presses;" by which, for the first time, it was enacted, That every printer should reserve three copies of the best and largest paper of every book new printed, or reprinted by him with additions, and shall, before any public vending of the said book, bring them to the master of the Company of Stationers, and deliver them to him; one whereof shall be delivered to the keeper of his Majesty's library, and the other two to be sent to the Vice Chancellor of the two Universities respectively, to the use of the public libraries of the said Universities. This act was originally introduced for two years, but was continued by two acts of the same parliament till 1679, when it expired*. It was, however, revived in the 1st year of James II, and finally expired in 1695.

It has been stated by Mr. Gaisford, one of the curators of the Bodleian library, "that there are several books entered in its register, as sent from the Stationers' Company subsequent to the expiration of that act;" but it is probable that this delivery was by no means general, as there are no traces of it at Stationers' Hall, and as Hearne, in the preface to the "Reliquiæ Bodleianæ," printed in 1703, presses for benefactions to that library as peculiarly desirable, "since the act of parliament for sending copies of books, printed by the London booksellers, is expired, and there are divers wanting for several years past."

During this period, the claim of authors and publishers to the perpetual copyright of their publications, rested upon what was afterwards determined to have been the common law, by a majority of nine to three of the judges, on the cases of Millar and Taylor in 1769, and Donaldson and Becket in 1774. Large estates had been vested in copyrights; these copyrights had been assigned from hand to hand, had been the subject of family settlements†, and in some instances larger prices had been given for the purchase of them (relation being had to the comparative value of money) than at any time subsequent to the act of the 8th of Queen Anne. By this act, which in the last of these two cases, has since been determined to have destroyed the former perpetual copyright, and to have substituted one for a more limited period, but protected by additional penalties on those who should infringe it, it is directed, that nine copies of each book that shall be printed or published, or reprinted and published with additions, shall, by the printer, be delivered to the warehouse-keeper of the Company of Stationers, before such publication made, for the use of the royal library, the libraries of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, the libraries of the four Universities of Scotland, the library of Sion College in London, and the library belonging to the faculty of Advocates at Edinburgh.

From the passing of this act until the decision of the cases of Beckford and Hood in 1798, and of the University of Cambridge and Bryer, in 1813, it was universally understood, that neither the protection of copyright, nor the obligation to deliver the eleven copies attached to the publication of any book, unless it was registered at Stationers' Hall‡, an act which was considered as purely optional and unnecessary, where it was intended to abandon the claim for copyright; and in conformity to this construction, the act of 41 Geo. III, expressly entitled the libraries of Trinity College, and the King's Inn, Dublin, to copies of such books only as should be entered at Stationers' Hall.

In Beckford versus Hood, the court of King's Bench decided, that the omission of the entry only prevented a prosecution for the penalties inflicted by the statutes, but it did not in any degree impede the recovery of a satisfaction for the violation of the copyright. The same court further determined, in the case of the University of Cambridge against Bryer in 1812, that the eleven copies were equally claimable by the public libraries, where books had not been entered at Stationers' Hall as where they had.

The burthen of the delivery, which by the latter decision was for the first time established to be obligatory upon publishers, produced in the following year a great variety of petitions to the House of Commons for redress, which were referred to a committee, whose report will be found in the Appendix, No. 2; and in 1814 the last act on this subject was passed, which directed the indiscriminate delivery of one large paper copy of every book which should be published (at the time of its being entered at Stationers' Hall) to the British Museum, but limited the claim of the other ten libraries to such books as they should demand in writing within twelve months after publication; and directed that a copy of the list of books entered at Stationers' Hall should be transmitted to the librarians once in three months, if not required oftener.

It appears, so far as your Committee have been enabled to procure information, that there is no other country in which a demand of this nature is carried to a similar extent. In America, Prussia, Saxony and Bavaria, one copy only is required to be deposited; in France and Austria two, and in the Netherlands three; but in several of these countries this is not necessary, unless copyright is intended to be claimed.

The Committee having directed a statement to be prepared by one of the witnesses, an experienced bookseller, of the retail price of one copy of every book entered at Stationers' Hall between the 30th of July 1814 and the 1st of April 1817, find that it amounts in the whole to 1,419*l.* 3*s.* 11*d.* which will give an average of 532*l.* 4*s.* per annum; but the price of the books received into the Cambridge University Library from July 1814 to June 1817, amounts to 1,145*l.* 10*s.* the average of which is 381*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* per annum.

---

* Upon reference to the continuing act of 17 Ch. II, c. 4, the clauses respecting the delivery of the three copies appear to be perpetual, yet it should seem that they were not so considered, not being adverted to in the act of Anne.

† Birch, in his Life of Archbishop Tillotson, states, that his widow, after his death in 1695, sold the copyright of his unpublished sermons for 2,500 guineas.

‡ The whole number of entries during the 70 years, from 1710 to 1780, does not equal that which has taken place in the last four years. See Appendix, No. 1.

In the course of the Inquiry committed to them, the Committee have proceeded to examine a variety of evidence, which, as it is already laid before the House, they think it unnecessary here to recapitulate; but upon a full consideration of the subject, they have come to the following resolutions:

1. That it is the opinion of this Committee, that it is desirable that so much of the Copyright Act as requires the gratuitous delivery of eleven copies should be repealed, except in so far as relates to the British Museum, and that it is desirable that a fixed allowance should be granted, in lieu thereof, to such of the other public libraries, as may be thought expedient.

2. That it is the opinion of this Committee, that if it should not be thought expedient by the House to comply with the above recommendation, it is desirable that the number of libraries, entitled to claim such delivery should be restricted to the British Museum, and the libraries of Oxford, Cambridge, Edinburgh and Dublin universities.

3. That it is the opinion of this Committee, that all books of prints, wherein the letter-press shall not exceed a certain very small proportion to each plate, shall be exempted from delivery, except to the Museum, with an exception of all books of mathematics.

4. That it is the opinion of this Committee, that all books in respect of which claim to copyright shall be expressly and effectually abandoned, be also exempted.

5. That it is the opinion of this Committee, that the obligation imposed on printers to retain one copy of each work printed by them, shall cease, and the copy of the Museum be made evidence in lieu of it.—June 5, 1818.

Appendix, No. I. Books and Music entered at Stationers' Hall from the passing of the Act 8th Anne, 1710 to 1818.

Period
April 1710 to April 1720	10 years		872
	1730	do.	492
	1740	do.	343
	1750	do.	618
	1760	do.	417
	1770	do.	433
	1780	do.	1,033
	1790	do.	2,606
	1800	do.	5,386
	1810	do.	3,076
	1814	4 do.	1,235
	1818	do.	4,353

Very little, if any, music was entered at Stationers' Hall till 1776-7, when some legal dispute arose respecting the Copyright of Music; and single songs do not appear to have been entered till April 1783; since that period, music, particularly single songs, has formed a considerable portion of the articles entered.—(Signed) Geo. Greenhill, Warehouse-keeper of the Company of Stationers.—Stationers' Hall, June 3*d*, 1818.

Appendix, No. II. Report from the Committee (in June 1813) on the Copyright of Printed Books.

The Committee appointed to examine several Acts passed in the 8th year of Queen Anne, and in the 15th and 41st years of his present Majesty, for the encouragement of learning, by vesting the copies of printed books in the authors or purchasers of such copies, and for other purposes therein mentioned; and to report, whether any and what alterations are requisite to be made therein, together with their observations thereon, to the House;—have, pursuant to the order of the House, proceeded to consider the said acts; and have received various statements, and examined several persons connected with the printing, the publishing, or with the sale of books; and, after much attention bestowed on the subject, they beg leave to observe,—

That although great changes have taken place in the literary systems of this country, since the first of the laws referred to them was enacted, on which the others depend; yet they conceive that the substance of those laws is proper to be retained; and in particular that, continuing the delivery of all new works, and in certain cases of subsequent editions, to the libraries now entitled to receive them, will tend to the advancement of learning, and to the diffusion of knowledge, without imposing any considerable burthen on the authors, printers, or publishers of such works. But that it will be expedient to modify some of the existing provisions,—as to the quality of the paper, which may fairly be reduced from the finest sort and largest size, to that used in the greater part of an edition;—by substituting a delivery on demand, after due and proper notice has been given of the publication, to a distribution in the first instance:—and by affording an alternative with respect to subsequent editions in certain cases.

Your Committee would however suggest one exception to these rules, in favour of the British Museum; this national establishment, augmenting every day in utility and importance, ought, in the opinion of your Committee, to be furnished with every publication that issues from the press, in its most splendid form.

Having presumed to advise certain regulations with the view of lightening as much as possible the pressure, whatever may be its amount, on all those connected with the publication of books, your Committee would be wanting in the discharge of their duty, were they not to recommend a strict enforcement of such obligations, as for useful purposes remains to be discharged: by annexing suitable penalties to the neglect of performing them; and perhaps in some cases by adding the forfeiture of copyright.

The attention of your Committee has naturally been directed to the late decision in the Court of King's Bench, ascertaining the true interpretation of the statute of Queen Anne; and they find, that, previously to that decision, an universal misapprehension existed as to the real state of the law; and that works were undertaken, and contracts made on the faith of long established usage. Your Committee are fully aware, that, in expounding the law, no attention can be paid by Courts of Justice to the hardships that may incidentally be produced; but it will deserve the serious deliberation of parliament, whether all retrospective effect should not be taken away from a construction, which might be thought to bear hardly on those who have acted on a different understanding of the law.

Lastly; your Committee have taken into their consideration, the subject of copy-right; which extends at present to fourteen years certain, and then to a second period of equal duration, provided the author happens to survive the first. They are inclined to think, that no adequate reason can be given for this contingent reversion, and that a fixed term should be assigned beyond the existing period of fourteen years.—17 June 1813.

VI. List of the Minority on Mr. Tierney's Motion for a Committee on the State of the Circulating Medium, and the Resumption of Cash Payments by the Bank of England. (May 1.)

Abercromby, Hon. J.
Astell, Wm.
Atherley, Arthur.
Aubrey, Sir John.
Baillie, J. E.
Barham, J.
Baring, Sir Thos.
Barnett, James.
Barnard, Visc.
Bennet, Hon. H. G.
Brougham, Henry.
Bankes, Henry.
Bentinck, Lord W.
Burdett, Sir F.
Burroughs, Sir W.
Cole, Sir C.
Calvert, N.
Campbell, Gen.
Campbell, Hon. J.
Carew, R. S.
Carter, John.
Cavendish, Lord G.
Cavendish, Hon. C.
Caulfield, Hon. H.
Coke, Thomas.
Duncannon, Visc.
Dundas, C.
Douglas, Hon. F.
Elliot, Right Hon. W.
Fazakerley, Nic.
Fergusson, Sir R.
Folkestone, Visc.
Finlay, Kirkman.
Grattan, Right Hon. H.
Gaskell, Benj.
Gordon, Robert.
Grant, J. P.
Heron, Sir Robt.
Howorth, H.
Hornby, E.
Hill, Lord A.
Knox, Thos
Latouche, Robt.
Lamb, Hon. W.
Lambton, J. G.
Lefevre, C. S.
Lemon, Sir W.
Lewis, F
Lloyd, Sir E.
Lloyd, J. M.
Lyttelton, Hon. W.
Macdonald, Jes.
Maberley, J.
Marryat, Jos.
Macintosh, Sir J.
Madocks, W. A.
Martin, John
Monck, Sir C.
Morland, S. B.
Morpeth, Visc.
Newport, Rt. Hon. Sir J.
North, Dudley
Neville, Hon. R.
Ord, W.
Osborne, Lord F.
Ossulston, Lord.
Plunkett, Rt. Hon. W.
Palmer, C.
Parnell, Sir H.
Parnell, W.
Pelham, Hon. C.
Power, R.
Powlett, Hon. W.
Phillimore, Dr.
Ridley, Sir M. W.
Romilly, Sir S.
Rowley, Sir W.
Spencer, Lord R.
Scudamore, R.
Shelley, Sir J.
Sharp, Richard.
Sebright, Sir J.
Smith, Robt.
Smith, Wm.
Smyth, J. H.
Stanley, Lord.
Tavistock, Marquis.
Taylor, C.
Tremayne, J. H.
Tierney, Rt. Hon. G.
Walpole, Hon. G.
Waldegrave, Hon. Capt.
Warre, J. A.
Wilkins, Walter.
Wynn, C. W.
Williams, Owen.
Wood, Alderman.

TELLERS.

Althorp, Visc.
Grenfell, Pascoe.

PAIRED OFF.

Cavendish, H.
Sefton, Lord.
Taylor, M. A.
Webb, E.

VII. List of the Minority on the Bank Restriction Continuance Act. (May 18.)

Babington, T.
Bankes, H.
Baring, Sir Thos.
Barnett, James.
Bolland, J.
Carter, R.
Folkestone, Visc.
Gaskell, B.
Gordon, R.
Jervoise, G. P.
Lamb, Hon. W.
Lyttelton, Hon. W.
Lewis, F.
Macintosh, Sir J.
Newman, A.
Newport, Sir J.
Onslow, Serjeant.
Parnell, Sir H.
Phillimore, Dr.
Ridley, Sir M. W.
Sharp, Richard.
Smith, R.
Smith, Wm.
Smyth, J. H.
Tierney, Rt. Hon. G.
Warre, J. A.
Wynn, C. W.

TELLERS.

Grant, J. P.
Monck, Sir C.

VIII. INDEX OF SPEAKERS—HOUSE OF LORDS.

IX. INDEX OF SPEAKERS—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

X. INDEX TO THE DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

XI. INDEX TO THE DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

ERRATA IN THE FIRST VOLUME.

In the Title-page, and in page 1, for the "56th" year, read "57th."

ERRATA IN THIS VOLUME.

In the Table of Contents, p. xviii. for "Sir Robert Herne," read "Sir Robert Heron."
Page 557, for "Mr. D. Giddy," read "Mr. D. Gilbert."
—— 558, for "a Member said," read "Dr. Phillimore said."
—— 1828, Dele the name of Mr. Dowdeswell from the List of the Minority.

G. WOODFALL, PRINTER, ANGEL COURT, SKINNER STREET, LONDON.